COALITION LEADERS COMMENT ON ELECTION VICTORY IN INTERVIEWS

Chancellor Schmidt

DW061212 Bonn ZDF Television Network in German 1924 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Reporters Klaus Altmann and Fides Krause-Brewer interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn--live]

[Text] [Krause-Brewer] Mr Federal Chancellor, the SPD has stood its ground and the FDP has scored an impressive election victory. Does this make matters easier for you, or will it complicate the future government?

[Answer] Mrs Krause-Brewer, I am very satisfied with the elections. With regard to the FDP, I am pleased with its success. It needed that after the experience in North-Rhine Westphalia. In addition, I won a case of beer. I predicted to Mr Genscher that the FDP would come off that well. Now he has to treat me to a case of beer and I will drink it with pleasure. But what is decisive is that the Social Democrat-Liberal coalition--which has borne the legislative and government responsibilities for 11 years now, first under Willy Brandt and Walter Scheel and now for more than 6 years under Hans-Dietrich Genscher and myself--that this coalition has been strengthened considerably by the outcome of these elections. In the past 4 years we have had a very thin majority of just 10 votes in the Bundestag. Present estimates indicate that we will have 40 votes more than the CDU/CSU. This will allow us to govern quite comfortably. I am very satisfied.

[Altmann] We wanted to ask you a few things about the future, but there has been a great deal of talk about the confounded advantage that accrues from being chancellor. Do you believe that Helmut Schmidt was not as attractive as the SPD? Or was he more attractive than the SPD?

[Answer] You must certainly not view the advantage of being chancellor only with regard to the Social Democrats. You must view it with regard to both coalition partners. It really does not matter very much whether it was a bonus, or merit or what not. The result is what counts. The result matters. And the result is most satisfactory. We will now safely continue our foreign policy, the policy of a military balance in Europe--if possible on a lower level--on the basis of treaties, on the basis of a balanced defense with regard to all our neighbors, including those in the East. We will be able to safely continue our internal policy of social peace. I am very certain that our neighbors in Europe, in the North, South, West and East will be very content with the election result. The French president was the first to congratulate me just now. I was very pleased by that. Other telephone calls have been announced. Germany will remain predictable. That is what matters.

[Krause-Brewer] Mr Federal Chancellor, there will be difficulties not only in the foreign policy sphere but also in the domestic political sphere. An old proverb says: Cruelties must be taken care of immediately. Can you think of any cruelties which you must take care of immediately?

[Answer] I do not have any intention of launching into that subject here at 2000 on Sunday night in any event. Naturally it is necessary to commit some cruelties in any budget. We will adopt the 1981 budget in the Cabinet during November-December. Just as in all the preceding years--and also in the years when I was finance minister--the budget this year will be controversial for the Cabinet, of course. This is not so much a question concerning the two coalition parties which might have different views, but rather an issue between the individual ministers, regardless of the party with which they are affiliated. Each of them sees himself facing important tasks and each of them would like to have the necessary funds. The finance minister can spend each mark only once.

[Krause-Brewer] Will personnel cruelties be inevitable as well?

[Answer] Personnel cruelties, no, [word instinct] no intention.

[Altmann] Hence, no new cabinet list, no small alterations--at least not in your ranks?

[Answer] It is a bit premature now to talk about personnel questions. There will have to be some talks first. Mr Genscher will... [Schmidt interrupted by interviewer]

[Altmann] Join with his four men, as he said.

[Answer] I just heard him over television. He will not raise any new demands; he told me so weeks ago. But we need to have a calm discussion about matters. Coalition talks will be held. We have a week's time for our party institutions. We want to catch up on a bit of sleep and only then will we start with the coalition talks.

[Krause-Brewer] Will you continue to want to stay very general in the coalition talks and refrain from stipulating any specific points?

[Answer] I do believe indeed that some points will be specified, but we do not intend to go into such great detail in all fields as we did 4 years ago. In any event, this is the view which Mr Genscher and I have advocated so far. Surely there will be some men and women in the two parties who would prefer to have a few more details stipulated in advance than we want. This will be a long talk, it will last for several days, and we shall see what happens.

[Altmann] You have a big though not an overwhelming majority. Will this make governing any easier? What I have in mind is pension reform, the budget, reducing debts.

[Answer] I do not think that it will be any more difficult.

[Krause-Brewer] Both sides did a considerable amount of mud-slinging in the election campaign. Do you think that the oft-cited community of democrats can be restored?

[Answer] As chancellor--and surely I may also say this on behalf of my partner, Mr Genscher; on behalf of theSocial Democratic Party; and may surely also be permitted to say it on behalf of the Free Democratic Party--I can say that in critical situations we are prepared to stick together. I suppose the memories of the election campaign will fade in the next few weeks and months. However, some things will remain in people's minds, for example, the insinuations that some of the leading men and women of my party have been active on behalf of foreign interests, as it were. This must be cleared up.

[Altmann] What will you do now, have a drink, even if it is just a glass of Coca-Cola?

[Answer] No, not cola, this is just what BILD-ZEITUNG writes. In reality I prefer to drink tea.

[Altmann] But I saw you.

[Answer] Yes, because you in television always serve me one.

[Krause-Brewer] And what about tomorrow morning--business as usual?

[Answer] Tomorrow morning we will first catch up on some sleep.

FDP Chairman Genscher

DW061254 Bonn ARD Television Network in German 1835 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Excerpts from Reporter Gerd H. Pelletier interview with Hans-Dietrich Genscher, foreign minister and FDP chairman, in Bonn--live]

[Text] [Question] Is your success a result of your working for the second votes?

[Answer] I believe that this time the voters took the importance of the second vote into greater consideration than at the last Bundestag elections.

[Question] Have you discussed the fact that 52 seats--which the second [computer]--estimate forecasts--would give you a right to demand more ministerial seats?

[Answer] We have been well represented in this Federal Government since 1969. With the departments we have in the government, we are well represented with regard to making joint decisions in the federal government. The result of today's Bundestag elections gives no reason to change anything concerning the distribution of weight within the Federal Government. It is not a matter of ministerial seats. It is now a matter of living up to the confidence of the voters.

We will have to work very hard to turn those voters who decided to vote for the FDP this time into permanent FDP voters. We will have to work very hard to overcome the problems we have in various laender where we are not represented in the Landtag. In other words, there is really no cause for extravagance or exaggerated self-confidence. We need to act with the knowledge that we have done a good job and that we have a commitment to the voters.

NEWSPAPERS ANALYZE OUTCOME OF BUNDESTAG ELECTIONS

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Commentary

[Johann Georg Reismueller commentary: "The Victors"]

[Text] Helmut Schmidt has won. He also won the elections 4 years ago, but at the time the victory of the coalition was poor; just a few tenths of a percent less and Helmut Kohl would have become chancellor. This time, however, there is a broad safety margin between the two camps. It is so wide that the victor need not heave a sigh of relief and the loser is incapable of feeling cheated out of a success just within reach. The chancellor, his government and the coalition have been confirmed by the people.

Schmidt need not share the somewhat fragile fame with his party, the SPD. This party did not become any more popular in this election campaign. If the citizens had a choice between the SPD and the Union rather than between Schmidt and Strauss, 5 October would have brought a change in power in Bonn.

Had the FDP not done so well, Schmidt's chancellorship and the coalition regime would have come to an end. But now the FDP has come out of the elections strenghtened beyond all expectations. Understandably Genscher attributes the decisive reason for the success of the coalition to himself and his party. But is this fully in keeping with the reality which we have experienced in the past several months?

This time the FDP presented itself to the voters as an inseparable component of an organism called the "Bonn coalition." Without any hesitation, discussion and conditions, and without any restrictions, at its preelection congress it undertook to continue governing with the SPD after the elections.

What makes it different from its coalition partner, to go by what the party itself said in the election campaign, is less then what stands between the wings of the two great parties, and even less than what stands between the right and left wings of the FDP itself.

They had nothing to criticize about Schmidt, on the contrary, Genscher campaigned for his party with the slogan that those who want to help Schmidt must vote FDP. Many voters did that. Following this election campaign the Federal Republic has come closer to a two-party system than to a three-party system. So Schmidt can claim that he has contributed to Genscher's victory with his person and his name.

Government routine will set in after the victory celebrations. Schmidt will remain exposed to the criticism of the opposition, although it has much to do concerning itself. It is still to be seen whether it will be able to offer a clear picture of an opposition policy. Schmidt will face difficulties in his own general alliance that has become bigger now, more colorful, less clear and maybe also more stubborn.

It is not certain, however, that election winner Schmidt will drift almost helplessly toward the day--when the new Bundestag will have passed through about half its life span--when his rule will evaporate due to the coalition camp's inability to rule. The FDP has tied itself firmly to the SPD, cutting off every path of retreat from this link. So it is condemned to help the coalition overcome severe crises--if they arise; all the SPD leftists, and there will be more of them in the new Bundestag than in the past 4 years, will try to upset Schmidt's circles. But the Chancellor can look forward rather calmly toward having a confirmed parliamentary majority and the backing of a strong FDP. If leftist trends gain ground in the SPD, who says that Schmidt must remain inflexible every time?

Press Review

DW061356 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West German 0605 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Press review on the result of the 5 October Bundestag elections]

[Excerpt] FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE writes in a second commentary: An FDP that has become so strong in its alliance with the SPD will be less prepared than ever to enter into experiments. Every CDU/CSU union politician must realize now that the FDP, after a long marriage with a partner such as the SPD, which sets the tone and is so demanding, has been thoroughly shaped by the SPD in accords and well-calculated dissonances that never go as far as calling the coalition into question--and now even less so than before.

The daily DIE WELT maintains: The new government is the old one. Nobody should be particularly surprised. Not even Strauss. He said prior to his nomination that it is almost impossible to score an absolute majority as the opposition. That explains the great success of the FDP. This time it was voted for by friends as well as adversaries. The Union can comfort itself with the fact that it has again become the strongest party. But it must realize that one cannot talk a change into taking place, even if one considers it historically necessary. Some 52 to 53 percent of the voters do not want to make a change, but they also do not want to have more socialism. The SPD was stopped with the help of the FDP because people did not believe the Union would score an absolute majority and because a majority of voters did not want to have one. So we will carry on with Schmidt and Genscher in the eighties, with more of Genscher, says DIE WELT.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU writes: The 5th of October became for the liberals exactly what the calendar said: Thanksgiving Day. The mathematical calculation worked: Second votes came from the CDU voters as well as from SPD circles. The former wanted to express their protest against Franz Josef Strauss in this way, and the latter were concerned about the Social Democrat-Liberal coalition and prepared to therefore support the Free Deomcratic partner with their vote.

The Social Democrats can be content with their result and they can live with it, although they did not achieve their election aims. They will secretly hold it against the Free Democrats who campaigned so much for the second vote. These new proportions will obviously bring influence to bear on the coalition negotiations and on the climate within the new Schmidt-Genscher cabinet. Conflicts will break out among the Union parties, conflicts which were suppressed up until 5 October. Those in the Union who voiced warnings will feel that they were right, says FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG notes: The SPD is also making long faces. The result, which was disappointing for it, was probably caused by the internal party quarrel, by the generally increasing liberal-conservative trend, and maybe the "advantage of having the chancellor" diminished, too. After these elections nothing will remain as it was. It will also be more difficult to rule. The chancellor will have to domesticate his own party even more than heretofore by pointing at the liberal coalition partner who has become stronger. Some planned bills will be passed only with the votes of the Union. That will introduce additional explosives into the Social Democrat-Liberal coalition.

HESSISCHE-NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE ponders: It must be doubted whether it will be easier now for Schmidt and Genscher to rule. The contrasts that came up in the coalition by the end of the legislative period will grow despite the basic agreement. But the Union will be facing a test also. It must overcome the defeat of its candidate.

In connection with the election returns scored by the Union parties, KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU offers the following idea: When the Union nominated Franz Josef Strauss as its top candidate--let us state frankly that this was as a result of CSU pressure--this was propagandized as the ideal solution. In reality, however, many Union politicians accepted this very grudgingly. There would not have been any dodging of the realization that Strauss surely offers the option of a better policy but at the same time conjures up the danger of unprecedented polarization. The latter fact alone is what caused the defeat. However, one should have known in advance that the outcome would be some shameful. And they did know. Nevertheless, they decided in favor of Strauss, and it is this very decision which nurses unpleasant speculations which are not particularly flattering for the CDU.

The ESSEN WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG states: The overall loser is Franz Josef Strauss. This should not surprise anybody. A candidate from the fringe of the party is incapable of attracting the voters of the center. A party group which, like the CDU/CSU, must necessarily aspire to the absolute majority cannot nominate a man who elicits such a great deal of resistance and who proved to be so hard to railroad through his own party. Granted, Strauss very strongly mobilized many voters, but he also mobilized many of them against himself. This tore the center of the party apart.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN presents this thought: It was not the Union but the candidate whom the voters refused to follow. This is indicated by the strong FDP gains with the simultaneous stagnation of the votes for the Social Democrats. Reduced to a common denominator, this means: Continuity with the Social Democrat-Liberal coalition, yes; change in policies with the Union under Strauss, no.

The KOBLENZ RHEIN-ZEITUNG argues as follows: In exaggerated self-esteem the CSU chairman wanted to achieve the sheer impossible: An absolute majority, which so far only Adenauer had scored in 1957. What he really achieved was just about a Barzel result [reference to 1972 election]. Strauss remained far from Kohl's 1976 result. This is a bitter lesson for him. It could hardly be expected that the CDU would gain confidence with the Bavarian at the top. His energy, competence and intelligence are too greatly obliterated by his reputation for a lack of self-control and unpredictability. Nevertheless, the CDU and the CSU have the consolation that they remain the strongest group in the Bundestag. But this success is rather due to the weakness of the SPD.

The RHEINPFALZ, which is published in Ludwigshafen, in this context stresses this point: In a subtle way, as it were, the voter among the liberals has corrected the course of the chancellor and the SPD for the next 4 years. But no doubt the FDP also had gains from among CDU voters who disagreed with Strauss. Some of them surely strengthened the third force, the FDP. Helmut Kohl had probably already seen this for quite some time and time and again had sought to win the liberals back as coalition partners.

The BIELEFELD WESTFALENBLATT discusses the same question: Good years may be ahead for the FDP if it succeeds in preventing the big brother with all available parliamentary and political means from embarking on his march into socialism. This is what the voters obviously want. Perhaps the FDP will someday again become capable of entering into a coalition with the Union.

SCHWARZWAELDER BOTE notes: The period after 5 October may show that an FDP, strengthened in its self-awareness, can also extricate itself from the historical alliance with the SPD if it should turn out that the conflict potential with the left wing of the SPD is greater than what remains of a common platform.

HANNOVERSCHE NEUE PRESSE writes: If our current voting system reduces the chances for the opposition to gain power on its own, it is necessary for the opposition to find a different way of accomplishing this, namely, becoming capable of a coalition with the next-door neighbor in the political spectrum. It is not just because this neighbor is the FDP that the CDU and CSU must open their liberal pages and make this plain through personnel policy. This is also necessary because obviously the majority of the voters who are prepared to change stance are to be found in the liberal center.

COMMENTATORS DISCUSS ELECTION DURING ROUNDTABLE DISCUSSION

DW061422 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 2050 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Excerpts from roundtable discussion by FRG radio correspondents Paul Botta, Juergen Kellermeier and Erwin Behrens on the outcome of the 5 October Bundestag elections--live]

[Text] [Botta] Won't the following issue now crop up in the SPD: We have an outstanding chancellor who has insured that the [coalition] majority has increased from 10 to 40, but has he produced anything for the SPD?

[Kellermeier] This may be true. And yet, the chancellor is not all wrong with his remark that the bonus derived from having the chancellor quite obviously benefitted the FDP as well in these elections. The reasons are to be found in the obviously latent distrust of the voters toward the SPD, especially toward the left wing of the SPD. The SPD must draw the conclusion that any further strengthening of the left wing or any further irritations from the left may well considerably reduce election chances of the SPD in the future.

[Botta] Possibly the CDU is facing the same question as in 1976 when Kohl scored the grandiose result: If we cannot achieve an absolute majority, should we not try to draw liberal-conservative votes from the voter potential of the FDP? Will the CDU wonder: Do we need a more liberal chancellor candidate for the next election--Albrecht, Stoltenberg? Moreover, must we not, via attempts to score gains from the FDP, even appeal to rightist SPD voters?

[Behrens] My impression is that the whole thing was a success for the pragmatic center. It is amazing how the FDP, with Genscher at the top, dealt with its depression after [the landtag defeat in] North Rhine-Westfalia. It is a result which may give the FDP self-confidence, but it is necessary to state that Genscher himself was one of the reasons for the success. You do not need a great deal of imagination to see that the government camp in the next 4 years will not, and cannot, always appear to be cohesive. We cannot totally rule out the possibility that varying majorities will occur.

[Kellermeier] I also believe that, because the FDP position has clearly been strengthened, the FDP will exploit this in the coalition negotiations in order to make its political position felt with regard to a number if disputed problems. The CDU will have to do some thinking about how to pull the FDP over to its side after this legislative period, if possible. The problem will be in how far the SPD will be prepared to take that into consideration since its leftwing will be strengthened. The position of the chancellor has certainly not been weakened, because even more than in the last legislative period Schmidt can use the FDP position vis-a-vis wishes of the Social Democrats which do not fit into his concept.

[Botta] The election result caused a stronger FDP shift to the right than would seem feasible considering the foundation of its electorate and the development of its members particularly. That will create internal party quarrels for Genscher.

[Behrens] I believe that the FDP has found voters among the many people of the political center who want to keep Schmidt as chancellor but who are horrified by an SPD that would drift to the left.

[Kellermeier] If one started out from the assumption that the CDU/CSU would only have a real chance to take over the government in Bonn if it won the FDP over as a coalition partner, the CDU will have to face the problem of whether it must not eventually change its foreign policy course. The problem of a foreign policy dissent between the CDU/CSU, on the one hand, and the FDP, on the other, is the actual background for a development which at some time could lead to a coalition between the Union and the FDP.

COMMENTATOR CRITICIZES WEAKNESS OF NATO BEYOND EUROPE

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Sad Balance"]

[Text] There is agreement that there will be no second NATO front. In other words, in no circumstances will the Atlantic alliance act jointly in the Middle East. The NATO Treaty is the decisive argument against action by alliance troops outside the NATO area. The alliance is a regional association of sovereign nations. So far, so good. But cannot events also change statutes? Not in NATO. The alliance is weak. It cannot reach beyond its borders. This is the difference in military power. Only the armed forces of three countries--America, England and Germany--are able to produce a credible deterrence. Many partners try to dodge their financial commitments. The Belgians, the Dutch and the Danes are internally opposed to closing the arms gap in the field of missiles. Portugal contributes only its geostrategic position. Turkey and Greece form a ragged flank. How shall a second flank be set up on such a fragile basis? An extension of tasks os ruled out not merely for psychological reasons. The alliance is technically not in a position to do it. A sad balance sheet after 30 years.

LE MONDE OUTLINES FRANCE'S 1981 DRAFT MILITARY BUDGET

[Unattributed report: "1981 Draft Budget Confirms Priority Is Being Given to Nuclear Forces"]

[Text] The 1981 draft budget, as presented to the National Assembly Defense Committee on Thursday 2 October, totals Fr104.4 billion (note: When military pensions are included the draft budget totals Fr123.2 billion), which represents a 17.8 percent increase over the previous year. Mr Yvon Bourges, who has been replaced as defense minister in the new cabinet by Joel le Theule, regards it as a "good budget" which "demonstrates the political will to give our defense system the means it needs." "Thus," he said, "for the fifth consecutive year the decision taken in 1974 to increase the nation's financial defense effort has been confirmed."

The 1981 draft budget makes provision for Fr56.7 billion to be spent on equipment, an increase of 19.7 percent over 1980.

Priority to Equipment

When presenting the budget the former defense minister took care to point out that, aside from fuel spending, spending on running the defense system had increased less than spending in civilian budgets. This money finances wages and social contributions--including notably the soldier's susbisistence and equipment allowance, to be increased on 1 April 1981, and the increase in the living allowance for draftees serving in the French forces in the FRG--the armed forces' everday running costs and fuel spending. When discussing this section of the budget, Mr Bourges specified that with the options which had been chosen the armed forces could maintain their activities at the level planned for 1981; 15 hours flying time per month for each air force fighter pilot; 100 days out of camp for the army; 86 days at sea for navy units, with fighting ships having nearly 100 days at sea.

With regard to equipment funds, it should be noted that they have been given priority, although that is not clear from the figures: "In 4 years," Mr Courges pointed out, "the proportion spent on equipment has increased from 40.7 percent to 45 percent of the defense budget and in 1981 it will be increased further to reach 45.7 percent." Expressed as program authorizations, these funds, which make it possible to finance the ordering of equipment intended to equip and modernize the armed forces, amount to Fr64.4 billion (22.7 percent).

More specifically, the effects of the 1981 draft defense budget will be felt in the following ways:

Strategic and Tactical Nuclear Forces--These will receive one-third of the equipment budget in terms of payment credits--one-fourth in terms of program authorizations--thereby confirming that priority is given to these forces. This is largely accounted for by the modernization of the strategic naval force, whose new multiple-warhead missle (M4) will be operational in 1985, and the development of the medium-range air-to-surface missile which the Mirage 2000 will be equipped with 1983. In this connection the [former] defense minister recalled that some 15 Mirage IVs will be kept in service until 1993 and will be equipped with this weapon system. At the same time studies are continuing on the mobile ballistic missile, on which a final choice will be made between now and 1982.

Army--With program authorizations increased by more than 30 percent, it will continue its efforts to modernize its armored divisions. To this end a number of vehicles are to be ordered in 1981: 60 AMX 30 tanks, 50 AMX 10 RC reconnaissance vehicles, 22 Gazelle helicopters and so forth. In addition funds will be released to speed up production of the 5.56 Famas rifle.

Navy--Program authorizations for new construction are up by almost 50 percent because it is essential to "catch up" Mr Bourges said. This will take the form of ordering a number of ships including a 4th nuclear attack submarine, a 6th anti-submarine corvette, a mine hunter and 2 300-ton patrol boats. It should be noted that 1981 will also see the start of the program to increase the navy's means of serving the public at sea. In this connection 2 ships, of the 11 planned, are to be ordered in 1981.

Air Force--With program authorizations up by 22.6 percent, it will continue to replace its fighter aircraft--22 Mirage 2000s, 21 Mirage F-1s and 5 Transalls will be ordered--and to develop of our forces' low-altitude detection and defense capabilities.

Gendarmerie--Its budget, with program authorizations increased by 17.8 percent, should enable it to increase its equipment stocks and create 725 jobs, in addition to which, thanks to an assistance fund provided by the French Electric Company, there will be some 20 additional posts aimed at strengthening territorial brigades where there are nuclear power stations.

LE MONDE CONTRASTS U.S., USSR REACTIONS TO IRAN-IRAQ CONFLICT

LD060921 Paris LE MONDE in French 3 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Michel Tatu article: "The Risks of Getting Bogged Down"]

[Text] War communiques about the advance by troops around the burning Abadan refinery alternate with appeasing statements by western leaders: The [oil] tanks are full, the situation is not worrisome "for the present" and so forth. This last refrain is familiar, and it is true that it is always possible to reassure yourself that things could be worse. However there is reason to wonder whether feigned optimism has not reached its limits this time. Indeed the initial assessment is more disturbing than it seemed at the outset despite a few positive signs here and there.

In the field things seem to be moving toward a fairly lengthy war without any easily definable way out. At the outset Iraq set limited war objectives: As the Iraqi foreign minister pointed out again on Saturday, Iraq's aim is to recover several hundred square kilometers of territory half-way along the border, to restore its control over the whole Shatt al-'Arab and to persuade Iran "not to interfere in internal Iraqi affairs." This list in itself meant the revocation of the 1975 Algiers Agreement--a gesture which very few governments would make, even after a defeat, still less Tehran's "irrational" government!

However Mr Saddam Husayn himself, in a public speech, has now demanded in addition an "end to the illegal occupation" of the three small islands seized by the shah in 1971 and situated near the Strait of Hormuz and also demanded that Iran stop its interference not only in Iraq but "in the other countries in the region." In addition to the undeclared ambition to be, if not the gendarme, then at least the "protector" of the gulf, other previously formulated objectives are emerging: Granting of autonomous status, "safeguarded" by Baghdad, to Iranian Khuzestan which is inhabited by Arabic-speaking people, desire to humiliate the Tehran regime and to encourage its overthrow by the military who have been given new prestige through the present fighting.

In the field too the Iraqi army has been forced by the dynamics of its operation to aim for more in order to secure less. Iran is putting up a stronger resistance than expected; the lack of spare parts has not grounded all its airplanes; and the F-4s, once in the air, are proving more effective than the MiG-21s which are still making but few appearances.

At the same time, as [Pakistan] President Zia pointed out, the "revolutionary phase" through which Iran is passing prevents its leaders from joining in conciliation and mediation efforts. Aside from the whimsical conditions put forward by Iran's ambassador to Moscow, as of yet no "official" in Tehran has the power or the will to negotiate with anybody. In these conditions even if the Iraqi thrust were to be stopped, it would only at best provide a partial solution to the problem. In this situation, in view of the balance of forces, the outcome is highly likely to be either the collapse of the Khomeyni regime or an uncontrolled escalation or both at the same time.

The "Carter Doctrine"

If the Iranian Government were left with its back to the wall it would be sure to resort to closing the Strait of Hormuz, extending the war to the Emirates and start an uprising of the Shi'ite populations in Iraq and in Bahrain or Saudi Arabia. At present the fact that Iran, under attack, has not hindered the passage of ships in the strait is a sign of considerable moderation. However this moderation is hanging by a thread--a thread which is wearing thinner daily as the fighting continues.

It is in this connection that the Western reaction in general and the U.S. reaction in particular seems curiously weak. Of course, this is not 1956; gone are the days when the French and British could use the pretext--and even organize the pretext--of an Israeli attack in the Sinai to land in the Suez Canal [also classed as a vital route for the entire West) and when Eisenhower could subsequently send everybody back home merely by raising his voice. Nonetheless, scarcely 9 months ago Mr Carter proclaimed urbi et orbi a "doctrine" according to which "any attempt made by an outside force to secure control of the Gulf region...will be repelled by all the necessary means including the use of armed force."

It is true that the President was referring to a threat "from outside" the gulf and hence to the USSR, whereas the present destabilization at the moment is being caused solely by gulf powers. However, can he say that the threat to the Strait of Hormuz does not affect the "vital interests" of the United States and its allies? This first opportunity to show the credibility of his doctrine seems to have been almost completely ignored.

Indeed his first mistake, for which he is now paying, was to allow the Tehran hostages affair to influence the whole of U.S. policy in this region for almost 1 year. The concern to save the lives of the U.S. prisoners explains the unnaturally moderate stance adopted by Washington, the care to state that no military unit had been placed on alert and the whim--quickly suppressed in view of the allies' lack of enthusism--of convening a six-party conference which would, moreover, only have served to disguise indecision.

Washington and, to a greater extent the EC member states, have probably laid down what is clearly unacceptable: Cutting off the gulf sea route--a vital route on which the Western countries have made the mistake of depending for almost half of their energy supplies. However it will be more difficult for them to intervene when things reach a crisis point at a later stage in the escalation. However a few protective measures taken at the beginning of the crisis without any provocative intention would have made the task easier: For instance, by strengthening the patrols which they alone now make in the gulf with the help of their six ships based in Bahrain the United States would more securely have set geographical limits to the conflict, especially since the 26 bigger ships they have in the Arabian Gulf could back up that deterrence by their movements.

A "Task Force"

The idea of an interallied task force which has been raised in the past few days could not, however, replace that effort. It is not that it poses insurmountable practical problems: France has some 10 ships in the Indian Ocean and Britain has already sent two ships to join the U.S. forces. However it calls for prolonged consultations among the allies with all the usual risks involved in this type of exercise and the conflicting pressures exerted on the various partners. Saudi Arabia and Iraq, not to mention Iran and the USSR have apparently already made it known that they are hostile to a Western military presence in the Gulf. It is not certain that their attitude would have been the same if that presence had been confirmed from the start.

This "message" has probably not been disregarded by Moscow. In crises of this type the Kremlin's usual custom is to reserve its comment during the first few days and then take a tougher tone in its warnings against foreign "interferences...." As soon as it is convinced that those interferences will not take place, the USSR will therefore be able to step up these warnings freely, thereby posing as Iran's protector and intimidating its neighbors.

In any case the Soviet Union is clearly less embarrassed by this affair than the other superpower. It is not dependent on the gulf for its oil supplies, it has no hostages in Tehran and it has diplomatic relations with the two warring sides while Washington does not. Although it can scarcely try to play a military role in the gulf where the United States still outclasses it on the naval level, it can use a prolonged war not only to make people forget its problems in Afghanistan but to gain diplomatic advantages.

Its initial aim seems to be to take advantage of the frustrations felt by Iran's neighbors: The treaty of friendship about to be signed with Syria is a response to that concern while crowning a long effort for rapprochement with Damascus. In a second phase Moscow might hope to play a role in negotiations between Iraq and Iran and in other problems in the region and gain a foothold in a system of guarantees for western oil supplies as a widely-noted article by Mr Portugalov had suggested at the beginning of the year.

In any case the current conflict adds to the "opportunities" which Iran's instability offered the USSR. Through its historical tradition, its population, its long gulf coast and its oil resources, this country is of prime interest to Moscow--certainly more interesting than Iraq. In the chaos of an escalation in the war it is impossible to rule out an "Ethiopian-style" reversal of Soviet diplomacy, dropping Iraq to support an Iran threatened with total collapse, just as it dropped its Somali ally to take control of Ethiopia.

We have not yet reached that stage but it is one threat among many others involved in an escalation in the current hostilities.

FORLANI HOLDS CONSULTATIONS WITH PARTY REPRESENTATIVES

AU060843 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 6 Oct (ANSA)—The Italian Government crisis moves into its crucial stage today as Premier-Designate Arnaldo Forlani opens consultations with representatives of the political parties. Forlani will be meeting today with the Christian Democrats (DC), Communists (PCI), Socialists (PSI), MSI Neofascists, Social Democrats (PSDI), Republicans (PRI), Radicals (PR) and Liberals (PLI).

Tomorrow he will wind up the consultations with representatives of the independent leftists in Parliament, of the mixed group in the Senate, with the chairman of the mixed group in the lower house and with the representative of the South Tyrol Party (SVP).

Party activity was focused over the weekend on preparations for the consultations as party leaders met with their economic experts to draft proposals to submit to Forlani. Traditional Sunday speeches by politicans added little to the positions of the parties.

PCI leadership member Adalberto Minucci kept up the polemic with PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi whom he charged with having "completely ignored the current statistics of the country's economic and social crisis". Minucci reiterated that "the leftist parties must join in a united spirit and cope with the real problems of the people and deal with the weighty issues of transformation confronting Italian society."

DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli was optimistic about the outcome of Forlani's effort and said that the task entrusted to the DC chairman "allows us to look confidently at the next stages of this diffucult business". Piccoli added that a solution to the government crisis is "an essential condition to safeguard the liberty and integrity of democratic institutions which cannot, in these times of exceptional gravity, undergo repeated [word indistinct] without being weakened".

Claudio Signorile, one of the leaders of the PSI's minority left, said he is opposed to hypothetical government formats which signal a tendency to follow "the declining stage of the center-left government and its political regression". (The center-left government was a DC-PCI-PSDI-PRI coalition format which ruled the country from 1963 to 1972). Signorile called for a "a positive relationship in Parliament and in society" between the PSI and PCI at the bargaining table with the premier-designate.

ELECTION RESULTS GIVE DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE 47.1 PERCENT OF VOTES

[Text] According to the final results of the elections in the electoral districts of the mainland and the islands [Azores and Madeira], the Democratic Alliance [AD] polled 47.1 percent of the votes while the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] polled 28 percent, the United People's Alliance [APU] 16.9 percent, and the Popular Democratic Union [UDP] 1.4 percent.

Still remaining to be counted are the votes from two electoral districts representing the emigrants. Review of these votes will not be held until 15 October. According to predictions, three of the four seats representing the Portuguese communities abroad will go to AD and one to FRS. In that event, the composition of the new parliament would be as follows: AD--134 seats; FRS--74; APU--41 and UDP--1.

DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON FUTURE PLANS

[Summary] The Democratic Alliance government said today that it would not submit its resignation to the president of the republic but rather would present a motion for a vote of confidence to the new Assembly of the Republic resulting from yesterday's elections as soon as it could convene a plenary sitting of the new parliament.

In a communique, the government said that the "constitution made no mention of the procedure to be followed by a government in office" whose parliamentary majority is confirmed for the second time. It said that it would not have any doubts about whether it was required to resign had the constitution set out a procedure concerning this. The communique said that the government would be reconstituted after the president of the republic named in the December presidential elections takes office.

SA CARNEIRO, DO AMARAL COMMENT ON ELECTION OUTCOME

[Excerpts] [Unidentified reporter] The leaders of the Democratic Alliance [AD] have held a news conference here at the Gulbenkian Foundation, of which we shall now give you extracts, starting with the leader of the Social Democratic Party, Dr Sa Carneiro:

[Begin Sa Carneiro recording] The AD's majority has emerged strengthened from these elections. This is no surprise as far as we are concerned. We are the first government formed on the basis of an electoral majority, that is to say, chosen directly by the electorate. Our only concern has been for the Portuguese people, for their difficulties and problems, especially those of the most underprivileged. We are now seeing our attitude rewarded with an enlarged majority. This means that the bipolarization--which was not of our doing but which we democratically accepted--has been attenuated because an enlarged consensus is taking form around the Democratic Alliance, a consensus embracing all the Portuguese.

The AD's increased poll, and the fall in those of the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] and the Communist Party--or the United People's Alliance [APU]--means that the Portuguese people are increasingly with the AD and its government, the government of Portugal.

But the final result that is already taking shape--give or take the odd seat--also signifies the defeat of General Ramalho Eanes who, insofar as he identified himself with the FRS, has been a protagonist in the legislative elections. It was General Ramalho Eanes who, as protagonist and participant in the election campaign of the FRS, fought and antagonized us just as he had fought and antagonized our government in his capacity as president of the republic.

In view of the context in which they have taken place these elections may therefore be regarded as the first round of the presidential elections. This means that the result of these elections has enhanced the chances of a first-round victory of the AD candidate, General Soares Carneiro, in the presidential elections. [end recording]

[Reporter] Freitas do Amaral, Social Democratic Center Party leader, also spoke of the AD's unequivocal victory; [begin Amaral recording] The victory of the AD, is, in my opinion, due basically to the fact that the AD is the only alternative capable of offering the Portuguese people a majority government capable of remaining stable for 4 years.

I further believe that a factor that weighed decisively in our favor and against our opponents was the essentially negative election campaign waged both by Socialists and Communists. It was the story of the sorcerer's apprentice all over again. The campaign of personal attacks, verbal violence and injurious slander that virtually took up all of our opponents' election broadcasts ended up by having strongly negative effects for them and beneficial ones for us, for the Portuguese people do not accept politics in those terms.

As a final reason for our victory and our opponents' defeat I would mention what, in my opinion, is the basic explanation for the Communist Party's substantial and significant losses. I think they were due to the effect of the events in Afghanistan and Poland on the PCP's traditional voters who withdrew their support after realizing that the communist program, depicted as a blueprint for liberation, turns out after all to be nothing more than a blueprint for oppression of citizens and nations alike. [end recording]

BOMB EXPLOSIONS REPORTED IN MALVEIRA, GUNFIRE IN OPORTO

HC061239 Paris AFP in English 1227 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Text] Lisbon, Oct 6 (AFP)—One person died when a bomb exploded during a bank hold up at Malveira, 30 kms north of here, police said.

At the same time two other bombs went off in the town at a police barracks and in another bank, police said, without giving any reason for the attacks.

Meanwhile eight people were reported wounded by gunfire as young supporters of the Democratic Alliance celebrating yesterday's election victory tried to take over the offices of the extreme left wing Popular Democratic Union party in Portugal's second city of Oporto in the north.

SUAREZ' 4 OCT REMARKS ON INTERNATIONAL, DOMESTIC TOPICS

[Diego Armario Report on Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez' 4 October Press conference; passages within quotation marks recorded]

[Excerpt] [Armario] In connection with international politics, Prime Minister Suarez said that the attitude of the Polisario Front in seizing Spanish fishermen in order to put pressure on the Spanish Government to recognize the Polisario Front is unacceptable.

Speaking of the Iran-Iraq crisis, he repeated our country's well-known position of neutrality.

He said that the possible or eventual entry of Spain into NATO has no fixed timetable, but will be decided by a parliamentary majority and without destablizing political life.

Referring to the important subject of Gibraltar, he said that the gate to Gibraltar will be opened only when equal rights between the citizens of Gibraltar and Spain are recognized and guaranteed.

On the subject of a possible coalition government--turning now to internal politics--Prime Minister Suarez said the following:

[Suarez] "I would recommend a coalition government if the country were ungovernable; that is, if the political party responsible for governing, clearly felt that it could not do so without collaboration or, rather, without forming a coalition government. These circumstances (?do not exist) nor are they likely in the short term. I do not think, given the numbers we have, that the formation of a coalition government will be necessary nor would it be able to respond to the problems which Spain faces."

[Armario] He completed this statement by saying that there will be no coalition government nor any possibility of a general election.

[Suarez] "(?I wish to make it quite clear) that it is the government's intention to remain until 1983. Obviously, the possibility always exists of the government exercising its power to dissolve the parliament and call a general election, but there would have to be very special circumstances before this could happen. Therefore it is the intention of the party I head, and the government which I also head, to exercise its responsibility in fulfillment of the popular mandate until 1983. Then we shall wait for the results of the election to see if we continue governing for another legislative period."

NORWAY

COASTGUARD CONSIDERING NEW SHIP OPTIONS

[Knut Falchenberg report: "Defense Request for Coastguard Helicopters in Southern Norway"]

[Excerpt] "The idea of stationing coastguard helicopters on land in southern Norway should be investigated. In our southern waters distances are smaller than in the north, and it is probable that helicopters could just as easily be stationed on land as on-board coastguard vessels," Rear Adm Gustav Steimler, marine commander, southern Norway, told AFTENPOSTEN. He thinks that new coastguard ships for use in the south could be made smaller and cheaper in the future, if they are not built to accommodate helicopters.

Steimler sent a report to the defense high command a while ago, in which he presented an account of experiences in the first 2 years of the economic zone off southern Norway. He pointed out in the report that it was possible that the extent of activities in this part of the zone had been underestimated.

"The Stoltenberg commission which looked into a new structure for the coastguard only had experience concerning northern waters to consider. Experience now shows that there can be much larger numbers of foreign fishing vessels in the Norwegian zone in the south than off northern Norway. At the same time the coastguard in the south has much more detailed and complicated regulations to uphold," Steimler told AFTENPOSTEN.

It was originably intended to build seven new coastguard vessels with helicopters on board. Hard times have meant that at present only three are being built, of the so-called North Cape class. According to present plans all three will be deployed in the north.

Rear Admiral Steimler told AFTENPOSTEN that he can see the need for three coastguard vessels to be at sea at all times in the southern waters for which he is responsible.

"The rented vessels we use today are doing a good job, but in the longer term we must have new vessels specially built for the task. However, I am not so sure that these need to be as advanced as the new North Cape class. A smaller and less expensive type of vessel would probably be of use."

"If the vessels are to have helicopters on board, then they must be made to a certain size to have room for hangars and workshops. But if instead we let the helicopters 'spend the night' on land, a simple helicopter deck with refueling capacity would be sufficient. Then the ships would not need to be so big," he said.

DAGENS NYHETER: TRENDS IN SCANDINAVIAN DEFENSE POLICIES

LD061515 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 29 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Scandinavian Security Problems"]

The Finns, more or less like us, develop defense policy doctrines as if they really were in a position to effectively defend their own territory. For this purpose they can, according to the plans, mobilize an extremely large fighting force if the worse should happen--almost as large a force as we count on in Sweden from a larger population. But Finland has much greater problems than Sweden in producing the material resources needed for defense.

The Danes have a different illusion--that everything will go well even if they have not been able to spend much on a large defense force. Within NATO they have striven for a certain independence. The little Danish defense forces have up to now more or less succeeded in meeting the minimum technical demands that NATO makes on its members, but now they cannot hold on any longer. The Danes have made it clear that they are unable to implement the 3-percent increase in their defense spending that the NATO nations agreed on 2 years ago.

The announcement has given rise to intense irritation in the Pentagon, according to what has been revealed in the United States. A new pejorative concept has been launched: Denmarkization. Modeled on the older insult "Finlandization," it reveals a disquiet that the Danish example will infect others, for example Belgium.

The Norwegians, finally, have accepted that they cannot defend Norway without significant support. Within the framework of a similar, somewhat independent position, they wish to make more effective the help from NATO in the event of a war or a in serious crisis situation.

There has been much discussion this year on the contingency stockpiling in Norway of NATO equipment for some of the West's Emergency troops. Increased Soviet naval capacity is considered to have undermined the old plans, according to which reinforcements for Norway, both men and materials, would have been able to come fairly safely by sea.

In Sweden, for example, both the Government and opposition have said that contingency stockpiling cannot be seen as some new policy in principle or as any threat to security policy stability in Scandinavia. As always in the past, Norway refuses to allow nuclear arms or foreign troops to be stationed on its territory.

As far as contingency stockpiling is concerned the Norwegian Labor government seems nevertheless to have decided on a compromise. Instead of placing the stockpiles close to a possible theater of war in the North, they are to be put in central Norway, in the region around Trondheim. The government obviously wants to bridge the gap between the nonsocialist opposition, which wants swift stockpiling in the north, and a large faction in its own party that adopts a more or less neutralist position.

However, behind the Norwegian governments behavior lie other considerations in the field of foreign policy. Norway is following the line of deploying forces far from the border with the Soviet Union in order to preserve a situation of calm in the Arctic area. This has not prevented the Soviet Union from indulging in continual criticism of the Norwegian plans for contingency stockpiling.

Finland is naturally another factor in this context. This has been shown indirectly through a fit of rage in the Norwegian conservative newspaper AFTENPOSTEN over what it considers to be Finnish interference in Norwegian security policy. Apart from the Communists, no political grouping in Finland as far as is known has made public criticism of Norway. And as far as security policy is concerned, it is probably of much greater importance for Finland how Swedish defenses and Swedish security policy are handled.

But we must presumably realize that Finns in leading positions are in their heart of hearts fairly unhappy that the military-political trends have driven Norway to adopt contingency stockpiling. The prospect of superpower materials in a Scandinavian country could trigger off unpleasant discussions on its doorsteps.

Despite its proximity to Murmansk, the Soviet Union's most important strategic base, the Scandinavian region has always been an extremely calm area of the world. Since the decisive Scandinavian decisions were made in the years after the end of World War II and the different nations chose their different security policy directions, there has, for a very long time, hardly been an international discussion at all of Scandinavian conditions. We will have to get accustomed to the idea that that time is now past.

The NATO side, in order to justify increased efforts, may start talking about an otherwise falling defense capacity both in the NATO states of Norway and Denmark and in nonaligned Sweden. The East on the other hand sees every new move as rearmement that calls for countermeasures. No matter what happens, trends in defense costs will mean problems in maintaining a balance that has worked well up to now. Characteristically enough, the Danish defense minister is trying to make the best of the situation by interpreting Denmarkization as a positive concept for an endeavor to promote detente and to halt the arms race. Even though all consider themselves to be short of money, the Scandinavian nations' possibilities of making positive contributions to these praiseworthy aims are, however still widely different.

This is why we speak of a Scandinavian pattern--and not of a Scandinavian model.

SVENSKA DAGBLADET DISCUSSES FOREIGN SUBMARINE INTRUSION

LD061047 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 30 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "In the Sea of Peace..."]

[Text] No one must think that Sweden, if we so desire or we were forced to such action, would not have been able to render harmless (read: sink) the submarine which for several days now has been operating deep within Swedish territorial waters.

The reason why the submarine, no matter what its nationality, has been able--and has dared--to behave with such audacity is of course that it has judged it relatively safe to continue its mission, despite the fact that the Swedish navy, after contacts with the submarine at positions 30-70 meters below the surface on 18, 23, 26, 27 and 28 September, dropped depth charges of varying strengths.

Sweden has followed with pedantic exactness the regulations for expelling submarines, which Sven Andersson former defense minister, (Social Democratic Party) drew up and which were reconfirmed in 1978 by the present defense minister, Erik Kronmark (Moderate Coalition Party).

In the situation that has now arisen, with unparalleled violations on repeated occasions very close to the Swedish coast and to sensitive naval and other defense installations, these regulations could seem all tooineffective. They undoubtedly give the foreign submarine a time advantage to maneuver in such a way that missions with Swedish territorial waters can be continued,

On the other hand, what are the alternatives in peacetime? Who would carry the responsibility, if something went wrong, for the 50-60 human lives that could be lost?

The unique thing about the present submarine affair--which is without parallel since the end of World War II in 1945--is partly that the foreign submarine, despite certainly knowing that it had been discovered, stayed in our waters for such a long time, and partly that it penetrated so deep into Swedish territorial waters.

While the boundary of Swedish territorial waters is 12 nautical miles from the coast, the majority of the depth charges had to be dropped around 4 nautical miles from the coast.

It is also important to remember that the navy's contacts with the submarine have taken place so far inside Swedish waters that there can be no doubt at all that the foreign submarine must have pursued some specific purpose by its presence.

But what purpose?

Of course, no one knows anything about this for sure. Perhaps the intention was to to test our defense readiness. Perhaps the mission was one of reconnaisance against Swedish military installations or maneuvers. Perhaps the mission was to gain better knowledge of Swedish waters.

The country which sent the submarine to our waters must, however, realize that it is not the lack of capability that has kept Sweden from adopting other, more drastic measures.

This knowledge--when our patience is being tried to breaking point--ought to lead to greater caution. Over there somewhere.

DAGENS NYHETER: NO REASON TO DESTROY INTRUDING SUBMARINE

LD061057 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 30 Sept 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Hunting a Submarine"]

[Text] Understandably, national leaders and defense chiefs think that the submarine affair of the last few days has become somewhat worrisome.

The account that we are being given indicated that we are here dealing with a foreign submarine--or several submarines?--which is not behaving in the usual way. That is to say: between World War II and the present submarines that have violated Swedish territorial waters have disappeared quite quickly after discovery. In the present case it is thought that contact has been made with a foreign submarine on five occasions in less than 2 weeks in more or less the same area.

The method of preventing foreign submarines from violating Swedish territorial waters follows a fixed set of instructions which, in a simplified for, speak of: 1--warning shots; 2--depth charges at a warning distance; and 3--shooting to kill. This third and final step obviously involves the risk of sinking the submarine.

It seems to be the case that the third step has never been taken in the whole period since the war, nor has it happened this time. Perhaps shooting to kill has never been necessary. The government and defense staff have always also retained the right to make the decision on such a significant step.

Defense Minister Erik Kroemark is now talking of a "quite unparalleled provocation" and saying that the intrusion has taken place with "definite political intent." The case is the most serious in the entire postwar period, he says. The decision has now obviously been taken that the instructions will be implemented in full for the first time if the submarine is found and refuses to react to gentler warnings. In other words, the Swedish defense forces are ready to shoot-to-kill with the risk of sinking a foreign submarine.

This does not sound possible. If it is true that the rest of the world realizes that we are fully within our rights to overpower a foreign submarine that has violated our territorial waters, surely we do not have to prove it, the important thing is surely to discover the submarine. A submarine that has already been discovered and which is lying on the sea bed is hardly doing much damage to Sweden's security simply by lying there.

Shooting to kill in peacetime does notmake us more secure in war.

KIPRIANOU RECEIVES NEW COLOMBIAN ENVOY, COMMENTS ON ISSUES

NC031726 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] President Kiprianou has stated that this is the time for any quarter outside Cyprus to exercise its influence in the right direction within the UN framework to achieve progress in the Cyprus issue.

While receiving the credentials of new Colombian ambassador Cesar Castro Perdomo, Mr Kiprianou said the Greek Cypriot side has gone to the negotiating table with all goodwill and with the aim of achieving progress. The president added that, since the talks are in progress, it would be detrimental to make any forecast of their outcome. We went on: On our part, we look forward to a fully independent state, absolutely free, with its sovereignty and territorial integrity fully guaranteed and safeguarded. Mr Kiprianou said: We are working on the basis of a biregional federation and we believe that, by implementing the principles of federation, we can safeguard a unitary state and, at the same time, all the prerequisites for a united people. President Kiprianou said further that it is through unity that the Cypriot people, regardless of national origin, will prosper and have a happier future. He went on: We would like an independent Cyprus which could follow its nonaligned policy without foreign troops or intervention. Mr Kiprianou also said that Colombia has been a consistent supporter of a just Cyprus solution in accordance with the UN resolutions, and expressed his gratitude for this fact.

Presenting his credentials, Dr Castro Perdomo expressed the wish that peace may prevail in Cyprus and that the island will remain a democratic, sovereign and free state. He said: My country is attached to the principle that victory by the use of arms does not ensure rights for territorial annexation. My country is also attached to the principle of noninterference and the need for a new world order that would safeguard a better distribution of political and economic power.

MIKHAILIDHIS OBJECTS TO REPORTS ON TALKS WITH RALLIS

[Text] The president of the House of Representatives, Mikhailidhis, in a statement tonight stressed that the reports on the exchanges during the recent meeting of the Cypriot parliamentary delegation with the Greek prime minister, Rallis, are unacceptable and harmful. Mr Mikhailidhis added: Beyond this, these reports give an innacurate and faulty picture of the talks that were held, because they isolate and simplify certain viewpoints that were exchanged in a more general context. Only when considered within the entirety of the general context could these viewpoints be assessed correctly.

Mr Mikhailidhis also expressed his deep gratitude to Mr Rallis for receiving the Cypriot parliamentary delegation for a lengthy discussion and for the strong and genuine interest that he showed for our cause as well as for the assurance of Greece's steady and substantive support for our struggle.

MINISTER AVEROF WELCOMES GENERAL JONES, LAUDS U.S. TIES

AT061640 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1600 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Text] U.S. Air Force General Jones, chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, arrived in Athens at noon today on a 2-day official visit as the guest of General Gratsios, chief of the National Defense General Staff.

Shortly after his arrival, General Jones laid a wreath at the tomb of the unknown warrior. Later he visited General Gratsios at his office for a short meeting. The visit returns an earlier visit by General Gratsios to the United States.

At 1400 hours National Defense Minister Averof received General Jones and decorated him with the Supreme Order of Merit on behalf of the President of the Republic Karamanlis. Addressing General Jones during the decoration ceremony, Averof said, among other things, that the decoration symbolizes the close ties existing between our two countries. "These ties cannot be overshadowed by certain difficulties which have arisen recently," he said.

"We have fought together," he continued, "during two world wars. You came from the other side of the Atlantic. We are isolated here and yet we fought to the end. I would also like to add something which was not given its proper significance.

"We are a country whose people have no relation to other peoples, like the Slavs, the Arabs and others. It happens that we only have blood ties with the United States and with Australia. In the United States there are about three million Greeks and in Australia more than 800,000. In other words, significant percentages which represent more than one third the population of Greece. All these people are excellent citizens of your countries.

"Such ties cannot be ignored as we cannot ignore ties created by joint struggles for liberty and by your assistance at moments of great crisis. These ties particularly help understanding between us under conditions like those of today which, we must admit, have created unpleasant problems between us."

General Jones expressed thanks for the great honor and said he has ties of affection with Greece. "This is not the first time I come here," he said, "I came here 20 years ago. I am particularly glad because today I have the opportunity to be in your country once again officially. I have very good friends in Greece and very good Greek friends in America. This great honor you do me," General Jones concluded, "symbolizes the friendship between the armed forces of our two countries and of our peoples."

A conference followed covering questions of mutual interest. General Jones was then briefed on Greek defense problems.

RADIO REPORTS ON MITSOTAKIS-TURKMEN MEETING

AT061310 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis is due to leave New York today for Brussels and then for Luxembourg where he will attend the EEC foreign ministers conference tomorrow.

Yesterday, Mitsotakis met Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen in New York. The two ministers examined matters of a direct interest to Greece and Turkey during a lengthy meeting.

A joint statement issued after the meeting expressed the firm resolve of their two governments to settle problems between their two countries through basic dialogue in order to contribute toward peace, stability and cooperation in the area of Greece and Turkey.

It was also stated that within this framework Mitsotakis and Turkmen agreed that the secretaries general of the Greek and Turkish Foreign Ministries will continue their talks, covering all aspects of bipartite issues, in a more intensive manner.

Mitsotakis and Turkmen stressed that the two sides must contribute toward creation of a positive atmosphere which will contribute to a settlement of all issues. They also agreed to meet once again in December in Brussels. The new meeting of the secretaries general of the two Foreign Ministries will take place in Athens on 3 and 4 December, prior to the foreign ministers meeting.

After the joint statement was read, the two foreign ministers replied to press questions. Answering a question, Mitsotakis stressed he is firmly optimistic. Answering a question on whether the Cyprus issue was discussed during his meeting with Mitsotakis, Turkmen replied in the affirmative, stressing that Turkey considers resumption of intercommunal talks as a pleasant step forward, which he supports.

I VRADHINI SCORES U.S. POLICY ON NATO ISSUE

AT031608 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 3 Oct 80 pp 1, 12

[From the "Evening" column: "After the Furor...."]

[Text] Can the statement of State Department Spokesman Jack Cannon end the furor that has been created for all these days in connection with the U.S. position on the issue of Greece's return to the Atlantic alliance's unitary military structure? Undoubtedly Cannon's position is reassuring, but we are afraid that both the fact that it was rather late and the events which preceded it do not allow it to fully dispel impressions which, in any case, have harmed Greek-U.S. relations.

The Greek position on this issue, which the foreign minister put forth in his talks with U.S. officials, is not new. As has been reported, Washington had known since June that the Greek Government had no intention of waiting indefinitely and that time limits for confrontation on this significant issue were narrowing. It also has known equally well that Athens links the settlement of this issue with the signing of a new Greek-U.S. agreement on defense cooperation—which would settle the issue of the U.S. bases in Greece. The only new element that emerged over the last few days in New York was that, through interviews, statements and his talks, Mitsotakis publicized and clarified this position.

Consequently, what has been the reason for the present U.S. reaction which has aggravated the atmosphere of Greek-U.S. relations, beginning with the skepticism of responsible officials and those who are not responsible and of authoritative U.S. newspapers (on whether the Greek Government will indeed implement the policy it puts forth), and ending with statements about the current government's "inability" and—more seriously—the threatening statements by anonymous U.S. officials from the State Department and Pentagon to the morning newspaper TO VIMA? What has been the sense of presenting alleged differences within the ranks of the Greek Government? What has been the purpose of publishing during these days correspondents' reports in U.S. newspapers which take note of a dispute between Prime Minister T. Rallis and National Defense Minister E. Averof?

Coincidence should not even be discussed. Exploration of Athens' determination through a "trial balloon" test, perhaps. A "war of nerves," also perhaps. An operation to overcome Greek courage, possibly.

In any case, the thought that motivated these U.S. reactions--and it was possible to have forseen that these reactions would be interpreted by various sides as efforts to exert pressure on Athens and intervention in our internal affairs--was most unfortunate. And we do not believe that the U.S. Embassy in Athens did not know that, on this issue, the government is firm, and that there are no differences of view concerning the handling of the issue among the basic government personalities. Should we add that both the prime minister and the national defense minister have primary responsibility and roles in this matter?

If any differences of view exist among U.S. officials in evaluating Greek reactions, this is an issue that primarily concerns Washington. In any case, "anonymity" does not create an alibi and, with all good intentions, it is impossible to accept that--as Cannon claimed--"statement attributed to anonymous U.S. officials should not be considered an indication of U.S. policy."

In recent years we have heard many times from many parts of the alliance that the United States certainly considers Greece's return to be an issue of great significance for the Atlantic alliance and the security of the eastern Mediterranean. But, in practice, the value of this assurance has been proven only rhetorically so far. Already the limits are being exhausted. In the coming months, if the alliance wants, it can persuade Ankara that Greece's return also serves Ankara's interests--for us the issue is not a Greek-Turkish one. General Rogers can promote a solution--satisfactory to the Greek viewpoint--well before our elections in 1981. If the contrary happens, the Greek Government will have no option but to withdraw its application for return and not enter into an agreement on the U.S. bases....everything else is insidiously motivated....

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who is in New York to attend the UN General Assembly sessions, has met UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim. A report by the Turkish Radio and TV Administration [TRT] says Turkmen expressed his government's complete support for the intercommunal talks in Cyprus. Turkmen also briefed the UN secretary general on his talks with Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis. The international situation and the war between Iran and Iraq were also discussed during the meeting.

GREECE'S MITSOTAKIS: AEGEAN MOST IMPORTANT ISSUE WITH TURKEY

TA032106 Ankara Domestic Service in Trukish 2000 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] Greek Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis has said that the Aegean issue is the most important problem between Turkey and Greece, and to solve it the two sides must act with patience and understanding. Replying to questions put to him by a TRT correspondent in New York, Mitsotakis said the speedy solution of problems between Turkey and Greece would be to the benefit of both countries. He said Greece's most important issue was returning to NATO.

FORMER DEFENSE MINISTER ISIK EVALUATES MITSOTAKIS' VIEWS

NC030902 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 2 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Ankara (special)--Former National Defense Minister Hasan Esat Isik made this statement in reply to a question: "How do you evaluate Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis' disclosures in New York regarding the Aegean?" "The disclosures of the Greek foreign minister in New York regarding the Aegean issue were not very gracious. Greece has made the defense cooperation agreement with the United States and the U.S. bases in Greece absolutely conditional on its return to the military flank of NATO. Earlier, the press had reported that if Greece did not return to the military flank of NATO within 3 months, it would withdraw its request for reintegration.

"In diplomatic life such words are characterized as pressure and even as a threat. I do not know how the other members of NATO will react to this. But surely, Turkey cannot be talked into showing new acts of goodwill in the face of such behavior. I remember, when De Gaulle came to power in 1956, how he reacted to the words of a British delegate at a meeting--which sounded like a threat--by saying: "France cannot negotiate under a threat, not even under conditions which could create suspicion of a threat." Having said this, De Gaulle walked out of the meeting. It is hard to believe that Turkey could act differently. A military administration could be even more sensitive, and that is how it should be. This is traditional in Turkey.

"It seems that Turkey, confronted by this arrogant attitude of Greece, will have to insist on the extension of its rights and responsibilities as far as the middle of the Aegean; that is, to the status which prevailed until 1964."

COURT CANCELS LAW ON PRIVILEGES FOR FORMER LEGISLATORS

TA031528 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0900 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] The Constitutional Court has canceled the law stipulating that former parliamentarians should benefit from the rights granted to members of the Turkish Grand National Assembly. The court said the law is unconstitutional. The law, which has been canceled, stipulated that former parliamentarians and constituent assembly members benefit from rights granted to parliamentarians in the fields of health, medical treatment, transportation, communications and the issuance of passports.

Former President Fahri Koruturk had requested that the Constitutional Court abolish the law on the grounds that it is contradictory to the clause in paragraph Z of Article 12 of the Constitution which states that no person, family, group or class is entitled to privileges. The Constitutional Court accepted the reasoning behind the request and unanimously canceled the law. The decision on the abolition of the law was today published in the Official Gazette.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL RATIFIES FOUR DEATH SENTENCES

[Text] The National Security Council has ratified the death sentences passed on Isa Armagan, Mustafa Pehlivanoglu, Necdet Adali and Kemal Ergin. Bills concerning these sentences were discussed and finalized in the meeting held by the Council yesterday and went into effect after they were published in today's Official Gazette.

Armagan and Pehlivanoglu are accused of killing five persons in two coffee houses in the Balgat District of Ankara in August 1978. Adali and Ergin are accused of killing two persons in a coffee house in Ankara's Ismetpasa quarter in July 1977. The death sentences passed by the 1st Military Court of the Ankara Martial Law Command were approved by the Military Court of Appeals and finalized.

Moreover, independent Mardin Deputy Nurettin Yilmaz and independent Ankara Deputy Cengiz Esref, as well as Senator for life from the National Unity Group Ahmet Yildiz are also among those detained without any legal justification.

The Turkish democratic forces are calling for the release of the members of the RPP, NSP and independent members of parliament. The world's progressive people are each day making similar appeals.

VOTCP CARRIES JOINT STATEMENT BY TCP, KKE

TA051021 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0700 GMT 5 Oct 80

[Joint Statement by the Turkish Communist Party and the Communist Party of Greece—4 October 1980]

[Text] A Turkish Communist Party delegation led by Central Committee Secretary General Comrade Bilen met at the beginning of October with a Communist Party of Greece [KKE] delegation headed by Central Committee Secretary General Comrade Charilaos Florakis. The meeting between the delegations of the two parties took place at a time when international relations were experiencing a grave and tense period and when global peace was being seriously threatened, particularly in the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East regions in which the two countries are situated and in which the two parties are influential.

The TCP and the KKE vehemently condemn the coup by the militarists, which completely destroyed the parliamentary system, which eliminated political, syndical and democratic rights and liberties and which trampled upon human rights. The flagrant military dictatorship in Turkey is completely directed against the working class, the toilers, the progressive and anti-imperialist forces as well as class unionism. The pro-American junta in Turkey is engaged in mass arrests against all these forces, using barbaric tortures on them.

Moreover, this coup represents a deviation from the detente process and a general change in favor of cold war in line with U.S. imperialism. The imperialists are planning to use the military administration in Turkey as a means to facilitate the implementation of NATOite solutions particularly to the problems between Turkey and Greece and the Cyprus issue. They are aided in their efforts by the NATOite stand of the Greek Government.

The TCP briefed the KKE on its policies based on the joint resistance of all the democratic forces which favor independence, as comrades-in-arms in the struggle against the pro-American junta, and informed it of the first encouraging news on the resistance by the Turkish people.

The KKE expressed its militant solidarity with the valiant fighters of the TCP, Turkish Democrats and patriots, who are struggling against the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie under increasingly difficult conditions, as well as against the system of tyranny and in favor of democracy, independence and communal progress. A widespread and active movement of solidarity with the Turkish people is taking root among the Greek working class and all the Greek people under the mottos of: Do not forget your own junta and the common enemy is imperialism.

Efforts by the United States and NATO for the return of Greece to NATO's military wing and the renewal and expansion of the status of foreign bases in Greece in an agreement between Greece and the United States--as was the case in Turkey--are creating greater threats to our region. The open aim of imperialism is to use the two countries as a tool within the framework of their adventurist strategies in the eastern Mediterranean, which is a sensitive and critical region. The Turkish and Greek peoples are opposing the dangerous imperialist plans, which not only undermine peace and the positions gained by the progressive movement, but also threaten the fate of their two countries.

The TCP and the KKE condemn the dangerous arms race incited by imperialism, in which the ruling classes of both countries participate. This arms race adversely influences the economies of both countries, dragging the toilers to destruction. This race is beneficial only to foreign monopolies manufacturing arms and the strategic aims of imperialism. Several times NATO arms have been turned against the workers and the democratic forces of the countries in which they are stored.

Both parties support the solution of differences between the two countries without the use of force or threats to use force, within the framework of the Helsinki Final Act, international laws and practices, and based on mutual respect for the national independence and territorial integrity and benefit of both countries, without any imperialist interference or supervision.

The TCP and the KKE support all efforts being waged by the Cypriot people--the Turkish and Greek Cypriots--for the peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem within the framework of UN resolutions for the establishment of a genuinely independent, sovereign, democratic and territorially integral Cyprus based on the withdrawal of Turkish and all other foreign troops and on the elimination of all war bases on the island.

Such a solution can only be reached without the dangerous mediation of NATO, with the convening of an international conference under UN auspices and the promotion of a substantial dialogue between the two communities.

Both parties note with concern the serious deterioration of the situation in the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East. The aggressive U.S. strategy, the intensification of U.S. war supplies and U.S. threats to resort to force of arms has transformed this region into a permanent source of international tension and a serious threat to world peace. Recently, the United States has been making systematic efforts to reestablish a reactionary front of pro-imperialist governments in the region, and particularly to undermine the countries with an anti-imperialist trend--as was the case in Iran.

Within this framework, and by supporting the chauvinist and expansionist trends, the United States is making efforts to divert certain countries from their anti-imperialist struggle policies, to divide and antagonize the nonaligned countries. Under the circumstances, it is imperative to heighten the common struggle of the anti-imperialist and peace-loving forces in the region for peace and security against imperialist aggressions and provocations.

Both parties express their deep anxiety over the military clashes between Iran and Iraq, which represent a serious threat to global peace. They oppose every effort to settle differences between the two countries by force of arms or by seizure of foreign lands. They support all direct efforts to seek a peaceful and political solution to differences between Iran and Iraq.

In conclusion, taking into consideration the current circumstances in which the imperialist aggressions against detente are escalating and the arms race is reaching threatening proportions, the TCP and the KKE stress the importance of intensifying the struggle for peace, detente and the limitation of arms. They ratify and support the resolutions favoring peace and disarmament passed by the meeting of European communist parties in Paris, by the Warsaw Pact member countries and, more recently, by the Forum of World Peace Forces in Sofia. Both parties, which are linked by the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, call on the Turkish and Greek working class as well as the peoples of both countries and the peace-loving forces to be vigilant and to wage a common struggle for detente and peace.

No new nuclear missiles should be deployed in Western Europe! Let the imperialist bases in our country be removed! Let Turkey and Greece withdraw from NATO! Let the Mediterranean become a sea of peace and freedom of peoples.

Both parties, which are aware of the critical situation in the world and the region, will coordinate their struggles in the future as well, and will fight to strengthen the policies of international solidarity and collaboration between the two peoples, against imperialism and for national independence, democracy, communal progress and peace. [dated] 4 October 1980.

EC'S JENKINS COMMENTS ON DELAYS IN ADMITTING SPAIN TO EEC

LD071349 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 4 Oct 80 pp 1, 33

[Pablo Sebastian report on EC Commission President Roy Jenkins 3 October Madrid press conference: "Jenkins Admits Spain Will Not Join EEC in 1983"]

[Excerpt] European Commission President Roy Jenkins admitted in Madrid yesterday that Spain will not join the EEC in 1983 in accordance with the timetable envisaged by Prime Minister Suarez' third government. The British politician, who "justified" this delay by reference to the agricultural and budgetary difficulties being experienced by the EEC, added during the press conference with which he closed his official visit to Madrid that key topics in EEC-Spanish negotiations such as fishing and agriculture cannot be discussed during the restructuring of EEC policies in 1981.

The EC commission president, adopting a courteous and conciliatory tone, publicly admitted that there are major obstacles hindering faster progress in the process of Spain's and Portugal's EEC membership.

"We hope that the delay will not extend much beyond 1983," Jenkins said, expressing a favorable attitude to Spain's hope that it will be possible to negotiate peripheral points (the main negotiations will center on agriculture), but adding that this latter aspect and other vital ones, such as fishing, will have to wait.

The British Laborite, who lamented the fact that his party's congress in Blackpool had approved a motion calling for Britain's withdrawal from the EEC, said that in his opinion Spain should be informed of the restructuring of the EEC to be carried out in 1981, though Jenkins is to leave his post as EC commission president at the end of this year, amid uncertainty regarding the immediate future timetable for Spain's and Portugal's EEC membership applications. The British politician admitted in Madrid that the political events that have damaged EEC cohesion in recent months--the reform of EEC agricultural policy and the revision of national contributions to the EEC budget--directly affect the timetable for extending the EEC to embrace the Iberian peninsula. "We will do our utmost to ensure that the delay does not extend too far beyond 1983," Jenkins said, showing courtesy to the government in Madrid, where the date for completing the negotiations has already been set back to "1984, as long as there are no last-minute problems," as EEC Minister Eduardo Pinset himself commented.

Before his conversation with reporters, Roy Jenkins made a statement in which, apart from indicating that he was received by the king and that he talked with Prime Minister Suarez and several members of his cabinet, he again emphasized the complicated and difficult nature of the EEC membership process. The commission president spoke of the need for the Spanish economy to adapt itself to the EEC economy--which is also Minister Punset's concern--and said that Spain and the EEC "must find solutions to their problems in the light of and within the framework of the expansion, so that membership will be a process of integration without traumas."

He also stressed that "we all have domestic problems to resolve," adding that "nevertheless we must not be discouraged by the amount of time that this complex but vital process inevitably involves."

Jenkins also stated that for the time being a broad area of negotiation can be advanced, although at another juncture he specified that major issues such as fishing and agriculture could not be negotiated until the EEC had completed its internal reforms.

PAKISTAN'S ZIAUL HAQ ARRIVES IN VIENNA

[Text] Pakistan's head of state, Gen Mohammad Ziaul Haq, arrived for a private visit in Vienna last night. According to information from the Pakistani Embassy, he wants to undergo a medical checkup in Vienna. On this occasion the Pakistani head of state will pay a courtesy visit to Federal President Kirchschlaeger today and will also meet Federal Chancellor Kreisky.

Remarks on Iran-Iraq War

AU071404 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Edgar Sterbenz report on his interview with General Ziaul Haq, president of Pakistan, in Vienna on 6 October 1980--Ziaul Haq's recorded answers in English within quotation marks]

[Text] At the outset of the talks Ziaul Haq stressed the private nature of his visit to Austria. He has come here after his mediation mission in the theater of war in the Persian Gulf to enjoy the peace and tranquillity of Vienna for 2 days. He will pay a courtesy visit to Federal President Kirchschlaeger, the Pakistani president stated, and will also meet Federal Chancellor Kreisky to discuss topical political problems of mutual interest. There was no fixed list of topics for these talks, he said. Ziaul Haq let it be known that the war in the Persian Gulf would certainly be discussed, a conflict in which he, supported by Islamic awareness of his mission, has tried to mediate thus far without any visible success. He had briefed U.S. President Carter and British Prime Minister Thatcher in the past few days about the state of his efforts. Both encouraged him, stressing the view that it is first and foremost the Arab countries of the crisis area that are in a position to exert a moderating influence on the two belligerent parties.

What must now be done in the first place, in Ziaul Haq's view, to make possible a settlement of the conflict between Iraq and Iran? "I think those who are involved in trying to bring peace should continue in this, and those who are watching should continue to sit out and watch."

This invitation was unmistakably addressed to the superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, to remain onlookers in the Iraqi-Iranian conflict. Ziaul Haq supplemented this with another appeal to Moscow and Washington: "So far they are not interfering, and my advice to both of them is to keep out. Inaction on their part is the best action in this game so far in my opinion."

The Pakistani president was unwilling to disclose details as to where, in his opinion, the big efforts must be made for a concrete solution of the conflict, as well as details about his mission in Tehran and Baghdad. However, Ziaul Haq voiced his surprise at the ability of both Iraq and Iran to continue their military conflict for 2 weeks now. He does not believe in an early end of the hostilities: "It seems that both have the potential to fight for that long, and they will continue to do so until their stamina is exhausted."

To the question of who could be a peacemaker if Iraq and Iran should agree on a mediation procedure, the Pakistani president replied that, speaking on his own behalf: "Any organization that can bring world peace should be welcome. At the present moment the Islamic conference is doing something." Currently the Islamic conference, supported by the United Nations, is undertaking some efforts to bring about a settlement between the two countries. We will continue our efforts and help anyone who wants peace. I myself am doing my best to bring about a better understanding between the two parties and to bring about a peaceful solution, Ziaul Haq stated.

Remarks on Atomic Energy, Politics

BK080839 Karachi Overseas Service in Urdu 0800 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] President Mohammad Ziaul Haq has said that Pakistan's international prestige is now much higher than before. He was addressing Pakistani residents in Vienna last night.

The president said that the economy of the country has stabilized, work on enriching uranium continues and the popular representatives elected last year have started work at the village and tahsil level. He said that 42 Islamic countries gave the honor to Pakistan of representing 900 million Muslims at the UN General Assembly.

Referring to the political situation in the country, the president said that democratic organizations have been set up at tahsil and union council level, and the local bodies are functioning satisfactorily. He said that restoration of democratic practices at a higher level is also being considered.

President Mohammad Ziaul Haq said that we want to acquire atomic energy for peaceful purposes and are engaged in finding ways to enrich uranium. The president said: Who is going to help us if we fail in achieving this objective? He said that France had agreed to provide a reprocessing plant to Pakistan, but canceled that agreement under pressure. The president said that is why we should produce fuel for nuclear reactors ourselves, and we are fully justified in doing so. He said that there are highly competent scientists in Pakistan who are fully capable of carrying out their responsibilities.

ILLNESS FORCES ARMENIAN PATRIARCH TO CANCEL VISIT TO VIENNA

AU071512 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 7 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Armenian Patriarch Katholikos Vasken I has canceled his visit to Vienna, planned for the end of this week, because of an illness. This was announced by the [Austrian] presidential office. A solemn event with Cardinal Koenig, organized by the "Pro Oriente" Foundation, for the guest was to be the culmination of Vasken's visit in Vienna on 14 October. Meetings of the patriarch with the federal president, the foreign and public education ministers also were envisaged.

AUSTRIAN-SOVIET GAS AGREEMENT REACHED; PRICE INCREASES

AU071902 Vienna KURIER in German 7 Oct 80 p 6

VIENNA HEROIN ARRESTS NET TURKISH DEALERS

AU071919 Vienna KURIER in German 7 Oct 80 p 15

[Martin Wimmer report: "Vienna: First Drug Agents Success; successful premiere of new 'covert' search method in drug cases; criminal police foil heroin deal in Vienna park; 200 grams of heroin seized, 2 Turks arrested"]

[Excerpt] Forty-year old (Muzaffe Karayel) of Vienna-Favoriten has been detained for possessing 200 grams of pure heroin having an overall black-market value of one-half million schillings. (One gram is sufficient for some 20 "shots").

During interrogation (Karayel) disclosed that he had obtained the drug from the Turk (Mugrisch Terzi), 35, of Wiener Neustadt. (Terzi) was arrested 2 days later at his girl friend's apartment.

Through (Terzi), criminal police finally got on the track of 40-year old (Fayik Simsek), who has been in hiding for months and who is deeply involved in the drug traffic in the Neunkirchen area.

BRIEFS

HASHISH DISCOVERY--Drug investigators discovered 11 kklograms of hashish welded into the frame of a white Mercedes 200 automobile that had been parked at various places in upper Austria's Mondsee region in the past few weeks. The car was placed under observation and 26-year old Josef Leitner of Abtsdorf and 24-year-old Josef Steyrer were arrested when they attempted to enter the vehicle. A search of their apartments revealed cash and savings booklets representing some 1.7 million schillings. When the car was searched by specialists, another 12 kilograms of hashish and 10 kilograms of hashish oil--presumably for transit to the FRG--were discovered in the fuel tank. SCHMIDT SAYS GOVERNMENT WILL 'HOLD ITS COURSE'

LD071500 Hamburg DPA in German 1308 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Bonn, 7 Oct (DPA)--Two days after the federal election the SPD, in joint consultations of the party executive, the party council and the control commission in Bonn today, is looking ahead. Party Chairman Willy Brandt said at the meeting in the Bundeshaus that it was already time to direct efforts toward the forthcoming land diet elections.

Speaking before the party council, which is the SPD's highest body between party congresses, Chancellor Schmidt summarized the new government statement in the following words: "We want to bring our state in its policy vis-a-vis other states and peoples progressively forward in a predictable way via the path of getting along with one another and signing accords. The latter also applies to arms limitation for the stabilization of the military balance. At home we shall continue along our path of social peace. This means reforms for mastering the tasks of the future in a responsible manner compatible with the capacity of our state with regard to financial policy."

The chancellor said that in its foreign, German and security policy the Federal Government would "hold its course." This was in accordance with the expectations of "and the relief expressed by foreign governments in the West and the East, by the neutrals and by the Third World."

SPD, FDP TO START COALITION NEGOTIATIONS 27 OCTOBER

[Text] Bonn, 7 Oct (DPA)--The SPD and FDP will start serious negotiations on the continuation of the Bonn government coalition for the next period of legislation of the newly elected Bundestag on 27 October. This was stated by the two parties in Bonn today at the end of the first coalition talks on principles, which was attended by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and representatives of the two parties.

Before the newly elected Bundestag meets the SPD and the FDP party chairmen, Willy Brandt and Genscher, will pay a visit to Federal President Karl Carstens to propose Schmidt for reelection as chancellor. The statement contains in six points known positions of principles of the two parties.

GENSCHER EXPRESSES SATISFACTION WITH CURRENT MINISTRIES

DW071256 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1915 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Excerpt] [Question] You have said that you do not want any additional ministerial posts, that you do not want any additional state secretaries. Yet I recall that complaints came from the Free Democrats occasionally in the past about the representation of the government policy by the press and information office. Do you see any need to change anything there?

[Answer] To begin with it is necessary to say that the distribution of governmental responsibility follows an internal logic. We are represented in the foreign policy and security fields, and the two government parties likewise have responsibility in the economic and financial sectors. The same holds true for the internal sphere in the broadest sense of the word, and this prevents a party from feeling excluded from the decisionmaking process. We have been well satisfied in the past with the representation we had in the ministries. Thus there is no call to change anything in that respect. What matters is how ministries are managed and how this is expressed in policies. Everything else, questions of how the press office will be composed, are not matters which form a component part of establishing a government.

[Question] Voices can be heard from the SPD now to the effect that extra difficulties are anticipated in the coalition. You yourself have said that you plan to enforce a large measure of liberal policy. How might new, additional frictions arise?

[Answer] I do not feel that the problems exist primarily between the government parties or within the parties. If you look at the financial problems we have to solve, they also exist between the departments. The other thing is the question of how these two parties want to act in the future in the Bundestag, whether they want to repeat the mistakes that have been made during the last legislative period with regard to changing majorities, such as taking them into consideration in connection with the codetermination problem. That will be a very important problem when it comes to the government parties' future ability to act, because the strength of a government coalition to make decisions must stand the test of making difficult decisions jointly, without this or that person seeking the allegedly comfortable way out by looking for support from the opposition.

[Question] Do you think that the SPD is in better shape now, after the election result, than it was at the end of the last legislative period?

[Answer] I do not consider this so much a matter concerning the shape a party is in, instead I consider it a matter which pertains to the leadership of the coalition parties and their willingness to stress their preparedness to cooperate politically with the intention of achieving a joint decision.

[Question] You have been asked whether your coalition agreement is an agreement for the next 4 years. Will it be valid for the next 4 years?

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] You consider the election result a confirmation of the three-party system. Do you rule it out completely that a new discussion may take place now in the ranks of the union with regard to changing the present general party setup?

[Answer] I think that is a question the union parties must answer themselves.

SPOKESMAN DEPLORES ISRAELI CRITICISM OF SCHMIDT, GENSCHER

LD071726 Hamburg DPA in German 1621 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 7 Oct (DPA)--Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling has described criticism of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher by Israeli newspapers as "not really understandable." Boelling, who spoke of polemical articles, said that they do not reflect the Federal Government's view that "relations between the two governments and peoples are still as good as ever." The chancellor has spoken on many occasions of his commitment to German-Jewish reconciliation.

The government spokesman underlined that it is unfair that doubt should be cast on the chancellor's totally [word indistinct] attitude towards Israel, apparently merely because the chancellor has not suppressed his concern about the Israeli settlement policy and the Jerusalem law and has pointed out that these steps could be detrimental to the search for a peaceful and a lasting settlement of the Middle East conflict.

In his statement Boelling stressed: "The federal chancellor and federal foreign minister have constantly put forward the case for a comprehensive peace settlement and have on many occasions reaffirmed the principle of balance which determines the Federal Government's Middle East policy." Boelling said that it is "wide of the mark and insulting" to accuse a man like Genscher of not being sufficiently conscious of the special relations between the Germans and Israelis.

DIE WELT SPECULATES ON PERSONNEL RESHUFFLE IN NEW CABINET

OW071225 Bonn DIE WELT in German 7 Oct 80 p 2

[Gottfried Capell article: "Schmidt's New Cabinet Will Be the Old One (With One Exception)"]

[Text] Bonn--Time schedules permitting, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt plans to carry out the formation of his government with a minimum of noise. This means that unless some coals that flared up in the election campaign keep on glowing, there will only be one new minister, who will have to take charge of the Research Ministry.

All other members of the new cabinet have been members of the old cabinet. There is no talk about Herbert Ehrenberg or Antje Huber being replaced. Nor is there any mention that Kurt Gscheidle, who is no longer a member of the Bundestag, must be replaced. In Gscheidle's case, however, Schmidt made a commitment that he would divide up the mammoth Ministry of Postal Affairs and Transport. The incumbent minister will retain the Postal Ministry, while the incumbent minister for research and technology, Volker Hauff, is to become the new transport minister. Granted, Hauff has been a bit reluctant so far, yet government quarters are positive that he will agree in the end. Hauff, just 40 years old, probably visualized a somewhat speedier continuation of his career, which has rapidly risen anyway. But it is a typically characteristic feature of Schmidt's personnel policy to use such a young man in various posts before any classical political departments are open to him.

Thus it is Hauff's former ministry which will need to receive a new head. The declared favorite choice for that post is Andreas von Buelow, parliamentary state secretary in the Federal Defense Ministry. In addition to Von Buelow, the Bundestag deputies are mentioned who have gradually but expertly carved a career for themselves in the Bundestag group: Wuppertal Prosecutor Wilfried Penner and Deputy Hugo Brandt (Grolsheim).

Since Von Buelow is a great favorite for a ministeral post, one of the aforementioned two people could succeed him in his office as parliamentary state secretary at Hardthoehe. But this is still completely undecided for the time being because both of them have not yet made any showing as defense experts.

In any event, personnel decisions which are now necessary will soon reach the level of the state secretaries. The point which is probably most important for the federal chancellor, but which need not be clarified immediately, is the successor to Klaus Boelling as chief of the Press and Information Office. Helmut Schmidt has known for quite some time that after 6 and 1/2 years of service Boelling wants to have another less difficult job. And Boelling himself would prefer to have the office of the permanent Federal Government representative in East Berlin. But that position is blocked as long as no adequate position is found for the present holder of the office, Guenter Gaus. So a solution of that problem seems to be possible only in the future because ambassadorial posts at the rank of state secretaries are rare.

Ruediger von Wechmar is supposed to go to Rome at some point, but it is unlikely that he will do so during his 1-year tenure as UN General Assembly president. Foreign Ministry State Secretary Guenther van Well is almost certain to succeed him in New York.

But if Klaus Boelling quits--he is determined to work as government spokesman for only a few more months--Juergen Kellermeier will be the first choice, the chief editor of Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network. It has been learned, however, that Armin Gruenewald, Boelling's deputy, also intends to change his job.

Speculation is very inaccurate in this respect. Without a statement from Gruenewald yet, names are being discussed in the FDP. One of them is Josef Gerwald, the FDP spokesman of Hans-Dietrich Genscher and his close aide. So far, however, it has been said that Gerwald wanted to return to the microphone of Deutschlandfunk. It has been added that the government needs an economic expert such as Gruenewald as a second spokesman. In this connection there has been consideration of Dieter Vogel, the spokesman of the Ministry of Economics, but he is considered to be a clear follower of Graf Lambsdorff. Bonn insiders, therefore, prefer not to believe the piquant internal FDP story that Vogel will travel on Genscher's ticket to the press office, so to speak. With regard to that problem at least the FDP is open to all sides, something it stated once prior to 1969.

COMMENTATOR CITES FACTORS CONTRIBUTING TO ELECTION RESULTS

[Fritz Ulrich Fack editorial: "The Bourgeois Camps"]

[Text] The outcome of the Bundestag elections at first glance seems to confirm what many have assumed for a long time: The chances for a change in Bonn have continued to decrease after 11 years of an SPD/FDP leadership, the bourgeois camp is shrinking and each time it is more difficult for the opposition to at least defend its position. But when the SPD represented the opposition, it advanced upward step by step in every election.

That argumentation is supported by the outcome of 11 Landtag elections since the last Bundestag election. The Union parties habe lost an average of 2.5 percent, the SPD gained some 2 percent, the FDP results were different, but it lost 1.2 percent as a whole. Is the bourgeois camp really continuously shrinking?

It would certainly be wrong to speak of a secular process. As historical reminder in this connection is that in 1972 the Union parties dropped to 44.9 percent. but 4 years later they were able to improve the result to 48.6 percent. The "comrade trend" proved to be unreliable the closer it got to the critical 50 percent limit, That is not surprising.

With regards to the outcome of these elections, the bourgeois camp remains split--that is its actual dilemma--but as a whole it has not emerged from them weakened. The SPD was only able to advance a few millimeters. The large gains of the FDP signal that some of the Union voters became stuck in the predicted bind. They would have voted for their party had Strauss not been the candidate for chancellor. First it looked as if they would solve their dilemma by not going to the polls, but large portions of this group later decided to split their votes to the advantage of the FDP.

Helmut Schmidt also contributed to the extraordinary election success of the FDP. Strauss, with his uncharged high rejection quota among the populace (more than 50 percent), found it difficult from the very beginning to win over the undecided voters of his camp. He did not improve that chance in the election campaign. Schmidt, however, did not only enter the battle with a great sympathy lead, but also with great expectations by his followers and adversaries that he would emerge the winner.

Many signs during the summer indicated that the SPD would score a first-class election result. Then the miracle happened: In an election campaign that was widely without arguments but filled with petty quarrelling, unfairness and personal slander, Schmidt succeeded in continuing to curtail the motivation of his own party--which prefers to campaign for itself with arguments.

Two weeks before the elections the opinion poll experts were surprised--more Union followers planned to go to the polls despite their reservations vis-a-vis Strauss than SPD followers. The SPD followers proved to be listless and disgusted by the election campaign. The undecided followers of the Union, however, went to the elections, voting with their second vote for the small bourgeois brother despite his Socialist election relatives.

The CDU voters that drifted to the FDP could have easily been lost to the SPD--as has frequently happened in landtag elections. About 25 percent of the FDP followers toy all the time with the idea of voting SPD. Schmidt wanted to pull these voters over to his side, but he failed completely. The contrary took place: The SPD lost more second votes to the FDP than did the CDU. Those who saw Schmidt on television on Thursday will not be surprised by that.

So the FDP kept a large part of those potential voters whose opinion changed and scored a great victory. The FDP in its happiness about the victory will certainly not ignore the fact that it was scored almost entirely because of the described special situation in the two other parties. The FDP has not gotten hold of a cast iron inheritance.

Acting together with Strauss was for the Union a costly but unavoidable experiment--some 4 years are lost. The situation the coalition finds itself in with regard to politics and the economy will not be particularly positive for months. And in the end Helmut Schmidt gave away more sympathies than he gained, yet the Union has lost more precentage points on the average than in the last 11 landtag elections. The difference is at the expense of Strauss, and he knows it.

Naturally the outcome could have been even worse for the Union it is had lost its position as the strongest Bundestag party. It would probably have been difficult for every other candidate to bring about an upsurge for the Union or even score an absolute majority. Since the greens are swindling away (and migrating toward the FDP) that chance has become small. But all that is only small comfort for the disappointed Union parties. They have both fought with great engagement--that should be seen and appreciated in Munich.

The bourgeois camp is not shrinking, but it is split into two parties, with one of them firmly striving for a coalition with the Socialists, and that is occurring now after these elections even more than before. Better results can hardly be expected for it. In addition, there is the leftist trend within its inner structure. So the end of the elections produced the not at all stunning realization that no change of power can be expected in Bonn within the foreseeable future, regardless of how strong the bourgeois camp may be or become as a whole.

JORDANIAN CROWN PRINCE HASAN MEETS WITH GISCARD D'ESTAING

NC071733 Paris AFP in English 1725 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 7 Oct (AFP)--Crown Prince Hasan of Jordan met here today with French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and passed on a message from his brother King Husayn on the Iran-Iraq fighting. Mr. Giscard d'Estaing showed "total understanding" of Jordan's position in the conflict, the prince said after their one-hour meeting.

Jordan has pledged support for Baghdad in the conflict, but the prince refused comment on whether Jordanian troops might aid Iraqi forces. He said only that Iraq's position was "strong" at the moment. Prince Hasan is on a private visit to Paris.

LE FIGARO ANALYZES NEW FRENCH MILITARY BUDGET

LD070855 Paris LE FIGARO in French 4-5 Oct 80 p 6

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Military Budget: Increase of France's Nuclear Strength"]

[Text] As if nothing had happened, Yvon Bourges presented the defense budget at the very moment when news broke of his replacement as defense minister by Joel le Theule. A fine example of continuity in state action....

But this continuity is more necessary in defense matters than in any other. The planning law currently being implemented covers 5 years and each budget is a stage in its enactment. The 1981 budget must therefore be assessed from the viewpoint of past and future years and, since it will have been Yvon Bourges' last task, it provides a chance to appreciate his entire work.

Expenditures on defense, excluding pension payments, will total 104.44 trillion [presumably old] francs. This means an increase of 17.8 percent, considerably more than the total state budget increase, which will be only about 13 percent. Thus we see the implementation of one of the principles of the planning law, which envisaged a regular increase in the proportion of the GDP devoted to defense. It was 3.67 percent in 1979, 3.76 percent in 1980 and will be 3.85 percent next year.

But what is even more significant in this budget is the increased percentage spending on the functioning of the armed forces (which in administrative terms is called item III) and equipment (item V). The former will rise to 56.76 trillion [old] francs, which represents a 16 percent increase. But this accounts for only 54.3 percent of the military budget. Indeed, expenditures on equipment will increase in program authorizations to 64.39 trillion [old] francs (up 22.64 percent) and in credits to 47.68 trillion (up 19.68 percent).

Thus steady progress is being made toward a better balance between the two halves of the budget, which were equal in 1968-69. The considerable improvement in salaries and in military living conditions have increased the proportional size of item III since 1974. But this year there will be a sounder distribution of credits, which will in fact be one the best in the world this year.

One-third of the expenditures on equipment are still allocated to nuclear strength. In fact this represents 0.77 percent of France's domestic product, which suffices to show how ridiculous it is to believe that the development of a deterrent force is outside France's reach. But expenditures on equipment are increasing much faster than other forms of military spending, and more justifiably than other areas of state expenditure; the 1981 budget again reflects the priority given to nuclear strength.

Multiple Warheads

We know where the effort made in the area has gone: The construction of the 16th missile-launching submarine, the installation of the megation S3 missile at the Albion Plateaur, the development of the M4 missile which is to be used to equip all the nuclear submarines, and initial work on the mobile strategic ballistic missile, the commencement of which the president of the republic announced in June.

But more interesting than this is the direction of the research into the future of the deterrent forces. Two main directions can be discerned in the budget. One concerns the development of multiple warheads, which are carried by the new generations of missiles in all countries; the other concerns the third generation of nuclear missile-launching submarines. It is a matter of defining a new kind of weapons capable of new silent performance at great depths. But it is also a matter of discovering whether the goal will be more or fewer submarines, following the chosen formula and in relation to each submarine's payload of missiles. Researches envisage installing not 16 missiles on each submarine, as is the case now, but 40. An effort is also being made to increase the number of nuclear warheads per missile--no longer 7, but many more, perhaps even 20.

On leaving the Defense Ministry Mr Bourges can undoubtedly conclude that he has presided over a considerable growth in France's nuclear [presumably misprint for "military"] strength, inasmuch as this can be measured mainly by its nuclear strength. When asked about the changes that have sometimes been made to French defense policy thanks to Giscard d'Estaing's personal ideas, he answered that Giscard was indignant at the thought that he had to stay in government so long--under General de Gaulle and Mr Pompidou--while in disagreement over such an important issue. Mr Bourges deduced from this that the defense policy should remain essentially unchanged: Events proved him right.

Back in Hand

When he came to the Defense Ministry early in 1975 the situation in the armed forces seemed very difficult and we were witnessing the proliferation of "soldiers' committees" in all the services. An end has been put to this. But the real disorder at that time was not at the grassroots but rather in the command, not in the barracks but in states of mind. The weak, hesitant and contradictory statements being made by the upper echelons of the hierarchy were prompting an outright credibility crisis in France's very strategy. Mr Bourges' Saint-Avord speech, Mr Barre's at the Mailly Camp in June 1976 and General Mery's March 1977 lecture at the National Defense Institute for Higher Studies put an end to this. France's strategic doctrine stood firm--especially regarding the use of tactical nuclear weapons, an integral part of the deterrent strategy, and regarding the rejection of any battle involving the use of nuclear weapons on both sides. The president of the republic gave his endorsement to this reaffirmation of national strategy.

In fact Giscard d'Estaing now has the feeling that he has investigated the data of defense issues more thoroughly than anyone else. He himself directed the research into conflict scenarios, refusing not without reason to be limited to a single one. He himself makes the important decisions affecting weapons systems. Perhaps in the long term Mr Bourges' role would have diminished: Be that as it may, Joel le Theule, whose years of responsibilities in the National Assembly's Defense Commission have well prepared him for his new post, will know that the motive force behind the strategy whose means he will have to muster and administer, is none other than Mr Giscard d'Estaing himself.

LE MONDE REVIEWS DEVELOPMENT PLAN FOR 1981-1985

LD031543 Paris LE MONDE in French 3 Oct 80 pp 1, 37

[Francois Simon report: "The Report on the Eighth Plan Provides for Investments Amounting to Fr100 Billion in Technologies of the Future"]

[Text] On 2 October Mr Raymond Barre presented a report to the press on the eighth plan 1981-1985 as adopted by the cabinet on Wednesday. At the president's request, research was added to it and given the highest priorities.

A considerable effort is also envisaged in support of competitive industries and technologies of the future in which Fr100 billion is to be invested.

The report will be studied by the economic and social council before the government submits it to parliament as a bill during the fall session.

It will cause no surprise that the report on the eighth plan confirms a diagnosis made in July 1979 when it was necessary to determine the main options of a French economy which was more dependent than ever on the international situation. In its analysis of the world economy, the report explains that even though, as a result of the first "oil crisis", the price of a barrel of oil increased from $3 to $10, the second "crisis" was responsible for an increase in the price of a barrel of oil from $16 to $32. France's oil bill, which amounted to Fr51 billion in 1978, will exceed Fr110 billion in 1980.

Rue de Martignac experts believe that it will be impossible to do anything unless the analysis is based on the few principles which govern the country's future: First, France must ensure its demographic renewal since the time is approaching when the number of births will be exceeded by the number of deaths; second, it must develop its scientific and technological potential; third, it must ensure its independence in the energy sphere; and, fourth, it must at last become a society open to social innovation.

The strategy determined by the eighth plan is known. It is the strategy of "balanced growth for employment," the external balance being the cornerstone of this strategy. And this balance can be achieved only if industrial and agricultural enterprises in France are competitive on the one hand and if a change in France's consumption habits makes it possible to save energy on the other.

To achieve these objectives the state must invest more and help to develop investments (as we know, the finance bill for 1981 provides for tax advantages for the entire duration of the plan). It will also have to stabilize the amount of obligatory deductions (taxes and social security) and reduce the public expenditure deficit, the consequence of this being that the growth of purchasing power will be restricted during the implementation of the eighth plan.

Seven Priorities

With a view to implementing this strategy, the report refers not to six but to the following seven priorities, research completing the list of the main options determined in July 1979.

First, bringing French research up to the level of the most advanced countries. This highest of priorities has been added at the president's request and placed at the top of the list.

This means that by the end of the eighth plan the share of research expenditure is to increase from the present 1.8 percent to 2.15 percent of the gross domestic product.

Second, reducing our dependence on energy and raw materials. This indispensable effort presupposes significant changes in behavior inasmuch as energy savings are supposed to considerably reduce expenditure. By 1990, the proportion of oil in energy consumption is intended to drop from 56 percent in 1979 to 30 percent. It is also envisaged that the production of new energy resources will quadruple.

Third, developing competitive industry and technologies of the future. It is a question of developing anything likely to promote techniques of the future both in the textile industry, for instance, and in computer telecommunications [telematique]. It will be up to the state to create an environment favorable to the development of enterprises, especially through a reduction in taxes. But also by means of investing Fr 100 billion in telecommunications, the computer industry, microelectronics, electronic office equipment [bureautique], space research, the aircraft industry, maritime industries and biotechnology. At the same time, France intends to create 200,000 new jobs in these sectors.

Fourth, developing agricultural and food potential. The government's objective is to make French agriculture increasingly competitive by gradually reducing production costs. The revolution which could take place in France in the eighties could be analogous to the revolution which occurred in France in the Sixties in connection with green Europe. This time, however, it would be a question of recognizing the limitations of the agricultural Common Market and turning toward the world market--entering a market whose borders will no longer be those of the Europe of the Nine. Acceleration of the reallocation of agricultural land (2.3 million hectares will be reallocated, compared with 1.7 hectares during the seventh plan) and intensified training are among the measures advocated.

Fifth, taking specific action to provide employment even though the eighth plan's entire strategy is supposed to promote employment. The government believes more strongly than ever that "a steady development of the production apparatus is the best way to improve the employment situation." This does not rule out taking specific action. The report advocates the development of professional training with respect to which the government is about to devise a 5-year program. Another measure concerns part-time work in whose favor the cabinet has already adopted two bills.

Sixth, consolidating the French people's social security. France must achieve fuller control over the growth of social benefits.

Seventh, improving housing and the environment. An effort must be made to solve the problem of unsanitary dwellings but also to revive urban centers and old districts (that should affect more than 100,000 houses) and to restore large suburban districts (this program concerns 200,000 houses). With regard to this seventh priority the objectives are also to restore the quality of the rivers, improve safety at sea, recycle waste and so forth.

While the seventh plan included 25 priority action programs the eighth has only 12 which, in general, are a continuation of the priorities listed above. The programs are as follows: 1) to bring French research up to the level of research in the most advanced countries; 2) to reduce independence [as published] in the energy and raw materials spheres; 3) making life easier for large families; 4) improving professional training to boost employment; 5) developing competitive industries through the technology of the future; 6) improving exploitation of agricultural and food-production potential; 7) the priorities of social protection (prevention and services for old people); 8) economical administration of the natural heritage; 9) improving living conditions in some suburban districts and downtown districts of old cities; 10) opening up access to regions which are still isolated (Britanny, Massif Central and the Grand Sud-Ouest); 11) speeding up the economic development of overseas territories and departments; 12) increasing the French presence in the world (efforts to spread cultural and technical influence).

These action programs are defined in terms of quantitative objectives and not in financial terms. Indeed the government has abided by its principle of not fixing a rate of economic growth.

At the cabinet meeting on 1 October the president of the republic expressed the hope that parliament might, "at the specified time and within the specified period," examine the bill which will be drawn from the report after the economic and social council has given its view. The cabinet communique leaves no doubt about the government's intention of having the bill debated and a vote taken during the fall session. This places both majority and opposition deputies with their backs to the wall since everybody is aware that approval of the eighth plan will mean approval of the economic and social policy being followed by the prime minister and the head of state.

L'HUMANITE COMMENTS ON UPCOMING COMMUNIST PARTIES' MEETING

LD071343 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 3 Oct 80 p 8

[Unattributed report: "Forthcoming Communist Meetings in Brussels and Berlin"]

[Text] The front pages of several dailies like LE MONDE and LE MATIN have been making a great deal of fuss over the past few days about a very surprising piece of news: "A world communist parties' conference"is going to be held during October.

This is nothing to worry about and only deserves to be pointed out in order to stress once again that the news media have no hesitation in publishing garbage. The so-called "experts" on the international communist movement like Mrs Lily Marcou certainly do not win respect by contributing to these reports.

The facts are simpler.

On 8 and 9 October the PCF is going to take part in a meeting of capitalist Europe's communist parties in Brussels on the crisis, European integration and workers' and democratic struggles. The idea for such a meeting was suggested to our Belgian comrade Louis van Geyt several months ago by Georges Marchais. This meeting should provide an opportunity for a useful exchange of views on the record of the imperalist crisis in the various West European countries and the battles being waged by the communist parties with a view to providing an alternative to the crisis.

Also during October there is to be a meeting in the GDR capital among representatives of communist parties and national liberation movements on "the common struggle of the workers' movement and the national liberation movement against imperialism and for social progress," which will forcefully raise the question of establishing a new international system.

The PCF has helped prepare this meeting together with the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, which is the host party.

These two meetings provide an opportunity for an informal exchange of views and experiences without any preparatory or final documents being submitted.

We welcome the fact that, following the Paris meeting, new progress has been made in implementing new forms of cooperation for which we have constantly striven.

International conferences aimed at drawing up a policy or strategy decidedly remain the Socialist International's prerogative!

FORLANI 'TAKES ANOTHER STEP' TOWARD FORMING GOVERNMENT

LD072254 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Text] Today Prime Minister Designate Forlani was able to take another step forward toward the formation of a majority and consequently of a new government. This morning, Forlani completed his meetings with the political parties and then declared: Now I have the necessary data to proceed toward a more organic draft of the program and then to examine the possibilities which exist for bringing together the parties for a common government undertaking. Tomorrow, Forlani will reexamine all the data acquired during his consultations yesterday and today and will prepare a report which will be discussed by the Christian Democratic Directorate on 9 October. Already this evening, Forlani held another meeting with the Christian Democratic delegation.

TWO SOCIALIST PARTIES ISSUE JOINT DECLARATION

[Excerpts] Rome, 8 Oct (ANSA)--The on-again-off-again love affair between Italy's Socialist (PSI) and Social Democrat (PSDI) parties was "on" again today now that the two groupings have gotten together on a joint approach to national politics and a new Rome government. The twice-united parties, which became separate groupings when the PSDI split from its socialist mother party after the Second World War and decided to remain so after an unsuccessful reconciliation in the nineteen sixties, came out Tuesday with an eight-point "declaration of intent" laying down the terms of their latest rapprochement.

The document started out by stressing what the two deemed to be "the necessity and importance of consulting with each other on major foreign policy and domestic issues in a frank, friendly and consistent manner, with the aim of jointly working out solutions for those problems." But to avoid rash speculation about a possible merger, the PSI and PSDI were explicit about saying that their desire to work closer together did not cancel out the reasons for their separate party organizations, their "political and organizational autonomy" from one another. The PSI-PSDI agreement will hopefully be extended to "all (Italian) forces which share a joint leftist, socialist, libertarian and democratic" approach to politics, the document said.

The document made reference to "a necessity to reconcile Christian and Socialist values" and the need to promote "the autonomous and unitary development" of the Italian labor movement which, according to the PSI and PSDI, should have a say in economic and social policy-making. It also urged "better understanding and communication" between all democratic forces in Italy, "especially among those which have deep roots and extensive representation in the world of labor."

The reference to the Italian Communist Party (PCI) was made more explicity further down in the document when the PSI and PSDI agreed to [word indistinct] the PCI on in its "process of revision and international autonomy" for the sake of entire Italian left's future. The Socialist and Social Democrat Parties indicated that there was a "possibility" of "experimenting with and perhaps even developing joint political and administrative policies" with their Communist rivals in "parliament, in labor organizations and in local government offices." The tough differences dividing them from the PCI today were cited as "not the least of the causes...(the nation's) ungovernability."

With respect to the ruling Christian Democrat Party (DC), the PSI-PSDI document stated in part: "(They asserted their) determination to resume cooperation founded upon and guaranteed by a groundwork of trust and equal dignity with the recognition of their respective roles and the principle of rotation. The two parties consider institutional renovation and reform to be necessary for this crisis-ridden country in need of governability and stability....

FELIPE GONZALEZ MEETS WITH PREMIER ON AUTONOMY ISSUES

LD071101 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 2 Oct 80 pp 1, 11

[Sebastian Garcia report: "Optimistic Expectations Over Andalusian Autonomy"]

[Excerpts] A Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] delegation headed by Felipe Gonzalez and a Union of the Democratic Center Party [UCD] delegation headed by Adolfo Suarez met yesterday for 3 hours at the Moncloa Palace. Following the meeting Felipe Gonzalez gave a news conference, and it can be deduced from his remarks there that, though no specific agreements were reached, there are optimistic expectations regarding the autonomy issue as a whole and Andalusia in particular.

No solution was reached on the Andalusian issue, but Felipe Gonzalez did explain that his party does not particularly insist that another referendum be held in Almeria. Another problem remains to be resolved, namely this province's incorporation into the autonomous community, "which," he added, "must be resolved by the Andalusian administration." He avoided stating whether this implies the establishment of the autonomous community through Article 151, with Almeria able to join later.

The PSOE secretary general told reporters that, as suggested in the letter sent to him by Prime Minister Suarez, they had discussed all the issues concerning autonomy raised during the parliamentary debate, including those of Galicia, Andalusia, Catalonia and the Basque country. With regard to Galicia, Felipe Gonzalez merely expressed his party's satisfaction with the agreement reached, and commented that progress has been made beyond the stage when people were talking about psychological errors. It is acknowledged that there might be drafting errors, but these will now be corrected.

With regard to Andalusia, no agreement was reached, but there are still reasonable expectations of achieving it by involving the Andalusian administration in the dialog as the Andalusian people's representative--a move which the Socialist leader hopes will yield a positive result.

PCE'S CARRILLO ON PARTY'S FORTUNES, CURRENT ISSUES

LD071315 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 3 Oct 80 p 7

[Unattributed report: "PCE Has Lost Members, Not Militants"]

[Excerpt] Madrid, 2 October--PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo told representatives of various news media at a meeting today that it is excessive to speak of a crisis in the PCE.

In this connection he added that what exists in his party are different viewpoints and debates, and acknowledged that there are different shades of opinion with respect to "Eurocommunism," since within the PCE there is one sector which is concerned that the party's homogeneity should be achieved with the least possible break and another which advocates the reverse.

Enlarging on this topic, the Communist leader also said that one sector of his party is suffering frustration because in the anti-Franco struggle the PCE was dominant within the opposition, whereas now it has ceased to be so from the electoral viewpoint.

He acknowledged: "We have lost members, it is true: not so much militants as members, and this is because we have not been able to organize a sufficiently strong party apparatus." However, he also said that "we have demonstrated to this country that we know how to practice politics," and, moreover, that "we will not relinquish something which is the party's wealth--the militants of the heroic era."

With respect to his rumored ill health, he asserted that "I have the same faculties as 4 years ago, and I am not unwell," but the problem is that "in this country it is necessary to improvise charismas, and handsome leaders have been chosen." He continued by asserting humorously that "I have no intention of depriving the party of my collaboration."

"I Have No Heirs Apparent"

[Question] And what about the succession in the party?

The reply was emphatic:

"The PCE is not an hereditary monarchy, and when I depart the PCE will decide. I have no heirs apparent and never will have any."

He also said that there are no tensions with the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia and that the latter has supported the Catalonian Communists in their election campaigns and with respect to the SAU [City where agreement on Catalonian autonomy statute was negotiated] draft law.

And with respect to current political issues--the meeting between [Prime Minister] Suarez and [Spanish Socialist Workers Party Secretary General] Felipe Gonzalez, heading their delegations, and the problems concerning autonomy--Carrillo believes that the Moncloa Palace conversation was positive, and said several times that both the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] and the Union of the Democratic Center had telephoned him to inform him about what was discussed at the Moncloa Palace yesterday afternoon.

Later, Santiago Carrillo--who at one point in the conversation asserted that the municipal pact with the Socialists "is not going badly" overall, "bearing in mind the level of friction at the trade union level"--stated that one of the current problems of Spanish politics "is that we do not really know what kind of game the PSOE is playing."

He also said that in the latest crisis he had asserted that Suarez was behaving like a head of state, and that the natural thing would have been for him to surrender his powers to the king, even though the king would have charged him later with the formation of a new government.

"I am not in favor of the king becoming involved in short-term political problems," he then stated, "because he is not the president of a republic." "If he becomes involved in this kind of short-term problem and makes mistakes, the institution--that is, the balance of powers--suffers."

Coming Western Communist Summit

In addition, according to PCE sources, representatives of the West European Communist parties will meet in Brussels 8-9 October to debate the topic of "the crisis in European integration and the struggles of the workers and the democratic forces." Together with Communists from Denmark, the FRG, Belgrium, France and Italy, Carlos Alonso Zaldivar and Julio Segura will certainly attend on behalf of the PCE.

SOVIET OFFICIAL RENEWS SUPPORT FOR CONFERENCE ON CYPRUS

[Excerpt] An official statement was issued [today] on the work of the seminar on European security being held in Nicosia. The statement said, among other things, that the reduction of international tension will help achieve a just solution to the Cyprus problem and will constitute an important contribution to normalizing the political climate in the Mediterranean and throughout Europe.

During a press conference, in which the statement was read, a member of the Soviet delegation, RSFSR First Deputy Minister of Culture Zaytsev, reiterated his country's support for an international conference on the Cyprus issue.

TURKISH CYPRIOT GROUP RETURNS FROM TASHKENT CONFERENCE

NC080740 Nicosia HALKIN SESI in Turkish 1 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Nicosia--Dentist Rauf Unsal, chairman of the Trusts (vakiflar) and Religious Affairs Council, and Sait Erkin, TFSC's roving ambassador to Islamic countries, who attended the ceremony held in Tashkent, capital of Uzbekistan, on the occasion of the 1400th anniversary of Hejira have returned to Cyprus. Dentist Rauf Unsal and Sait Erkin have had useful contacts with the delegates of various countries which participated in the conference organized by Muslims living in the Soviet Union. They also visited Samarkand, Bukhara, Andijan and Baku.

Dentist Rauf Unsal and Sait Erkin, who were specially invited to attend this conference held on the 1400th anniversary of Hejira, have stated on their return to the island that such meetings were fairly useful for increasing cooperation with Muslims living in the Soviet Union and in other countries.

WORLD ISLAMIC LEAGUE EXPRESSES SUPPORT FOR TURKISH CYPRIOTS

TA031542 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] The World Islamic League has called on all Islamic countries and organizations to cooperate with the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community and exert every effort to break the economic embargo imposed on the Turkish Cypriot community for years.

The Cyprus problem was discussed during the league's meeting in [name indistinct] yesterday and a resolution on the Cyprus issue was adopted after [words indistinct] to the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus and President Rauf Denktas. The resolution stated that the World Islamic League supports an independent, bicommunal and bizonal federal state based on the principles of equality, security and peace for the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community. The resolution called on all Islamic countries and organizations to support the struggle of the Muslim Turkish community in Cyprus and assist the Turkish Cypriot community in reviving its economy and social services, which have suffered great damage due to the economic embargo imposed by the Greek Cypriot side.

The resolution requests that financial aid extended for the construction and restoration of schools and mosques in a bid to promote Islam among the Turkish Cypriot community be continued. The resolution also calls on Islamic commercial organizations, businessmen and chambers of commerce and industry to break the economic embargo and establish close commercial cooperation with the Turkish Cypriot community in order to assist the community's economic development.

The World Islamic League resolution also condemns the decision by the Universal Postal Union not to recognize the stamps of the federated state and asks Islamic countries not to comply with this decision.

GREEK CYPRIOTS FAIL TO DIVERT FRG SHIP TO LARNACA

TA061239 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Text] Greek Cypriot authorities have failed in their attempt to force a West German registered cargo ship (Melton) Clipper bound for Famagusta to go to Larnaca. According to the TURKISH NEWS AGENCY [TNA] the ship, which was carrying goods to Famagusta from Belgium, Holland and Britain, was intercepted off Cape Greco by a Greek Cypriot patrol boat. But the captain of the German vessel refused to go to Larnaca, saying that he received orders only from his shipping company and the West German Government. Arriving at Famagusta, the captain said he would raise the matter with the West German Embassy in Cyprus.

Action Denounced as 'Piracy'

TA071920 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Text] The Minister of Communications and Works, Mr Gurcag, has described the interception of a West German cargo ship bound for Famagusta by a Greek Cypriot patrol boat as an act of piracy. The German vessel, (Melton) Clipper, was intercepted off Cape Greco by the patrol boat which failed in its attempt to force the cargo ship to go to Larnaca. Announcing that a protest was lodged with the International Maritime Consultative Organization, IMCO, Mr Gurcag said he believed that the matter would be taken up by this organization as soon as possible to prevent the repetition of similar incidents. The German ship, which later arrived at Famagusta, was carrying goods from Britain, Holland and Belgium.

O AGON REPORTS HARDENED TURKISH STANCE AT INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

[Text] Authoritative circles in Nicosia stated that there has been no progress so far in the intercommunal talks. The same circles said that, although at the first meeting the Turkish Cypriot side showed some flexibility, it later hardened its stand, obviously following instructions from Ankara.

The same circles stated that, although there was some optimism over the question of Famagusta, during the second meeting when the question of taking practical measures to restore confidence between the two communities was discussed, the Turks submitted unacceptable proposals that actually aimed at recognizing their pseudostate.

Specifically, they asked, among other things, for lifting the so-called "economic and political embargo" and recognizing the occupied ports and the illegal Tymbou airfield.

Concerning the constitutional question, the Turkish Cypriot side confined itself to submitting general constitutional principles, in violation of the opening agreement providing for the submission of complete constitutional proposals.

The territorial question will be discussed at next Wednesday's meeting, but there are no indications that the Turks will make any substantive concessions.

Diplomatic circles are skeptical about the course of the dialogue and have stressed that things will be fully clarified during the next four meetings, during which the views of the two sides on the various questions will be discussed in detail.

MESIMVRINI REPORTS IMPROVEMENT OF 'CLIMATE' WITH TURKEY

AT061340 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 6 Oct 80 p 1

[Excerpts] There was no discussion of the NATO issue in New York yesterday during the meeting of the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers. According to authoritative reports, the two sides simply expressed the hope the issue will soon be resolved.

The two ministers (Mitsotakis and Turkmen) on the contrary discussed all unresolved Greek-Turkish issues "in their essence" as it was characteristically stressed. Although there are no results from the dialogue (at a time when nobody expected any such results), well-informed sources stressed last night that "one could say this meeting was positive, like the previous meeting in Ankara last June. It was an additional step in the direction of improving the climate."

Shortly before Mitsotakis' departure for Brussels and Luxembourg last night, the same circles concluded that "insistence on the Greek position that there can be no separation between the question of U.S. bases and Greece's return to NATO, was even further understood by the State Department during the last few days."

This understanding is characteristically confirmed by yesterday's Washington POST editorial which, referring to the controversial base issue, stressed: "This is not a simple threat (that the Americans will be deprived of the use of their bases.) This is something which could very well happen."

The improvement of the climate can also be seen through the joint statement issued after the Mitsotakis-Turkmen meeting.

At the same time it was also reported that: There was no new meeting in New York with Secretary of State Muskie nor was any effort made by either side toward such a meeting. Air Force General D. Jones, chief of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, will not discuss Greece's return to NATO. It was stressed that "his visit to Athens is simply in return for a visit by General Gratsios in 1978."

TO VIMA: MEETING SHOWS TURKISH CAUTION TOWARD SOLUTIONS

AT071515 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 7 Oct 80 p 6

[Report by TO VIMA New York Correspondent St. Evstathiadhis: "The Turks Are Basically Indifferent to a Solution of Bipartite Issues."]

[Excerpts] New York, 6 October--Greek and Turkish Foreign Ministers Mitsotakis and Turkmen met in New York Sunday and the general conclusion from their 3-hour meeting is that Greek-Turkish relations are always at an impasse and that problems between the two countries were not advanced toward a resolution.

Greece's return to NATO was, however, nearly the exclusive issue dealt with by the two ministers during their 45-minute private meeting before a general discussion in the presence of officials from their two ministries.

The Greek foreign minister briefed his Turkish colleague on relevant Greek views and explained Greek positions on the question of area defense and the Western alliance but there was absolutely no response from the Turkish side.

Although Turkmen requested sufficient supplementary explanations and avoided being specific on the Turkish position on the issue--at least to the degree that Turkish diplomats recently also rejected in advance any deviation from Turkish position--the private discussion proved that nothing of importance should be expected on the issue from Turkey, at least for the immediate future.

The private discussion between Mitsotakis and Turkmen, the discussion of the Cyprus issue--which was also limited and short--and the entire conference strengthened the impression shared by many that, primarily for domestic reasons, Turkey is not at this moment interested in promoting any issue toward a solution. Turkmen was at ease and appeared well briefed on issues which are of direct or indirect interest to the two countries. His contribution, however, stopped there. He did not even want to indicate that there could be some initiative or even some response on behalf of Ankara and he did not even enter into any basic discussion.

In this way the meeting between the two foreign ministers in New York was an introductory meeting for Mitsotakis and Turkmen. It was a reconnaissance of the ground and it was an exhaustive discussion of the questions of the continental shelf and control of Aegean airspace--issues which for years have been handled by the directors general of the two foreign ministries and which, most certainly, cannot be advanced unless there is a prior general agreement on the Aegean and on Greece's return to NATO. The Greek side, in any case, did not expect anything more because it had the above-mentioned facts in mind.

The communique issued after the meeting stressed the warm climate under which the discussions were held. This was expected. The existence of such a climate is, perhaps, the only important thing to emerge from Sunday's ministerial meeting. The existence and preservation of this climate was, later, considered by the two ministers to be a basic factor and achievement.

PAPANDREOU ASSERTS RALLIS 'NOT BLUFFING' ON U.S. BASES ISSUE

[Text] "It is obvious Rallis is not bluffing" in warning the United States that U.S. bases will be removed from Greek territory if the uncertainty over NATO is not resolved. This is the impression of A. Papandreou, leader of the majority opposition party--which he also emphatically expressed to political editors--after yesterday's meeting with the prime minister.

In all probability, this conclusion must also be related to the new declaration by Papandreou--after his meeting with the prime minister yesterday--that the entire opposition and the entire Greek nation are on the government's side in its efforts to deal with foreign blackmailing acts on the issues of NATO and the bases. A secondary conclusion after yesterday's meeting is that for the first time Papandreou admitted that Greek total withdrawal from NATO "could create certain specific problems for us"--obviously referring to a defense gap to be created in the Aegean and to cessation of U.S. defense aid. He then added, "We are passing through difficult moments. We are in a dead end."

The meeting of the two leaders lasted for approximately 45 minutes and, according to Papandreou's description, "it may have been short but it was sincere, direct on the subject and the briefing was in all-round depth."

The chairman of PASOK, who received political editors immediately after the meeting, observed he has no right to mention what Rallis told him, but added he considers it his duty to inform public opinion on the positions he personally upheld and which are the following:

He asked Rallis to inform the Chamber of Deputies on latest developments in the NATO and bases issues. Papandreou concluded that the prime minister has no objection to this and it was his impression that the relevant debate will be held soon.

He expressed the view that there are no further margins for additional negotiations on the return to NATO and that any continuation of this tug-of-war can only create problems and dangers. In light of this, PASOK believes the government must withdraw its request for returning to NATO.

Divergence of PASOK-"New Democracy" Opinion

At this point the chairman of PASOK analyzed to the representatives of the press the divergence of opinion between "New Democracy" and PASOK over the NATO issue. It is natural, he said that there is a deep disagreement between the two parties. "New Democracy" on the one hand has placed return as its goal and continues to negotiate over conditions for such a return so that, in its own opinion, the country's sovereign rights are not affected. For PASOK, the position was and remains that we must withdraw from the Atlantic alliance and there is no question of conditions.

He underlined that the conditions under which the foreigners propose or demand our return are unacceptable to any Greek parliamentary government. Papandreou added; "Unfortunately PASOK's forecasts have been historically proved right because the entire policy for our return, as pursued by the governments of the last 6 years, was implemented without firmness in the original declarations which accompanied the decision for our withdrawal from the military wing of the alliance.

He admitted that withdrawal from NATO could create certain specific problems for us but he believed that the people will be able to cope with them successfully. "We are passing through difficult moments," Papandreou concluded, "We are in a dead end which is the result of the policy pursued during the last 6 years by the 'New Democracy' governments."

On being asked after the meeting whether he believes that the government is sincere in its warning about removal of U.S. bases, Papandreou stressed, "It is obvious Rallis is not bluffing."

The Government Statement

In reference to the meeting the government issued the following laconic statement:

"The scheduled meeting between Prime Minister G. Rallis and PASOK chairman A. Papandreou was held as scheduled at the political office at 1900 (1500 GMT). The meeting lasted 45 minutes approximately and discussion was related to latest developments and primarily to foreign developments."

I AVYI CITES POSITIVE RESULTS OF RALLIS-PAPANDREOU MEETING

AT071545 Athens I AVYI in Greek 7 Oct 80 p 6

[From the I AVYI Column: "Unity in Face of Imperialist Pressures"]

[Excerpts] The Mitsotakis-Turkmen talks in New York did not produce anything--as was expected. The Turks had absolutely no reason to be conciliatory toward the Greek foreign minister, particularly not after a period of strong intransigence.

These moments are full of extreme responsibility for all the democratic parties. The United States and NATO will not give ground easily. The more the impasse appears to be final the more they will intensify their efforts--also relying on their supporters from within--in order to enforce their will in the end. We have recently had sufficient examples--including the notorious "demarche" by MaCloskey--which confirm this conclusion.

The New Democracy government which is being forced--at least up to this moment--to reject these pressures and to turn (despite its own desire and its "credo") toward a finalization of its withdrawal from NATO's military wing and toward removal of U.S. bases from Greek territory, depends on an apparatus which is deeply undermined by NATO. It could, however, rely--so long as it continues to reject pressures and blackmail to the very end--upon a nearly universal support and active assistance from all the democratic political forces.

Yesterday's meeting between Prime Minister Rallis and PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou appears to have been positive from this viewpoint. This initiative must have an immediate sequel directed toward all the parties of the democratic opposition with an agreed-upon joint policy for dealing with imperialist reaction as its main goal.

From the first day of the political change we spoke of the need to stimulate national unity of spirit in face of a permanent imperialist pressure and threat. This is not the moment for claiming laurels because life has fully confirmed our evaluations. What is needed at this moment is a general conscription so that the great battle can be waged with unity and determination. This will be the battle which will determine the fates of the nation and of democracy. The government, which is shouldering increased responsibilities as a result of developments themselves, has a duty to proceed along the course of establishing this national unity of spirit through concrete measures.

PAPER CONDEMNS PASOK'S EFFORTS TO EXPLOIT NATIONAL UNITY

[Editorial: "Tricks Over 'National Unity of Spirit'"]

[Text] Because they are naive or because of petty-party reasons they leave the postern gate open. In the name of a "calm political climate" they avoid explaining to public opinion that unity of spirit is forged upon a specific policy and specific goals. This is, perhaps, happening for the very first time in late Neohellenic history. Responsibility rests fully upon the party of "New Democracy" which covers the ground from "radical liberalism to democratic socialism." [paragraph continues]

At the same time PASOK attempts to exploit the difficult position into which the Karamanlis policy has been led into in order to achieve its own national and democratic legal recognition.

The Karamanlis policy locked up Greece within the confines of the Turkish "veto." It has made "Attila" the regulator of our own foreign policy and, particularly, over vital issues of national defense. As things have developed, the government either should have voluntarily resigned from authority or it should have been forced to resign by an opposition worthy of its mission. Not only did the first eventuality not develop--sensitivity belongs to the past--but not even a single motion of censure was submitted against the government in the Chamber of Deputies.

At this moment, the government is fighting itself in New York and in Brussels--because it belatedly discovered that its withdrawal from military NATO diplomatically strengthened Turkey and exposed the country's security and defense to grave dangers. At the same time, PASOK offers the government its support for spiritual unity, not for the purpose of correcting the error but for the purpose of compounding it--with full withdrawal from the alliance!

After winning "nationalist" laurels with that agreed-upon slogan: "Sink the Hora" [Turkish seismographic ship] PASOK now comes forth to reap new benefits in view of elections within the next few months. "It will actively support," it states, "every effort toward guaranteeing national sovereignty...!" At the same time, it will not be to blame if its offer for support is not accepted! Apparently it is others who undermine national unity of spirit! They are the ones who accuse PASOK of attempting and of wanting to "gag and chain the Greek people hand and foot ...."

Bearing all comparisons in mind, PASOK now offers its assistance to a "tried and failed government" in the same way that 40 years ago the Greek Communist Party offered it to an able and worthy national leadership, not for the purpose of continuing the war of 28 October [1940] but in order to end it by coming to terms with the mediation of the Soviet Union.

The efforts of PASOK to gain credibility and to disperse justified concern over its goals, both overseas and at home, is helped by "New Democracy." It allows PASOK to make its whisper "we are all one family," appear genuine, instead of proclaiming that PASOK is dangerous to the country's parliamentary regime and its national defense. How can "New Democracy" say this at the time when its own policy has opened up the gates to calamity?

GOVERNMENT REPORTS EXECUTION OF TWO TERRORISTS

TA080925 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0900 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] Necdet Adali and Mustafa Pehlivanoglu, two terrorists sentenced to death, were executed in Ankara early this morning. Together with his friend Kemal Ergin--who was sentenced to death but who escaped from prison and is now at large--Necdet Adali fired shots in a coffeehouse in Ismetpasa in Ankara in July 1977 killing two persons. Mustafa Pehlivanoglu fired shots in two coffeehouses in Balgat in Ankara in August 1978 together with his friend Isa Armagan. Five persons were killed in the incident.

Isa Armagan and Mustafa Pehlivanoglu were sentenced to death but subsequently escaped from prison. Mustafa Pehlivanoglu was later apprehended.

The death sentences of Necdet Adali, Kemal Ergin, Mustafa Pehlivanoglu and Isa Armagan were ratified by the National Security Council, and the laws for the execution of the sentences were published in the Official Gazette yesterday.

Our correspondent has learned from the Ankara public prosecutor that Necdet Adali and Mustafa Pehlivanoglu were taken to the Ankara prison from the Mamak military prison at 0230 this morning. Their sentences were executed in Ankara prison. Necdet Adali's lawyers were present at the execution.

OZAL COMMENTS ON GREECE'S AEGEAN CLAIMS, NATO MEMBERSHIP

TA041636 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Oct 80

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal said that the Turkish Government wants Greece to return to the NATO military wing, but that it is against the Greek claim to control over all of the Aegean Sea including the airspace. Ozal, who attended the joint annual World Bank and IMF meetings in Washington, held a news conference after concluding his contacts and replied to questions by foreign reporters. Ozal said that, along with Greece's return to NATO as a full member, the Aegean airspace and the sea control issues could only be discussed jointly. After concluding his contacts in Washington, Ozal left for London. He will return to Turkey tomorrow.

GUNAYDIN REVIEWS RELATIONS WITH FRANCE

NC060838 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 3 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Necati Zincirkiran: "What has France Got to do With Us?"]

[Excerpts] I have been pondering this question for about 7 years now. What have we done to the French? What have we done to them they should pursue a hostile policy against us? I am thinking of the past: Back in 1950's we stood by France as a loyal member of the Western alliance at the expense of angering Tunisia and Algeria, which were then fighting against France for their freedom and independence. We did this despite our historic ties with these two brave peoples of North Africa who were, moreover, our brethren. We blindly sacrificed ourselves for the sake of French friendship without thinking about how much it would cost us later.

Through the erroneous policy pursued in those years the leaders of North African countries were offended. Saying that "human beings eventually have to atone for their behavior," Jamal 'Abd an-Nasir supported Christian Makarios to the end at the expense of Muslim Turkey and the Muslim Turkish Cypriot community. Algeria didn't support us at any international platform.

It is impossible not to justify the actions of these North African countries. The hostile policy now being pursued by France, which enjoyed Turkey's full support when it was hard-pressed, can only be described as sheer ingratitude. This policy began when arrogant Giscard d'Estaing came to power. According to this head of state, who is an admirer of Helenism, Turkey is of no importance at all. He must indeed be the victim of such a mentality, otherwise he would not have committed such flagrant blunders. The prime minister of Giscard's France which, emulating Germany, has imposed visa requirements on Turks, confirms this impression. Giscard's Prime Minister Raymond Barre, replying to a question put to him only 2 days ago by a Turkish delegate at the meeting of the Council of Europe, said that "the Turks are responsible for the terroristic acts perpetrated against our diplomats by Armenian terrorists in France." Such language by a prime minister can hardly be tolerated. Our government must demand an explanation for this statement and we must review our relations with France.

CUMHURIYET DISCUSSES PROBLEM OF LONG-TERM INDEBTEDNESS

NC080818 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 7 Oct 80 pp 1, 7

["Observation" column by Ugur Mumcu: "Deferment..."]

[Excerpts] By continually postponing the resolution of our problems for over 60 years, we have got where we are now. The solution of all the economic and social problems encountered during the past 30 years has been put off to a later time; land reform has been postponed; matters concerning the financial rights of the public employees have been postponed; and legislation concerning minimum wages has also been postponed. Now we look at this impasse and ask ourselves: How can these matters be put right?

It will not be very easy. Let us take a look at our foreign debts: These debts, including interest, have risen to 33 billion dollars. The only thing past administrations cared for was to have the payment of these debts deferred. And the deferred debts have kept increasing to such an extent that the amount of interest accumulated is almost equal to the amount of money borrowed. Borrowing followed borrowing and interest kept accumulating, without any solution in sight. All we have said is: "Let us again defer payment." If we continue to behave like this, won't these strangers who are lending money to us one day ask for their money? They certainly will. What will we do then? Some of us will probably say: "Let us cross that bridge when we come to it." But this is how the enormous Ottoman Empire collapsed. Upon the excessive accumulation of foreign debts the creditors formed an international morgage organization known as "public debts" which laid its hands on the treasury.

The new administration which assumed power after the 12 September operation is facing a number of problems in addition to the accumulated foreign debts which amount to 33 billion dollars. If an economy can do nothing other than defer debts, this means that there are no other alternatives left.

It would be unjust and unreasonable to expect this present administration, which has proclaimed itself transitional, to resolve all these outstanding issues. The solution of some of these problems will take years. For example, it will take at least 20 to 30 years, even if we resorted to the most radical measures, to extricate ourselves from the quagmire of foreign debt.

While the leader of the 12 September operation says: "We will turn over the administration to the civilians as soon as possible," some of our "civilian" colleagues say "for goodness sake stay on for a bit longer."

There is a saying in the army: "An error made at the concentration point affects the outcome of the war."

Our civilian colleagues pile up all these outstanding problems and say to the army "you settle all these matters." This is impossible. The settlement of all these issues should be the responsibility of civilian administrations. We hope that the next civilian administration will not again choose to put off matters that have been put off for so long. Otherwise, there is no end to this.

VOTCP CALLS FOR ORGANIZED RESISTANCE AGAINST JUNTA

[Text] The pro-American junta is shedding blood. Though Interior Ministry statements reveal that more than 100 armed clashes occurred in various parts of the country, that 325 persons were killed, that hundreds of others were injured and thousands were detained by the security forces, the junta banned the publication of this report in the press and on the radio.

A statement by the Army VII Corps and Diyarbakir, Hakkari, Siirt and Urfa Martial Law Command announced that 1,087 persons have been captured in operations conducted by the security forces and that 6 persons were killed in ensuing clashes. Various circles reveal that the number of persons killed during operations conducted in Turkish Kurdistan to intimidate the Kurdish people is well above those officially announced.

The pro-American miliarist junta is shedding blood. It is provoking violent incidents in a bid to conceal its antipeople policies. Youths are being killed in bloody ambushes. Let us intensify our efforts for the establishment of a strong people's movement against the pro-American junta and refrain from individual actions of violence. Let us preserve our cadres. Let us train and organize the masses in an atmosphere of resistance against the junta. The potential [word in English] for resistance against the junta should not be wasted through small, ineffective and adventurist acts. All political forces should unite and organize against tyranny, violence and hunger, and the junta should be alienated. Our people's democratic resistance should be channeled into the most effective areas. Only such a resistance can bring about collapse of the junta.

VOTCP SCORES NEW U.S. PLAN ON AEGEAN, CYPRUS ISSUES

TA071347 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Station commentary: "Is This a Second Treacherous Camp David Agreement for the Aegean?"]

[Text] Since the military junta assumed power, the issues of the Aegean continental shelf and the Cyprus problem have gained in prominence. The Turkish and Greek foreign ministers met in New York in order to discuss these subjects. Talks were held under the supervision of the Washington administration, and the U.S. and NATO ruling circles are aiming to use these two countries for their adventurist strategies in the Middle East and to strengthen the southeastern flank of NATO.

As a result, three so-called solutions have been put forward to settle the differences between Turkey and Greece. The first solution envisages placing the Aegean region under the supervision of Greece in accordance with NATO plans. Such a solution is contrary to Turkey's national interests. The second solution foresees placing the Aegean region under Turkey's supervision under NATO's guidance. Such a settlement would be to the detriment of Greek national interests. The third and last so-called solution is to place the Aegean region under complete U.S. influence. This would be against the national interests of both countries. The United States is obviously in favor of the third possibility and has even prepared a plan to this effect. This plan is called the Rogers plan.

Implementation of the Rogers plan depends on the intensification of tensions between the two countries. In a bid to reach this aim, the United States is, on the one hand, taking advantage of the pro-NATO stand of the Greek Government and, on the other, it is using the junta as a tool. The United States is supplying both armies with weapons and is trying to create a perpetual atmosphere of tension directed against regional peace and security.

Through the tense atmosphere it is creating, the United States is planning to impose on Turkey and Greece a Camp David-like treacherous agreement for the solution of the Aegean issue and the Cyprus problem, thereby placing the area under its complete influence. The United States is also planning to use both countries more intensively as a tool in the aggressive and provocative policies it is pursuing in the Middle East. These are the aims of the Rogers plan.

Certain bourgeois writers in our country are trying to create the impression that they are opposed to the Rogers plan. In fact, in his article which appeared in the Istanbul daily HURRIYET, on 3 October, Metin Toker wrote: It is out of the question to expect an improvement in relations between Turkey and Greece. We are supposed to be understanding so Greece can return to NATO's military wing. No one should expect such a stand from Turkey.

What makes Toker so bold as to make such statements? The answer to this question is obvious. Supported by Washington and Western European monopolies, this man--who favors U.S. hegemony--is only pretending to be opposed to the return of Greece to NATO. Actually, Toker is in favor of Greece's return to NATO's military flank, but his purpose is to incite strains between the two countries because he wants the implementation of the Rogers plan. This boldness in his article is only that of a lackey. What he says in brief is that the Aegean should be placed neither under the Greek nor the Turkish hegemony but that of the United States.

Differences between Turkey and Greece will never be settled in a realistic way as long as both countries continue to be members of NATO; therefore, the solution is to withdraw from NATO. The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] favors the solution of all regional differences outside the dangerous mediation of NATO based on respect for the independence of the peoples, territorial integrity, and national interests. This view was expressed in the joint statement issued by the TCP and the Communist Party of Greece: both parties support the solution of differences between the two countries without the use of force or threats to use force, within the framework of the Helsinki Final Act, international laws and practices, and based on mutual respect for the national independence and territorial integrity and benefit of both countries without any imperialist interference or supervision.

These two brotherly parties will heighten their coordinated struggle in order to insure regional peace and security and to consolidate friendship among the peoples against imperialist aggressions and provocations.

[Excerpt] Brussels, 7 Oct (AFP)--Prime minister Wilfried Martens today agreed to form a new government with Social Christians and Socialists from both the French and Flemish communities. He is to meet tomorrow with presidents of both parties, and said he expects to form the new government before the opening of parliament on October 14, in an effort to end the crisis as soon as possible.

Leaders' Comments on Coalition

LD081043 Brussels LE SOIR in French 5-6 Oct 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "A Few Statements by Party Presidents on Friday Evening"]

[Text] On Friday evening [3 October] after the majority party presidents' meeting, the party presidents made the following remarks:

Socialist Party President Andre Cools thinks there can be no question of renegotiating an agreement reached in June among all the government coalition partners. "We must," he said, "abide by the decisions taken 3 months ago in the presence of liberal ministers and which were the subject of three meetings with the social partners. We respect the agreements."

According to Social Christian Party President Vanden Boeynants, it is wrong to talk about renegotiation. However, when party presidents meet it is to try and settle things. "Consultation, negotiation, discussion--the words do not matter: it is the aim that counts."

Christian People's Party President Leo Tindemans said that he thinks that difficult points remain. There is still a danger of renegotiation. Nonetheless, he hopes to "save the government."

Party for Reform and Liberty President Jean Gol denounced the Social Christians' "about-face." "In our view," he said, "taxes are too high. They must be reduced. Real reforms must be made."

PALME ADVOCATES GAS DEAL WITH USSR AFTER MOSCOW VISIT

LD071511 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 4 Oct 80 p 4

[Elisabeth Crona report: "Invest in Imports of Soviet Natural Gas"]

[Text] "Start negotiating with the Soviet Union on the purchase of natural gas." The Faelldin government is given this advice by Olof Palme and Ingvar Carlsson, who returned home Friday from their visit to Moscow.

Such large deposits of natural gas have been found in Siberia that there is sufficient to cover the Soviet Union's own needs and to export quantities to Western Europe, the Social Democratic delegation was told. Sweden could have a share in a large pipeline carrying natural gas from the Soviet Union to Western Europe.

While he was prime minister Olof Palme raised the question of Soviet natural gas. However, the Soviet Union then thought that quantities were too small for exports to be profitable. Since then the Soviet Union has increased its reserves of gas fivefold in 10 years, Ingvar Carlsson said, and new finds are being made all the time.

Olof Palme put the gas discussions in a larger political context: "The Russians frenetically deny that they invaded Afghanistan because they wanted to get closer to the great oilfields. This line of argument seems credible. It was instead security considerations which were behind the invasion."

Both he and Ingvar Carlsson were positive about the Swedish purchase of natural gas: "The gas is an extremely interesting and environmentally safe source of energy," Ingvar Carlsson said. The problem is that it requires large investments and long-term contracts. We need guarantees of large quantities. The new find seems to make these possible. Dependence on large quantities of Soviet natural gas would be weighed against dependence on oil from unsettled corners of the world, Carlsson said. "We would be spreading our risks as far as supplies are concerned." "In the long term we could balance the Soviet gas with natural gas from Norway," Olof Palme added.

"The gas ought primarily to be used for industrial purposes," Ingvar Carlsson said. "It is really too valuable just to burn."

The Social Democratic delegation was also informed that the Soviet Union is investing wholeheartedly in nuclear power and is even planning breeder reactors.

During the almost 4-hour general political discussions that the Swedes had with members of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee, principally its international secretary, Boris Ponomarev, a number of burning international issues were discussed. These included the contingency stockpiling of heavy military equipment in Norway--which, according to Palme gave rise to "lively debate." Palme himself stressed the Norwegian arguments that this is not a provocation but a natural consequence of Norwegian NATO membership. The Swedish Social Democrats were also told that the Soviet Union condemns the war between Iraq and Iran and has made this clear to both parties. "As far as Afghanistan is concerned, they said that their desire was to withdraw their troops--certain withdrawals have already been made--but that everything depended on the stability in the area."

Why are Soviet politicians interested in contacts and discussions with a Social Democratic party? "They have not been able to avoid noticing that the Social Democrats in Western Europe have grown in strength," Olof Palme replied. "The Socialist International has strengthened its position. This has aroused their interest."

KARACHI REPORTS HAQ'S TALKS WITH KREISKY IN VIENNA

BK081556 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 1500 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] President Gen. Mohammad Ziaul Haq and Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky had a meeting in Vienna today which lasted for 30 minutes. The president, on the occasion, extended an invitation for a luncheon to the Austrian chancellor, and the talks continued during the luncheon.

Foreign Affairs Secretary General S. Shahnawaz, Baluchistan lieutenant Governor Rahimuddin Khan and the Pakistani ambassador to Austria assisted the president at the talks. The Austrian chancellor was accompanied by the foreign affairs secretary general of Austria, the chief of the Asian section and top officials of the Federal Council. Several important international issues reportedly came up during the talks.

DIE PRESSE INTERVIEWS PAKISTAN'S ZIAUL HAQ

AU081116 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Philippe E. Gudenus' October interview with Pakistani President Ziaul Haq at Vienna's Schwechat Airport: "Pakistan's President Warns Great Powers Against Intervention in the Gulf"]

[Text] Vienna--There are no indications of foreign interference in the Iraqi-Iranian conflict "and it is better for them if they keep out." This is what Pakistani President Ziaul Haq told DIE PRESSE late Monday night after landing at Vienna's Schwechat Airport. Ziaul Haq had reported to the United Nations about his abortive mediation effort in the gulf, had been received by British Prime Minister Thatcher on Monday, and now was in Vienna for 2 days, "to spend a few days rest in a friendly and hospitable country." In addition to a luncheon with Federal President Kirchschlaeger and talks with Federal Chancellor Kreisky, a medical checkup also is on the agenda of the visit.

After vehemently attacking the USSR last week, and after stating that the Soviets were trying to break down the back door to the Persian Gulf, the president was conciliatory in Vienna and anxious not to irritate the Soviet Union: "I do not think that it helps the Soviet Union if Iran is weakened." The war does not benefit anybody, least of all the fighting countries, Iran and Iraq, he said.

Asked if reports are correct that Pakistan is delivering arms to Tehran that are paid for by Libya, the president equivocated: "Iran has masses of aircraft of U.S. origin and tanks made in Britain. Libya is a friend of Iran and Pakistan. However, I do not think that money alone can buy these weapons."

Ziaul Haq also termed as "fabrications" reports that Islamabad, with Libyan financial aid, is working on an atomic bomb. Will Pakistan possess nuclear weapons? "No, we are not building any bomb. We only pursue a nuclear research program for peaceful purposes," Ziaul Haq said. Will Pakistan not manufacture nuclear weapons even if neighboring countries are working on such weapons? "One neighboring country, India, has already exploded a nuclear change and we believe that they possess more of them. However, we are not in favor of atomic bombs for our country."

Will not Pakistan be compelled to do so by the circumstances? "We shall achieve equilibrium by other means. In any case I do not believe that we are compelled one way or another to enter into competition with India. We have our own problems. We are a minor country, India is a major one. We are striving to improve our relations with India to make a bomb superfluous," Ziaul Haq mused and added: "We are doing our best."

Asked if India duly appreciated this good will, Ziaul Haq smiled with a bit of irony: "Love and affection cannot be ignored. I hope that India recognizes this."

PAKISTAN'S ZIAUL HAQ TO MEET SCHMIDT IN BONN 9 OCTOBER

LD031744 Hamburg DPA in German 1648 GMT 3 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 3 Oct (DPA)--Pakistani President Ziaul Haq is to meet the federal chancellor for a political talk in Bonn on 9 October, a government spokesman announced on Friday [3 October]. Ziaul Haq who, on behalf of the Islamic Conference, had recently taken on the role of mediator in the Iraqi-Iranian conflict, has planned a number of visits to Western capitals as part of his trip to the United Nations General Assembly.

Karachi Report on Visit

BK08115 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 1500 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] President Gen Mohammad Ziaul Haq will arrive in Bonn from Vienna tomorrow to have talks with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. They will have a meeting at a luncheon which will also be attended by FRG Foreign Minister Genscher.

According to President Mohammad Ziaul Haq's itinerary, he will have a meeting with FRG President Carstens. The president is also scheduled to meet Pakistani nationals during his stay in the FRG capital.

Radio Voice of Germany, citing the FRG foreign minister, has stated that the government of the Federal Republic of Germany is awaiting President Mohammad Ziaul Haq's visit. The radio said that the FRG Government feels that talks with the Pakistan president on the Iran-Iraq dispute, the Middle East situation and other international issues will be very useful.

SPD, FDP RELEASE PAPER ON INITIAL COALITION TALKS

DW081401 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Joint statement by the SPD and the FDP after their first coalition talks in Bonn on 7 October following recent elections]

[Text] 1. The negotiating commissions of the SPD and the FDP met today for an initial, basic coalition talk. Participants for the SPD were Party Chairman Willy Brandt and the Chairman of the Bundestag group, Herbert Wehner; for the FDP the party chairman, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, and, deputizing for chairman of the Bundestag group Wolfgang Mischnick, his deputy Hans-Guenther Hoppe. In addition, the federal chancellor attended.

2. After the unequivocal mandate received from the majority of voters on 5 October, both parties confirmed their determination to continue the Social-Liberal coalition for the Ninth legislative period of the German Bundestag.

3. During the past 11 years, this coalition, through its clear and predictable foreign and security policies, has achieved the solid confidence of the world. This policy serves peace. The Social-Liberal coalition will continue in the future to alleviate conditions of the people in both parts of Germany by means of its policy on Germany and on Berlin. It will continue the policy of military balance, of arms control on as law a level as possible, of consolidating the alliance and the European Community, and of reliable partnership--just as it will continue the policy of good neighborliness and detente. It will make every effort to preserve the cohesion of the German nation.

4. The Social-Liberal coalition in the difficult seventies consolidated social peace, made the social network more tightly knit, and, through its internationally coordinated economic and financial policies, has ensured jobs and prosperity despite the world economic convulsions since 1973. Despite the oil price explosion, we have largely protected our country against worldwide inflation. Our currency is one of the strongest in the world. This successful currency, economic and social policy will be continued. In this respect, solid state finances remain the basis of all state activity.

The Federal Republic of Germany will find itself in the eighties facing world economic challenges which will demand enormous market economy, social and financial flexibility. This is why precautionary action, solidarity and the consolidation of open world trade are particularly important.

5. Since 1969 the Social-Liberal coalition has been implementing a steady reform policy through which room for intellectual and cultural variety and tolerance has been enlarged and defended.

The coalition will concentrate in the future on environmental protection beyond what has already been achieved.

The SPD and the FDP will further enhance the state of justice and guarantee the security of the people without impairing their freedom. They will also in the future counteract terror and violence with all mans at the disposal of a state committed to justice.

What remains essential for the joint activities of the SPD and the FDP is the determination to safeguard what has been accomplished and to bring about a constant renewal in state and society.

6. During the past 11 years both coalition partners have always respected each other as independent, self-reliant parties with different political programs, this shall remain so. The cooperation of SPD and FDP, based on their responsibility for freedom and social progress, has done our people much good. This will also be true in the next 4 years.

7. All democratic forces are called upon to enhance the well-being of our people and prevent harm from coming to them. For this reason the coalition partners deem it desirable that the mistakes, some of which were bad, that took place during the election campaign be cleared up. This will be possible only if all sides muster the will to do so; differences of opinion in policy matters should not be affected.

8. The negotiating commissions came to terms on the further course of the coalition negotiations. They agreed to continue the coalition negotiations on Monday, 27 October.

9. Both parties agreed that party Chairmen Willy Brandt and Hans-Dietrich Genscher call on the federal president even before the constituent meeting of the Ninth Bundestag to propose Helmut Schmidt for reelection as federal chancellor.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER SATISFIED WITH COALITION TALKS

LD081216 Hamburg DPA in German 1201 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Vice Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher told the Cabinet today that they are very satisfied with the climate of the coalition talks which began yesterday. It was learned that the chancellor underlined the good atmosphere of the initial round of talks. Genscher confirmed this with a reference to the good spirit of the meeting in which the coalition partners laid down the basic features of the government's work during the coming years. The Cabinet discussions on the schedule for the formation of government and start of parliamentary work resulted in the probable postponement of the chancellor's government statement originally planned for 17 November. The reason for this is the shortness of time between the original date and the chancellor's visit to the United States on 19 and 20 November. Schmidt is to visit New York first and will then arrive on 20 November at the White House to meet the, by then, newly elected U.S. President.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG VIEWS U.S. APPREHENSION OVER NATO

DW081407 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 8 Oct 80 p 4

[Commentary signed TY.: "Open Transatlantic Dialogue"]

[Text] In the course of the laborious self-assessment as to whether and how the West should react to the potentially threatening situation in the Middle and Far East (Afghanistan), the language within NATO has become harder.

Perhaps the transatlantic dailogue has also become more forthwright--which is no disadvantage among allies. What is characteristic of this tone is a historical saying by Benjamin Franklin, coined well over 200 years ago, when the U.S. statesman solicited European help in Paris for the War of Independence. Washington's NATO Ambassador Bennett has made use of it.

During a conference in Toulouse and with a view to the cohesion of the West, he presented the following plea--which, however, loses some of its dramatic nature in translation: "We must all hang together, or else we will certainly all hang separately." Today it is the Europeans who hope for transatlantic help. The Americans remain prepared to take such steps indeed, provided the partners in the old world go along. This message can be derived from the Toulouse message, but not only from there. What irritates the Americans, however, is what they believe is the diminishing readiness for transatlantic cohesion on the part of some Europeans. Washington quarters see the danger of NATO being split three ways, as we just read in the WALL STREET JOURNAL; into concrete members such as Great Britain and the Federal Republic, members deserving extenuating circumstances (Turkey, Portugal), and slow payers such as Belgium and the Netherlands.

NATO Secretary General Luns, a Dutchman, in his Brussels speech voiced understanding for the anxieties of the United States. He reminded the Europeans of how much they depend on the United States in their prosperity. But Luns is no Franklin, he is not the voice of Europe.

COMMENTARY VIEWS EAST-WEST MILITARY BALANCE

[Guenther Gillessen editorial: "Balance Must Be the Aim"]

[Text] The recent New York meeting between Muskie and Gromyko indicated that the big powers are holding "preparatory talks" on the limitation of medium-range arms. That is already a part of SALT III. At the beginning of the Geneva preparatory talks it cannot hurt to coolly recall that the results achieved so far by arms control policy are rather modest. They do not justify equating arms control with "security" and "detente" with peace. The Moscow regime knows only adversaries or subordinates. The core of the East-West conflict is insoluble and remains in every form, also in that of so-called detente, a fight until one side gives up or collapses. It is therefore necessary to withstand the conflict with patience and strength, keeping it free of uncontrolled outbursts.

The so-called dual decision of the Western governments at the 1979 December NATO conference is aimed at that dual need of NATO countries. NATO decided to obtain 464 land-based cruise missiles and 108 Pershing-II missiles, a total of 572, for deployment in Europe, thus creating a counterbalance which is now lacking to the bigger and considerably stronger Soviet medium-range missile potential. NATO simultaneously offered at that time to renounce procurement to the extent that the Soviet Union was prepared to reduce its medium-range missiles.

It is also part of the prelude that the Soviet Union eliminated one negotiating obstacle, namely, the demand that the NATO decision be rescinded, while setting up a new one. The Soviet Union new demands that all arms be included in the negotiations that could hit the Soviet Union from Western Europe. Such arms are called "Forward Based Systems" (FBS) in the West. Moscow has raised that demand twice, at SALT I and SALT II, but it revoked it later on. Will that happen a third time?

It is important to define what is to be negotiated on in the "preparatory talks." In speaking of "medium-range arms" one means arms which both sides have and which are comparable, but in speaking of "FBS," such arms are meant as the Soviet Union does not possess, because its medium-range arms can hit "only" Western Europe.

If the West accepted such a description of the subject of negotiations, all Western nuclear arms of medium range would be included, including also those of the French and the British, while on the Soviet Side only those would be included which are known to the West by name, such as the SS-4, SS-5 and SS-20 missiles. Above all the fact would be hidden that in the field of medium-range arms having a moderate to long range the Soviet Union is at present 3 1/2 times stronger than the West; as regards warheads, it is even six times stronger, and if the expansion of the SS-20 potential continues unhindered, it will be nine times stronger in 1985.

If the Soviet Union insists on negotiating on "FBS," the West ought to demand that all Soviet medium-range arms be included, such as Soviet submarine missiles of the SS-N-5 type and the Backfire, Badger, Blinder and Fencer bombers.

One must warn not only against unilaterally effective definitions, but also against extending the negotiations to include all bigger medium-range arms. The more systems included (such as planes to be used for various missions), the more complicated the negotiations will be and the more uncertain their outcome. Limiting negotiations to the particularly threatening unmanned and land-based medium-range arms with a range of more than 1,000 kilometers is a practical, reasonable and fair negotiating offer. According to Western ideas, the aim of the negotiations should be the setting of an equal ceiling for the number of cruise missiles and Pershing-II missiles on the one side and for SS-4, SS-5 and SS-20 missiles on the other. A corresponding plan exists in the SALT treaties.

According to its own negotiating plan, NATO can commit itself to reduce its own 572 systems only if the Soviet Union similarly curtails its land-based medium-range arms with a range of more than 1,000 kilometers. NATO's procurement decision and the negotiating guidelines which have been simultaneously adopted, are unambiguous and clear.

The negotiation attempt is not very promising because real disarmament must be demanded from the Soviet Union. It would not be satisfactory if instead of disarmament the ceiling were set so high that the great Soviet stock could easily be accommodated under it and if NATO were content that "equality" existed insofar as the West was permitted to procure an equal amount of arms if it so wished.

Such a cheap "way out" could be a temptation to weak European governments. One ought to realize that an agreed ceiling which would not be at least close to (or, better, under) the number of 572 systems, would not be a "balance," but a quiet approval of a manyfold Soviet superiority.

PARIS RADIO EXPLAINS CANCELLATION OF BAKHTIAR PROGRAM

LD081248 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Excerpts] A communique issued by the management of Paris Radio's News Department: the program "Facing the Public" which was scheduled to be broadcast at 1910 today, Wednesday, could not be made. The guest on the program, Mr Shahpur Bakhtiar, former Iranian prime minister, informed us at the time of recording this morning that he found himself obliged to drop out. The former prime minister of Iran pointed out that he was led to make this decision at the request of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs which referred to the obligation for caution about which foreign personalities staying in France are periodically reminded. Mr Bakhtiar expressed his regret at not being able to explain his political positions on our station.

A further detail about the cancellation of the program "Facing the Public": The government asked Mr Bakhtiar to drop this program. It appears to it that in the climate of violence and confrontation which is currently raging in the Middle East, nationals from the countries of that region residing on our territory should more than ever take an attitude of reserve which is essential for all foreign refugees. This is stated in the communique of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs which thus asked Mr Bakhtiar not to take part in the programme "Facing the Public" at 1910 tonight on Paris Radio.

LE MONDE REPORTS ON THORN, PUNSET TALKS WITH FRENCH LEADERS

[Unattributed report: "Mr Thorn Thinks Israeli-Arab Dialogue Is Possible"]

[Text] The Middle East and Community problems were the main subjects discussed in the talks which Luxembourg Foreign Minister Thorn had in Paris on Monday, 6 October. Mr Thorn is visiting the Community capitals both in his capacity as president of the Council of Ministers and future chairman (from 1 January) of the Commission.

The Middle East was the main subject discussed in the talks which the president of the republic (who entertained Mr Thorn to lunch) had with Mr Thorn. The Luxembourg minister--who recently completed the task of establishing on-the-spot contacts with which the Nine had entrusted him--thinks that "a dialogue between Arabs and Israelis can and must take place." "I hope," he added as he left the Elysee, "that Europe will be able to play a role which will bring about peace a little more quickly."The Nine are, on the one hand, to define a common stance for the debate which will open at the United Nations shortly and, on the other hand, prepare the "initiative" which they announced at the European Council meeting in Venice but which will only take shape at the European Council meeting in Luxembourg on 1 and 2 December after the U.S. elections.

Community affairs were discussed in more detail with [Prime Minister] Raymond Barre and [Foreign Minister] Francois-Poncet and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Bernard-Reymond. The talks apparently dealt with the steel crisis, the implementation of the decisions taken in Britain's favor, the composition of the new commission (which will include Greece) and expansion.

Mr Punset, the new Spanish minister responsible for relations with the EEC, discussed the Spanish application during talks which he had on Monday with Mr Francois-Poncet and Mr Bernard-Reymond and which he is continuing this Tuesday with Mr Barre. Spanish irritation with France (Mr Punset's predecessor held France responsible for the slowing down of negotiations) seems to have been considerably appeased.

LE MONDE REPORTS RESULT OF FRENCH LEADER POPULARITY POLL

[Unattributed report: "Giscard d'Estaing and Mitterrand Down"]

[Text] FIGARO-MAGAZINE has published the monthly Sofres opinion poll on the popularity of politicians.

The opinion poll was carried out between 19-25 September and around 1,000 people were questioned.

Fiftyone percent as against 54 percent the previous month said that they have confidence in the president's actions. Fortythree percent as against 41 percent do not have confidence in his actions. Since the previous month [Prime Minister] Barre has jumped from 34 percent to 35 percent in people having confidence in him.

Within the majority [European Parliament President] Simone Veil is still the most popular figure with 42 percent of the vote. [PRR Chairman] Chirac has 33 percent (as against 35 percent the previous month), [Minister Delegate for the Feminine Condition] Mrs Pelletier has 32 percent and [National Assembly President] Chaban-Delmas and [RPR Member] Debre each has 27 percent [as against 25 percent the previous month]. In the opposition [PS Leadership Member] Rocard stays level with 48 percent, [PS First Secretary] Mitterrand obtained 31 percent (as against 33 percent the previous month) and [PCF Secretary General] Marchais obtained 19 percent (as against 21 percent the previous month).

LE FIGARO: POSSIBLE 'EVOLUTION' OF POLISH SYSTEM DISCUSSED

LD070957 Paris LE FIGARO in French 3 Oct 80 p 4

[Bernard Margueritte dispatch: "Poland: No Turning Back"]

[Text] Warsaw--The Polish crisis has reached a pradoxical situation: The extreme tension created during the events in Gdansk has given way to a sense of expectancy, but now everyone feels more clearly and deeply that the coming weeks and months will be laden with consequences, not only for Poland itself but for Europe and the whole world.

Indeed, what happens here will be of decisive importance for the future of Poland, of the socialist camp and of East-West detente.

Obviously everyone realizes that, come what may, Poland will never be the same as before. The working class has shown its political maturity and become aware of its strength. The entire public has realized that the order hitherto imposed on it, which seemed unshakable, was in fact very fragile. It is able to draw its conclusions. The vast majority of the party itself has at last acknowledged that the bureaucratic and aberrant form of government practiced hitherto was at last acting against its own interests.

New Form of Socialism

What is the result? If all goes well, Poland will evolve toward a new form of socialism, more modern and democratic, which will be the result of a truly historic compromise between geopolitical necessities and the nation's aspirations. The regime will remain the same but the system will be changed. In the new political situation the party, led by open-minded pragmatists such as Messrs Kania, Olszowski or even POLITYKA Chief Editor Rakowski, will not be content just to tolerate workers' demands, but it will find its best allies in the working class and its self-managed bodies.

State-church relations will be improved, as already shown by the radio broadcast of the Sunday Mass and the reestablishment of the joint committee. Not only will national cohesion be strengthened by this, but it will be an important element of stability in the country--the church having already given sufficient proof of its wisdom and moderation outside the context of the crisis--which will be developed.

Relations among the three ruling parties--the United Workers "Communist" Party [PZPR], the Unified Peasants Party [ZSL] and the Democratic Party--will be revised. The ZSL has already asked that "a real partnership" be reestablished with the PZPR. The risks to the PZPR are only moderate, especially since its two associates still acknowledge its leading role.

Of course, none of this has any point unless the parliament, the Sejm, can rediscover a real path and become the real legislative and monitoring body. The latest, very animated session of the Sejm showed that this was already on the way to being achieved. Nevertheless, to fully attain this goal it will obviously be necessary to change the electoral law and permit a real choice of candidates, even if a ruling majority has to be reserved for the PZPR.

Major Purges

One of the foundations of the new system will be the establishment of entirely revised management and planning methods. A major decentralization of prerogatives and authority will be carried out compensated, on the one hand, by the strengthening of the guiding role of the central plan and, on the other, by increased powers to the self-managed councils.

Behind all these changes there must be a change in the party itself. It has already been announced that some very major purges are to take place, to eliminate individuals who have not proved equal to their tasks during recent events and morally corrupt elements, but, much more importantly, internal democracy will have to be established within the party at all levels, replacing the feudal system that has existed hitherto. This is all the more important inasmuch as the present apparatus, which has become a kind of state within a state, would certainly do its utmost to paralyze or distort the reforms if it were left to decide.

Is such an evolution possible? Paradoxically, Western observers have often made the same mistake as the party's orthodox and dogmatists, in agreeing that the socialist system was incapable of evolving and that any evolution in fact heralded its death. Clearly this idea is not shared by either the progmatists or the moderates in the party, or by the Polish working class, or even by some representatives of the democratic opposition either.

Come what may, therefore, Poland will never return to the ambiguous system of half-measures and inefficiency, allied to a degree of tolerance, that it has experienced hitherto.

PCF POLITBURO ATTACKS PS OVER SENATE ELECTION STRATEGY

LD061021 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 30 Sep 80 p 3

[Apparent text of PCF Politburo 29 September statement: "Increasing PCF's Influence to Create Change"--first paragraph is L'HUMANITE introduction]

[Text] The PCF Politburo released the following statement yesterday:

"At the 28 September 1980 Senate elections the PCF was cheated of all the new Senate seats to which its influence entitled it.

"Despite the unfairness of the election method, several new Communist senators should have been elected, especially in Allier, Gard, Herault and Haut-Garonne. In Bouches-du-Rhone the election of a second Communist senator on a Union of the Left slate would have inflicted a decisive defeat on the right.

"The PS did not want this at any price. It deliberately took the responsibility of preventing the election of Communist senators by every possible means.

"This political decision by the PS is all the more serious inasmuch as in May the PCF presented it with clear, just and honest proposals for unity. But the PS refused to accord to the Communists their rightful number of "grand electors." It has always rejected our proposals.

"In view of this behavior and having discovered the conspiracies organized to eliminate us everywhere, we publicly announced that we rejected any kind of bartering and that we would be forced to retain our candidates in many departments in the second round. The PS' refusal to abandon its anticommunist operation prompted us to implement this principled decision announced before the election.

"The matter does not concern an electoral or partisan dispute.

"It is primarily a matter of democracy. It is unthinkable and dangerous that the Communist voters be treated as second-class citizens and merely a back-up force by the PS. The Union has nothing to do with an attitude of domination or monopoly bids.

"But over and above this, there is a fundamental issue which concerns all workers. The PS' rejection of an honest and lucid Union stems from its political orientation. It has abandoned the policy of the Joint Program. It has turned its back on the struggle to meet the workers' demands and for real change. This is why it denied the PCF its rightful representation. This is why it is trying to weaken it, just as Giscard d'Estaing is doing.

"The PCF devotes all its efforts to the struggle against the Giscard government, for the pressing demands of working men and women and their families, for the changes that will match their hopes.

"Strengthening the PCF's influence and ensuring its just representation are the essential precondition for resolving the major problems of France and the French people. Otherwise we cannot put an end to unemployment, unstable employment, inhuman working conditions, low pay and all other inequalities, inflation and the difficulties which millions of people experience in housing and providing for themselves and educating their children; otherwise we will not redress the country's situation; and otherwise we will not open the doors to the future to young people. Otherwise nothing will change.

"We address ourselves gravely and confidently to the workers, both men and women, to young people and to all those who have had enough of the hard life and want a different policy. We urge them to strengthen the French Communist Party, to increase its influence to make possible the progress of victorious struggles and the advance to change."

JOURNALIST DISPUTES FRENCH MEDIA TREATMENT OF AFGHANISTAN

LD061141 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 26 Sep 80 p 10

[Unattributed report: "Evidence About Afghanistan"]

[Text] Patrice Baldeck, the newspaper CLARTE's special correspondent in Afghanistan, gave a press conference in Paris on Wednesday. During a 2-month visit he visited five Afghan provinces, stayed with local people and met dozens of workers, peasants, students and political and religious leaders. However, many French newspapers invited to the press conference boycotted it. No doubt, unconfirmed reports brought from Peshawar or New Delhi by unnamed travelers are more tempting--they distort facts and conceal progress achieved by the Afghan revolution in recent months.

Right from the start, Patrice Baldeck expressed his indignation. "I bring proof," he stated, "that most media in France have lied about Afghanistan." Using articles which appeared in LE MONDE during his 2-month visit as an example, Patrice Baldeck called attention to 45 false reports. Only a few corrections eventually appeared. "I checked facts on the spot," Patrice Baldeck stated. Afghanistan is being transformed in a positive way. Changes occur daily. "The population's confidence in the Afghan Government is increasing," Patrice Baldeck said.

The CLARTE special correspondent ascertained that counterrevolutionaries are being increasingly isolated. "Their attacks against villages either to secure supplies or to recruit young Afghans by force, the destruction of hospitals, clinics and schools, burned crops and assassinations aimed at creating a climate of fear among the population have, however, merely encouraged the inhabitants to organize themselves in order to defend their property and their lives. With the Afghan Government's aid, people's militias are being created to protect villages and ensure the population's security. Their members include young people, students, workers and peasants.

DALAI LAMA ARRIVES IN ROME, TO MEET POPE

[Text] Rome, 8 Oct (ANSA)--Tibet's 14th Dalai Lama arrived in Rome last night from New Delhi.

The exiled Tibetan religious leader and former temporal leader of Tibet is to meet with Pope John Paul II tomorrow in Vatican City. His plane arrived here at 0225 GMT and was met by numerous followers of the Tibetan community in Italy. They offered him tea and cookies at an airport reception room.

This is the Dalai Lama's second visit to Italy. In May 1973 he had a lengthy encounter with Pope Paul VI.

The present visit is the first in a series the 45-year-old reincarnation of Buddha is to make in coming weeks. From Rome, the Dalai Lama will travel Friday to Canada. Later he will go to Hawaii and Japan.

L'UNITA DISCUSSES 'REAL' PCI-PSI DIALOGUE

LD081419 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 5 Oct 80 pp 1, 17

[Excerpts] As we have said from the outset, this is not just any government crisis. The blow has been dealt to the new factor of prime importance (to which part of the left and of the democratic and trade union forces have for too long turned a blind eye) which emerged from the long death throes of "democratic solidarity"--and which was not only the effect but the real cause of its death. What new factor? Essentially, the undermining of the idea that to resolve the "Italian case" there must be a dialogue--necessarily within a new and more advanced context--with the workers movement as such, that is, with its entire historical heritage and its parties, including the PCI. The idea that prevailed within the DC after Moro's assassination was different from this. It was to shift the PSI out of the leftwing area, to induce it to break way from its tradition (including its reformist tradition) and to attract it into a sphere of joint management of the system. And this was based on a very vain hope: to become the progressive pole of a political game whose functioning would be ensured not so much by a new balance of forces between the PCI and PSI (not in the least scandalous in itself) as by far more thorough transformations which were considered to be already underway. These are as follows: The end of the working class as a political subject and the consequent incorporation and institutionalization of the trade union movement (in fact its division); the crisis of politics as an area for the masses' leading role and organized participation; the shifting of power outside Parliament and therefore uncontrolled corrupt allocation of that power; the elimination of democratic political Catholicism; a revival of capitalism considered in such a way as to be able to replace planning; that is, a major regenerative effort equal to the unprecedented challenges and upheavals of our time, and Mr Brambilla's repeated assertions: "I'll see to it." [allusion unknown] There are also international factors, ranging from the reintroduction of the cold war, partly for domestic ends, to the quest for a neoatlanticist and subordinate position for Italy.

Was all this not a deliberate plan even on the part of the groups within the DC and PSI which initiated the operations? Probably not. Probably their political calculations were more superficial and short-term. But that was not the important thing. [paragraph continues]

It was not to stop when confronted with a government formula in itself less advanced than others, but to realize basically what was regressing and therefore where things might have led--irrespective of intentions--if someone had not shouldered the task of speaking the truth, of opposing these thrusts, partly illusory but partly substantial and real. Why should we not have fought? It is really dangerous and even stupid to form such an interpretation (as even more sincere democrats do) of our policy as a splittist attack by Berlinguer on Craxi for petty considerations of supremacy. It was a matter of opposing these real thrusts--not Craxi of the PSI. On the contrary. Because if they had prevailed, the price would have been paid not only by the PCI but also by the PSI (the entire PSI) and the trade union movement, and all prospects of progress and advance would have disappeared for everyone. And unless a crisis had occurred, the editor of LA REPUBBLICA could have continued, as usual, to scold us but he could not have hoped for the emergence at last of another Zanardelli, that is, of someone capable of reopening the dialogue with the workers movement as a whole.

We Communists must ask ourselves new questions. What is to be done to reverse the trend and reopen a unitary process? Let us proceed from the possible solutions of the crisis. We have had to acknowledge that the principle whereby unitary relations can develop even in the presence of differing parliamentary positions on the part of the two leftwing parties is correct and valid (this is our answer to Deputy Balzamo) but it is only a precondition. How? Inasmuch as differing positions in Parliament--one party in government and the other in opposition--assume the significance of a merely tactical, and therefore not decisive, issue, if there is a thorough nucleus of agreement on the analysis of the state of the country and on the need to work (even marching separately but striking together) for a change of approach and political leadership. When this thorough nucleus is lacking, positions in Parliament become another matter. This and not the excessive harshness of our opposition--is the explanation of what has happened.

Tackling the issue of a real dialogue, therefore, implies verifying whether or not there is a thorough nucleus of agreement. This does not mean agreement on everything, nor does it mean denying the possible coexistence of differing and even rival political blueprints. But what is the aim of this rivalry? This is the point. Then we discover that the state of PCI-PSI relations has been and is still being affected above all by the absence of a precise identification of the object of disagreement. In fact, we have been trying for some time to define the heart of the matter when we have asked: Does the PSI adopt the perspective of access to government by the workers movement as a whole, setting its own legitimate aspiration to wield greater influence and even to a leading function on the left within this context? Or does it adopt a different perspective? We feel the entire essence of the issue lies in this question.

Well, no clear answer has been given to this fundamental question. One cannot regard as such the assertions that the PSI does not oppose the PCI's entry into the government, but that if the DC says "no" (and it is saying "no") it cannot fail to shoulder the responsibility of so-called governability. What kind of governability? With whom? Against whom?

MADRID: GROMYKO RECEIVES DEPARTING SPANISH AMBASSADOR

LD081430 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] Juan Antonio Samaranch, Spanish ambassador in the Soviet Union and president of the International Olympic Committee, has been received by USSR Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. The meeting was granted to Samaranch as a token of regard, as he is to give up his post in order to devote himself exlusively to his Olympic responsibilities. Gromyko praised Samaranch for the work in bringing Spain and the USSR closer together that he has done over the last 3 years.

PSOE'S F. GONZALEZ VIEWS POLITICAL SITUATION

LD081019 Madrid ABC in Spanish 4 Oct 80 pp 5-7

[Unattributed report on 5 October interview granted in Madrid to ABC jouranlists by Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez: "Felipe Gonzalez: 'After 1983 It Will Only Be Possible To Govern With Coalitions'"]

[Excerpts] "I believe that a series of historic events have occurred in this country, not the least of which is the rapprochement, after the constitution was approved and for the first time in the PSOE's 100-year history, with the monarchy. This was a rapprochement which must be regarded as the surmounting of old quarrels. I have always stated, and I have sometimes not been understood by my own comrades, that the Socialist Party's republicanism is not essential. It is a consequence of a mere historical circumstance; hence the importance of the rapprochement with the king." With this statement by PSOE Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez the conversation held with him by the ABC's editorial staff at the Prensa Espanola headquarters began.

Felipe Gonzalez was welcomed by the editor of ABC, who in his words of greeting said, among other things, that "ABC, which, as is well known, stands far from the viewpoints which you so nobly and brilliantly uphold, agrees with you on what is most essential--love for Spain, freedom, coexistence and fair play." The editor of ABC was accompanied by the managing director of Prensa Espanola S.A., Nemesio Fernandez-Cuesta, and the ABC's assistant editor and deputy editor, Miguel Torres and Francisco Gimenez Aleman, respectively. On behalf of the editorial staff, the political section chief, Angel Antonio Gonzalez, and Political Section Members Pilar Urbano, Carlos Davila and Luis Peiro took part in the conversation, which had as its setting the historic office of the founder of ABC.

"Concealing Weakness With Authoritarian Veneer"

The conversation shifted to the topic of the motion of confidence--or "lack of confidence," in Felipe Gonzalez' words--submitted by the government. The appraisal, the assessment, which the PSOE secretary general makes of that debate and Suarez' reaction is negative. "Suarez' almost psychological reaction was to seek to conceal the weakness which has been reached in the country's political development, especially between the time of the last general election and now, with an authoritarian veneer which does not even work." "The aim was," he continued, "to present an image of authoritarianism and imposition, rather than of the moral authority needed to rescue the country." "Especially in the reply which he gave to me, this was very clear. In saying rather grandiloquently that he did not need the Socialists' votes to govern because he already had the 180 votes necessary, he was making, in my opinion, an authoritarian reaction. A week later he was calling on the PSOE in order to resolve the problems of autonomy in general and that of Andalusia in particular."

Felipe Gonzalez is convinced that the only way to surmount the economic crisis, when, moreoever, there are grave circumstances of institutional crisis and of a disturbing public order situation, is through consultation with the social and economic forces: "The only solution is an effort at consultation between employers and trade unions, with a consistent government policy.

"No government is capable of surmounting the crisis on its own, with only 35 percent of the voters,without consultation. The government has come out with an economic policy which has an internal rationality but is a rightwing and timid government policy."

In this connection he criticized the measures which the government adopts without negotiating previously: "It is incapable if lowering the retirement age, which would mean an unloading of personnel to make way for the unemployed young people. It decides, without negotiating with them--and it would certainly have achieved the same result in negotiations with them--that civil servants' salaries should increase by 12.5 percent; it reduces pensions, makes a very timid effort to improve the social security system, and so forth. What does it want the trade unions to do?" Dwelling on the topic of consultation, he referred specifically to the reorganization of the sectors in a state of crisis, and criticized the government, citing the instance of the shipbuilding sector, which has been awaiting reorganization for 3 years without anything being achieved, because the government is not keeping its word, and in the meantime 8,000 superfluous workers are taken on again each year, on full pay. "With whom do they want to settle this? With the trade unions? [How can they], if they do not sit down [at the negotiating table] and if they do not keep their word?"

"Increase in Public Investment Will Be Left at 13-14 Percent"

"With respect to the government's economic plans and their realization in the budgets, the Socialist leader emphasized the need to tackle the problem with courage and imagination. They agree with us with respect to boosting public investment and devoting priority attention to unemployment, but they have contented themselves with words rather than deeds. They say that they will increase public investment by 31 percent. Where is that increase left today with the constant devaluation of the peseta and inflation at 13 or 14 percent? The result will be extremely poor. Gentlemen, if you have reached the conclusion that it is necessary to revive the economy to create employment, set to it! A public effort is necessary to modernize this country's infrastructure in all sectors--roads, education, health and so forth, and all this effort, even if it creates a considerable deficit for 2, 3, 4, 5 or 6 years, is an effort that will catapult the entire economy forward. Spain has sufficient international credit to be able to conduct an operation of this magnitude. What must be realized is that democracy in this country cannot easily withstand 2 million unemployed, and in April the government will not be able to present a favorable balance sheet of unemployment. There will be more unemployed than this month."

In order to finance this operation, Felipe Gonzalez once more emphasized his well known viewpoint of resorting to foreign credits. "Spain," he said, "has more foreign credit than is believed." After deriding certain appeals for foreign credit in the budgets--"and in May, when we said this, they gave us a dressing down in parliament"--he stated that the FRG, Denmark and Austria, for instance, have budgetary deficit in relation to gross domestic product [GDP] far greater than ours--"and nobody puts his hands on his head!"--and he said that in the case of the first-mentioned country growth in GDP had been achieved during the years of crisis exceeding that experienced in the previous decade.

"If They Are Liberals, Let Them Be So to the End"

Calling again for boldness to resolve the economic problems, he stated that there are only two ways to resolve unemployment--to create more jobs or to share out the existing jobs. He said that the latter course is difficult and could require reducing the working day, and so forth. In this connection he cited an instance: "There are 100,000 jobs in the administration which are held by people who also receive state pensions. An effort of solidarity is required in the administration concerning those 225,000 unemployed young people who have become unemployed since the government's economic plan." In Felipe Gonzalez' opinion, the state budgets require an internal rationality: "If you are liberal, you are liberal to the end. What you cannot do is to be liberal with respect to business and statistics with respect to losses."

"Only Danger to Democracy Is Its Disintegration"

Felipe Gonzalez discussed his party's opposition activity in the months ahead, stating first that "I will exercise no form of opposition other than to offer possible solutions for this country, but it must be perfectly understood that of course we have our own political proposal and that we have three specific alternatives: total opposition, consensus or coalition. I discard consensus right away. Having said that, I must state that Suarez' sole concern in the latest debate centered on forcing me to say that there would be no coalition government, because otherwise he would not survive until 1983. That is a concession which I never intended and do not intend to make to him. I simply believe that if the country needs this kind of government it must have one, though I personally would prefer elections to be held and that the people decide. But "be that as it may," the Socialist leader said, it cannot be asserted that a coalition government is bad for democracy, since the only thing that is irreversible is Spain's decline, if democracy disintegrates, and perhaps in the final analysis there is no other solution to the threefold crisis than to put our shoulders jointly to the wheel."

With regard to consensus, Felipe Gonzalez explained that "outside of the government I will not support it, though this does not mean that if there is any major issue of national importance, such as the autonomy issues, I will refuse to continue negotiating."

"Coalition Government After 1983"

"If, as seems most likely to me, this country cannot resist and we are asked to make the sacrifice of participating in government tasks, we will have to make it. But there is something I must make clear: following the next elections and thanks to the policy of encouraging the nationalist parties the chamber of deputies will become ungovernable and it will be necessary to resort to a coalition. I have not the slightest doubt of this. In my opinion the last five votes provided by the Andalusian Socialist Party imply a great political price, a price that the government should not have paid. Now they have cost the formation of Clavero's party in Andalusia and of course they will cost the PSOE having to condemn the Andalusian Socialist Party's financing by the government, because what are we trying to do: build a state or destroy it?

"In short," Felipe Gonzalez said, "our skill in conducting a responsible opposition should make us win the next elections in 1982 or 1983. But above all we must try to salvage the country and set it on its feet as soon as possible."

At one point the hypothesis was raised of another motion censure and the Socialist leader ackrowledged that it would be different from the previous one and that it could entail a program and a majority government. Logically, however, he was not too explicit about stating how this new majority would be formed: "If either now or in 1983 I need to attain 175 or 176 seats and I have, for instance--and I stress that this is merely an example--only 135 seats, I need another 40 to achieve a majority. If somebody offers me 20-25 and I reach 155, I might consider that these 155 seats are not an advantage but a disadvantage because they totally prevent me from gaining 176 seats."

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE DISCUSSES RESULTS OF FRG ELECTIONS

LD090855 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 6 Oct 80 p 8

[Editorial: "German Continuity"]

[Text] The Socialist-Liberal coalition that has governed the German Federal Republic for 11 years yesterday had its mandate extended by the German voters until 1984. It was a personal triumph for Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, whose political authority has thus been further strengthened both at home and abroad. However it was not an unimportant political event that Foreign Minister Genscher's Liberal Party was at the same time able to achieve such a notable success, that liberal influence on the government's policies will be strengthened. This is of course a matter of personal satisfaction for Genscher, who fought an intelligent and balanced election campaign and gave decency a chance, but this is also a politically useful development for Chancellor Schmidt, who has had his alibi for pursuing conservative policies with a socialist-liberal government strengthened.

The Western alliances are spared a lot of problems because Franz Josef Strauss did not achieve election in his first and last attempt at becoming chancellor. Continuity is easier to live with than violent renewal, even though it was probably more the form rather than the content of German politics that would have changed if he had succeeded in reaching his goal. Deservedly or otherwise, many people will have heard with relief that Strauss is now a past phenomenon in central German politics.

From other viewpoints the outcome of the German election is perhaps not the happiest. It is at any rate worth asking whether it is healthy for German democracy that the same party or coalition of parties remains uninterruptedly in power in Bonn for 15 years. This is too long for the same people to bear the responsibility of government, and it is too long for the same people to sit in opposition. There was a touch of desperation about the German Social-Democrats during Adenauer's long monopoly of power, and there were perhaps also signs of desperation in the reasons why the Christian unions this year appointed Strauss as their candidate for chancellor. The eternal opposition leaders in Bonn do presumably have the possibility of dealing with their own personal frustration at not being able to govern by withdrawing to politics in their own provinces, as Strauss and Stoltenberg did, but it is nevertheless healthier for Germany that power changes hands. The need for a change will come to characterize both the parliament and government in Bonn in the next few years, because it points to a new time of upheaval, before new coalitions take the stage.

FAEROESE TO ELECT NEW PARLIAMENT ON 8 NOVEMBER

Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 27 Sep 80 pt 1 p 5

[Text] The Faeroese will elect a new Lagting on Saturday 8 November. The decision was reached after the Lagting early in the week adopted a resolution to dissolve itself. The proposal for dissolution was introduced by Lagmand [Prime Minister] Atli Dam (Social Democrat) after he determined that the governing coalition could not be maintained. Earlier the Liberal People's Party discussed prospects of a new coalition with the largest Faeroe party, the Conservative Coalition Party. However the negotiations failed, thus necessitating the elections.

GENERAL SEES DEFENSE CUTBACK ENDANGERING 'NATO SOLIDARITY'

LD090801 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 5 Oct 80 Part 2 p 8

[Jens Thomsen interview with General A.C.B. Vegger: "We Are Standing at a Crossroads in Our History"]

[Excerpts] "We have never had such good prospects of building up a strong defense as we have today, and I doubt whether we will have such favorable conditions again.

For this reason the defense negotiations this time are more important and fundamental than in the past, and have more far-reaching consequences. We are standing at a relatively major crossroads in our history," General Vegger said.

"We hear today that Danish defenses are a superpower's defenses in miniature. This is not correct. The individual parts of Danish defenses are built up according to how a unit is to look by international, European standards. This is all the more necessary since Jutland divisions are to fight side by side with units from the Western alliance. We have not been twiddling our thumbs in NATO in the many years that we have been a member. We have looked year by year at the forces at our disposal in the different countries, and every year recommendations have been made as to how these troops in individual countries could be improved.

"In Denmark we have followed these recommendations as far as has been economically possible. Today Danish forces are adapted to the larger international, European picture. Danish defenses, German defenses and the reinforcements that are expected to be sent here are determined by and adapted to each other. There are, for example, certain artillery divisions that we do not have in Denmark, but others have them. Simply for this reason we cannot talk of a Danish superpower defense in lilliputian form.

"We live in an area where land and water form a geographical whole. Under these special conditions we have every possibility of getting out three armed services to work together and thus increase the degree of exploitation. In this area I think we are superior to our opponents.

"The detailed cooperation between our three services also answers the question of the extent to which we could do without one of them. We could, but only if another nation took over the tasks we now fulfill ourselves, and here we touch on the principle of sovereignty which is often brought up in connection with our defense planning.

"A credible defense is not only a question of quality, but also of the number of soldiers. On this last point we have begun to fall behind in a worrisome manner. As far as the army is concerned we have cut back time and again since 1960. We have now gone so far—or deep, you might say—that our units after only 3 days of exercises are exhausted, because they are expected to be like Tordenskjold's [18th century naval hero who defeated Sweden] men. A Danish unit is today often only one-third as large as a corresponding German unit. I would also like to have been given more soldiers. I would like to have seen the cutbacks on Sjaelland avoided, and a special combat group set up on Lolland-Falster.

Colland-Falster is today completely unprotected, and this cannot be justified.

"There is so much talk today of percentages. I consider it a disadvantage that Danish defenses are discussed on the basis of these zero, 1, 3, or 5-percent increases. When NATO once put forward proposals that individual nations should increase their defense budgets by 3 percent, it was an attempt to bring the alliance up to the standards that were necessary. But unfortunately it coincided with a discussion of defense in Denmark. The future of Danish defense is not a question of percentages but of finding out what tasks we must carry out for our own sake. Then we can talk about what forces and money we need. Instead of figures we should look at quality and solidarity. If NATO solidarity, expressed in the motto 'one for all and all for one' is broken, it could have extremely unpleasant consequences for the Western world. Our opponents could begin to see a certain vacillation in the ranks, with dangerous consequences.

"If we cut back one-third of our defense forces in a defense bill, this will reduce the chances of bringing reinforcements here.

"It is not metal that will be sent in, but living human beings. A government that is deciding whether to send reinforcements to an area must carefully consider whether these reinforcements are being sent to their deaths or whether they have a chance of carrying out their intended mission. The decision is as serious as that."

AFTENPOSTEN: U.S. SHOULD RATIFY SALT-II TO AID GENEVA TALKS

[Editorial: "New Nuclear Arms Negotiations"]

[Text] A small, but welcome glimmer of light--at a time when reports of wars and conflicts are coming in more frequently than usual--is the agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union to begin "preparatory talks on discussions" on the medium-range missiles in Europe. A week today representatives of the two countries will meet for an opening round in Geneva, without preconditions and without agreement on much more than that such talks would be useful. A special advisory group on the Western side will aid the Americans and ensure that the views of the other Western European NATO nations will obtain a hearing, for the talks cover arms which are or will be stationed in or aimed at our part of the world. Full control of the weapons lies in the hands of the two superpowers, and the final responsibility for the course and outcome of the talks rests directly and heavily on them.

Last fall the extended medium-range nuclear arms, now to be the subject of the Geneva talks, were the subject of intense controversy here in Norway. The reason was the NATO plans to respond to the Soviet Union's deployment of the new mobile and highly accurate 3-warhead 55-20 missiles by resolving both to acquire similar arms in the West and to offer Moscow talks on an agreed balance between East and West in this particular arms field. Russian modernization had already upset the old balance. On 12 December last year NATO's foreign and defense ministers adopted their double resolution, which within 3 years will lead to the deployment of 572 new Western rockets--if negotiations have not led to limitations on the Eastern side in the meantime.

The Kremlin rejected all forms of talks unless NATO revised its decision, and this was a rejection that leftwing forces in Norwegian politics not only thought was final, but also accepted as fully justified. Events have now shown that the Kremlin leaders have a much better understanding of the realities of power--including military power--than their political sympathizers in Norway. The Russians have realized that propaganda and threats can no longer prevent Western measures from reestablishing an approximate balance, and we hope that their agreement to the meeting in Geneva indicates that they are now prepared to try negotiations instead. This has taken 10 months. The course of events in this period does not prove that it is always right to negotiate with the Russians from a position of strength, but it does prove that it is not always wrong--which is what the Norwegian opponents of the NATO resolution would have had us believe.

The only thing that seems clear at the present time is that the new talks will be extremely complicated and fairly protracted, for reasons that are both political and technical: Various considerations for many allies must be weighed against each other and swift technological developments must be dealt with and fixed in an unambiguous text for a treaty. The question of the relationship of these talks to the SALT negotiations on strategic arms will be especially difficult, including, in the first round, the question of which arms categories will be covered by what we hope will develop--within a reasonable time--into real negotiations in Geneva.

The West should be prepared to discuss enlarging the range of arms categories included in the talks, provided that this would lead to agreement and to a true balance between East and West. We in the West ought also to be aware that we are negotiating with a psychological handicap because the United States has not ratified the SALT II agreement, signed all of 16 months ago. At the present time such a ratification would the most fruitful contribution the United States could make to success during in talks on nuclear arms in Europe.

NAVY CALLS OFF HUNT FOR MYSTERY SUBMARINE

LD062112 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 6 Oct 80

[Interview 6 October with Vice Admiral Bengt Schuback of Swedish Navy by Correspondent (Lars Redaktersson)--live or recorded]

[Text] Today the 3-week hunt for a submarine in the Stockholm archipelago was ended. The last time the navy had contact with the submarine was 1 week ago, but even so it is preferred not to rule out the possibility that the submarine is still in Swedish waters. It could be damaged, it is stated.

Altogether the search has cost the taxpayers about 3 million kronor, and between 500 and 600 people took part in the search, which did not give any direct result. The defense staff cannot state from which country the submarine originated or why it was, or is, here. Despite this, the defense staff noted today in a press statement that the hunt for the submarine showed how alert the Swedish defense is and that Sweden is not to be treated lightly. Vice Admiral Bengt Schuback states:

[Schuback] I hope that it is interpreted that way. We employed the resources we had and we increased the efforts and used the means in the correct way and with firmness.

[Question] But this is the most serious violation of territory since the war, according to the defense minister. Is it then a failure that the Swedish defense did not succeed in making the submarine surface?

[Answer] No, I do not think it is a failure. It shows the difficulty we face in peace time in resorting to an appropriate amount of force, for after all a number of people are concerned in the case. We managed to strike a good balance and to indicate our view that we will not tolerate this any longer. One cannot go to unlimited lengths, but we were prepared to go quite far to surface this submarine, and this, I think has made an impression.

[Question] Well, despite this record search, which has continued until today, is it not remarkable that it was not possible to find out which nation the submarine came from?

[Answer] No, it is not remarkable. I cannot recall that any nation since World War II has been able to stand up and say that its territory has been violated by a submarine of such and such a nationality.

[Question] The commander-in-chief stressed earlier in an interview that it would be practically impossible for this submarine to escape such a search. Has the submarine now done the impossible?

[Answer] Yes, in that it escaped from our grasp without our being able to identify it with certainty. This is correct, but otherwise we have fullfilled the task and it is no longer here.

[Question] Do you exclude the possibility that it may be lying on the sea bottom damaged by a depth charge?

[Answer] I think that is very unlikely.

[Question] But it cannot be excluded?

[Answer] We will have to check, but I do not think so.

ARMED FORCES COMMANDER DISCUSSES DEFENSE PRIORITIES

LD090907 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 5 Oct 80 p 5

[Erik Liden interview with Swedish Armed Forces Commander in Chief Lennary Ljung: "More Refresher Exercises and Improved Readiness"]

[Text] Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung wants to improve defense effectiveness next year by having more and larger refresher exercises, better readiness, more armed ships and further decentralization of depots. Lennart Ljung is critical of the decrease in resources for the defense forces. "It is extremely regrettable that Sweden is dropping its guard when the rest of the world, deeply worried by the tense international situation, is giving its defense forces increased resources. I said earlier this summer that the security situation is worrisome. Nothing has changed for the better since then--in fact rather the opposite. It is also a serious matter that we cannot give the Riksdat the defenses that it ordered in 1977. Today there is a 2 million-kronor shortfall in materials and organization."

To right a number of deficiencies the commander in chief wants to give priority to speed and flexibility. He first intended to adopt these measures in 1982, but the attention of the rest of the world, not least through the submarine incidents, makes the commander in chief want to step up Swedish readiness sooner. "As early as next year we will be arming more ships and will be able at the same time to train navy conscripts for a longer period in the right surroundings. I want to improve the defense forces' mobilization speed, by further spreading defense equipment stockpiles, for example. It is also pleasing that we are once again able to give refresher training to our conscripts to the full extent, a few years earlier than we had estimated. As far as our precious peacetime organization is concerned, I do not want to be wise after the event and say that it should have been rationalized long ago. However, units must be disbanded so that we can make real savings. We cannot afford any more Arvidsjaurs or moves between Uppsala and Enkoeping. I am aware that there will be lively debate in many municipalities, but we must take these steps now."

Lennart Ljung also pointed out that he cannot take local economic considerations into account in his recommendations. These he will leave to the government. The commander in chief also wants to invest in the defense forces' wartime organization, more exercises in sensitive terrain for wartime missions and more senior staffs with wartime organization in peacetime, for example, in the defense district regiments. This also improves combat readiness. "However, a reasonable economic compensation system is crucial for the future. We cannot live with a net price index as an inflation compensation system. It fluctates incredibly quickly in an unstable economy, and compensations come too late. Here the Rikdsag must make a definite decision for the defense forces in a positive direction. Despite staff reductions unparalleled in the public sector of 1.5 percent per year since 1972, peacetime running costs continue to rise."

Lennary Ljung also reminded me of recent cases of spying for the Soviet Union. "In a secret memorandum to the government I will outline how much it will cost to repair what can be repaired. I will ask for special funds for this. It will take time and be expensive, and some things cannot now be repaired. Military leaders see this treason as very serious. The superpowers' intelligence services, however, have no second thoughts about using these methods. Naturally we are doing everything possible to prevent high treason."

"I have requested of the government that refresher exercises should not be touched. They are decisive for our credibility abroad." In this connection the commander in chief is proud to say that the conscripts that left the armed forces this year are the best defense forces intake in 10-15 years. "Cooperation between officers and men worked well. Loyalty has been intense and the conscripts had a positive interest in defense. Officer recruitment in all categories is continuing to rise. Nevertheless, we must make more stringent demands during exercises. Field discipline must be better. We must be more professional soldiers."

DAILY TELEGRAPH HITS CARTER'S CAMPAIGN TACTICS

[Editorial: "Carter Takes the Low Road"]

[Text] Is anyone outside the United States still tuned into the American election campaign? Apart from those who have to be, like for example President Brezhnev of the Soviet Union, it seems unlikely, so dull and petty has it become. The blame for this lies mainly with President Carter. He is showing himself as a routine in-fighting politicians, now that he has his back to the wall. Nothing wrong with that, it might be retorted. All politicians get mean when they are fighting for survival. That is part of the job. There is something in that, but not very much. The Presidency is still, after all, the most important post in the non-communist world. The trouble with Mr Carter is that what ought to be his strongest argument for re-election—his record in the White House during his first term—is not a convincing one.

This vacuum at the heart of the Carter campaign comes out particularly clearly over the matter of American defence strength, which has emerged as one of the main issues. A chief plank of Mr Carter's first campaign was that he would reduce defence spending. Then, and during his early period in the White House, he paraded openly pacifist sentiments. In fact, defence spending has increased during his tenure, though not to any great purpose, or in such a way as to remedy what are now widely accepted as serious deficiencies in the armed forces. Be that as it may, Mr Carter—such is the atmosphere of the times—is now posing as a man who is boosting American defence capabilities like nobody's business. At the same time, he tries to depict Mr Reagan as a warmonger, he is trying to have it both ways. The same goes for other issues. Budget deficits used to be bad. Now, it seems, they are good—that might bring in the Kennedyites, and so on. He calls Mr Reagan a racist one day, then has to retract it the next.

This may be one way to win an election campaign, but it does not match up to conceived notions of the sort of person an American President should be. Perhaps we expect too much of an American President. Perhaps; but it will be sad if the idea that they can rise to the level of their office should fade out entirely.

FOREIGN SECRETARY, PRC FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSS HONG KONG

[John Bulloch report: "Closer British and Chinese Links to Protect Hong Kong"]

[Excerpts] Closer co-operation between British troops and officers of the Chinese First Army along the Hong Kong border is likely following talks in London yesterday between Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, and Mr Huang Hua, the Chinese foreign minister.

Huang is spending two days in Britain on his way back from the United Nations in New York, in part to make up for the cancelled trip to China by Lord Carrington.

The foreign secretary called off his visit during the crisis caused by the Iran-Iraq war.

But while Lord Carrington and Huang were talking "in general terms" in London—according to the Foreign Office—Sir Murray MacLehose, the governor of Hong Kong, was spelling out the threat to the colony posed by continued illegal Chinese immigration.

Britain and China agree on the need for control of the Hong Kong border, as Lord Carrington found in his talks with Huang. The problem is how to further tighten the already closely guarded frontier, with its flood-lit fence, watch towers and constantly patrolling troops.

FRANCE AGREES ON EEC REPAYMENTS TO BRITAIN

[Alan Osborn Dispatch: "570 M Pound Win for Britain at EEC"]

[Text] Luxembourg—Britain yesterday won an important Common Market victory when the foreign ministers of the Nine agreed to stop blocking EEC budget repayments.

In practical terms this means the Treasury is assured of getting back in the present financial year at least 570 million pounds sterling of the 740 million pounds sterling promised in the agreement to reduce Britain's EEC contributions.

The relatively small balance will come in time. And there had been real fears that most, if not all, of the rebate would be delayed.

Yesterday's decision was unexpected and highly satisfying for Britain. It means the French and Germans have backed down from the tough stand they were taking over the budget repayments.

France had been effectively suggesting that the money should not be handed over until Britain had delivered on its broad commitments over EEC farm prices and fisheries policy.

But the foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, visibly delighted at the outcome, insisted yesterday that no new pledges had been on farm prices and there had been merely a repetition of the promise to try to agree a fisheries policy by the end of the year.

Officials speculated that the breakthrough had been made possible by the cordial note struck by Mrs Thatcher at her meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing of France last month. At one stage the row over the repayments had threatened a serious breach in Anglo-French relations but these fears can now presumably be laid to rest.

For the government, yesterday's agreement will have important repercussions for the handling of economic policy. With total certainty now for receiving 570 million pounds sterling-and possibly a good deal more-the chancellor of the exchequer will be able to make firmer assumptions than hitherto about the public sector borrowing requirement.

However the chief importance of the deal is likely to be political and, in particular, in its suggestion that Britain's relations with the other EEC countries have taken a clear turn for the better.

Of the money coming back this year about 390 million pounds sterling will be in grants for specific investment projects and 180 million pounds sterling in the form of a straight cash payment. Essentially the ministers agreed that not less than 80 percent of total investment money should be handed over before the end of next March and 75 percent of the straight cash.

The formula devised yesterday provides for the Commission to pay over the money unless a "qualified majority" opposes a specific project. Lord Carrington explained that so long as Britain plus one other "big" country or two "small" countries approved the transaction it would go through.

If there was a disagreement it would be settled by the EEC Council of Ministers, but he did not think this was likely to happen.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS DISCUSS TERRITORIAL ISSUES

Speaking prior to the meeting--this is the fourth meeting in the new round of talks--the Greek Cypriot side's representative, Ioannidhis, said that he was going to submit proposals on the territorial aspect and expressed the hope that the Turkish Cypriot side would do likewise. He stated: The territorial question is of great importance to a fair and lasting Cyprus solution and it would be useful to have at the negotiating table concrete proposals which would serve as basis for constructive discussion.

The Turkish Cypriot side's representative, Onan, answering a question as to whether his side was going to submit proposals as had been agreed, said that the Turkish Cypriot side was going to explain its views on the question. He said: Definitely, there must be some criteria which, after agreement, would more easily lead to a solution of the problem.

Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy, said that the talks will be continued on the basis of discussing the agenda questions by rotation, and that the meetings will be held once a week, as has been the practice so far. Mr Gobbi said the climate prevailing at the talks is good and expressed the hope that this climate will be maintained. He said: Nevertheless, it would be wrong to believe that an early solution can be achieved during negotiations over vital interests. He added: My main goal now is not to repeat the mistakes of the past.

Today's meeting was attended--in addition to Mr Gobbi and the two interlocutors--by Mr Gorge, deputy special envoy of the UN Secretary General; the Greek Cypriot side's advisers at the talks, Mr Triandafillidhis and Mrs Soulioti; Mr Onan's advisers, Mr Ertekun, Mr Tatar and Mr Fellaoglu, a specialist on land surveying matters.

A UN communique released after the meeting says that today's meeting began with a discussion of the fourth subject on the agenda, the territorial aspect. The communique adds: Both sides explained their respective positions, and a frank exchange of views followed in the same spirit as in earlier meetings.

The next meeting will take place next Wednesday, 15 October, at 1530. The meeting will continue the examination of the first subject on the agenda, the reaching of agreement on Varosha resettlement under UN auspices, in accordance with point five of the 10 May 1979 agreement.

BAYRAK: GREEKS IMPEDE ZONAL TOURIST TRAVEL

[Text] Two foreign tourists, a West German and an American who recently arrived at Ercan State Airport for a visit to Cyprus, have been prevented by the Greek Cypriots from going to the south. Other foreign travelers visiting the north who attempted to cross the border have been interrogated by Greek Cypriot policemen in civilian clothes. The aim is supposedly to obtain information about the north and to discourage foreign tourists from visiting the Federated State.

At the same time, the Greek Cypriots have been preventing foreign tourists in the south from visiting the north. Observers say the Greek Cypriot action is contrary to Point 6 of the Denktas-Kiprianou agreement of 19 May 1979 which calls on the two sides to take practical measures to promote goodwill, mutual confidence and the return to normal conditions.

FOREIGN MINISTER MITSOTAKIS ATTENDS EC COUNCIL

AT081420 Athens NEWS in English 8 Oct 80 p 12

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis was the first Greek minister to attend the EEC Foreign Ministers' Council. Mr Mitsotakis participated, as an observer, in the meeting that took place in Luxembourg yesterday morning.

Luxembourg Foreign Minister and Chairman of the Council Mr Thorn welcomed Mr Mitsotakis on behalf of the council and all EEC member countries. The Greek foreign minister expressed his thanks and his satisfaction on being the first minister to represent Greece as the 10th EEC member at the council. The council dealt with the following issues: aid to Portugal; various demands by Third World African countries; regional policy; the issue of steel production in Europe.

I KATHIMERINI SUGGESTS PUBLIC AIRING OF U.S., NATO ARGUMENTS

[Editorial: "Just a Proposal...."]

[Text] We shall make a proposal in the hope that the Greek Government, the U.S. Government and the NATO secretary general will accept it. The Greek Government's acceptance of the proposal will mean allowing the audiovisual facilities of Greek radio and television to be used by two speakers. The first speaker will represent the government of Jimmy Carter and the other speaker will represent Luns. The dispatch of the two speakers will signify the acceptance of the proposal by Washington and by the NATO secretary general.

At their disposal will be placed the necessary interpreters and all the time they think necessary to expound their views in comfort. The subject of their talk will be: Why Greece must accept a return to the NATO military wing under prerequisites different from those which operated when Greece became a member of the alliance and which apply to other members of the alliance. The representative of the U.S. Government will be able to extend his remarks to cover the problem of the U.S. bases in Greece, and can explain why the signing of an agreement for operation of these bases benefits Greece even though the United States officially adopts the viewpoint that part of the Greek continental, sea and airspace should not be controlled by Greeks but by ...Turks!

That is, he should explain how the Greek national territorial defense--integrity, that is--will be served by those U.S. bases which will exist on this territory when the prerequisite for establishing the bases will be curtailment of Greece's integrity!

The answer we Greeks are giving to the previous question is being denounced by the Americans and responsible NATO officials as lacking in allied logic, with the result, they claim, that a feeling of anti-Americanism and anti-NATOism is being cultivated among the Greek people. However, since we Greeks do not want to be unjustly accused of anti-Americanism and anti-"allied" feelings, we propose, precisely to the two "concerned" parties, to proceed themselves--through direct communication--in correctly enlightening the Greeks.

When the two parts of our "defensive shield" feel that they have exhausted their efforts at enlightenment, then we should advance to the second proposal: Hold a plebiscite asking the Greek people whether or not they accept a return to NATO and the operation of the U.S. bases under the terms demanded by our neighbors, the Turks--terms whose benefits will have been put forth in the arguments of the two "luminaries." Obviously, the results of the plebiscite will be binding on the government, any government.

We are sure that no man of ... bad faith will have such bad faith that he will reject the objectivity and good faith of the two proposals. These proposals will eliminate the only argument that can be supported with some semblance of justice: that the lopsided briefing of the Greeks on these two critical issues is why the U.S. and NATO positions have not been accepted thus far although, to be frank, these positions do have some domestic supporters in point.

Of course, this question arises: What will happen if the Greeks do not prove to be sufficiently receptive to the enlightening arguments of the Pentagon and NATO and decide against a return to NATO and the operation of foreign military bases on Greek soil? Will the Greeks remain "like reeds in the field" [a Greek proverb signifying loneliness] without allied "support on which to lean," exposed to any aggressive intentions or predatory appetites.

This question has all the prerequisites for being thrown into the waste basket as soon as it is expressed. What kind of NATO and U.S. "support" was given for the preservation of Cyprus' integrity? What kind of U.S. and NATO support is being given to preserve the integrity of Greek territory against the undisguised avidity of the Turks? Even more, what is restraining our warlike neighbors from attacking us and grabbing the things they covet? What is also restraining the Americans from "imposing," through the indisputable superiority of their strength, the operation of the bases under their exclusive control?

Is it fear--that the Greek army will crush anyone--that frustrates such manifestations? What restrains them is the certainty that as soon as any kind of attack is made against Greece everything in this calm and wise area of the Western world will change; then the great loser will not be Greece but the entire West because our recent history has proved that it is not Greece which relies on the West but the West which needs Greece!

Undoubtedly the proposal for the televised appearance of the apologists of U.S. and NATO insistence that we also adopt Turkish demands so that anti-Americanism and anti-NATOism will disappear from among the Greek populace (!) will be rejected as "anti-allied". However, let them also finally reject the idea that by pressuring us and making covert threats they will convince us that it is better for us to be crippled within NATO than to remain outside of it and be sound of limb! This is... more than anti-allied!

EC TALKS ON PRICES--The talks between Greek and Community experts for the review of prices and subsidies for Greek products began here yesterday morning. The talks, which are to establish the differences in price between Community and Greek products, will continue until 18 October, and Community prices will be set on the basis of their findings. The talks will also include certain final adjustments in the agricultural sector concerning cotton production and aid grants to Greek cotton farmers, the protection of Greek currant and fig growers, and assessment of existing competition from foreign countries producing tobacco similar to ours. [Text] An agreement on the $27 million loan to be extended by the United Arab Emirates economic development fund for the second petrochemical plant being bult by the petrochemical corporation [Petkim] in Aliaga has been signed in Abu Dhabi.

According to information received from the Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General, the loan will cover a period of 20 years--with 5 years grace--and will be subject to 5 percent expense.

The second petrochemical plant in Aliaga will cost 132 billion Turkish liras. The plant, which will be operational in 1983, will produce raw materials for fertilizers and various plastic products.

VOCTP SAYS BRZEZINSKI FAVORS MILITARY AID TO JUNTA

TA070947 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 7 Oct 80

[Station commentary]

[Text] The military junta has asked for aid from U.S. imperialism in a bid to equip the Turkish Armed Forces. Turgut Ozal, the lackey of the metal products industralists union [MESS] bosses and of the collaborationist and monopolist capital in the government--an extension of the junta-- has returned home after completing his contacts in Washington and London. Reports that Deputy Prime Minister and State Minister Ozal met with Brzezinski--the hireling of the U.S. war industry monopolies--in Washington last Friday and that during the meeting Brzezinski expressed the Washington government's support for the militarist clique's requests has provoked various reactions.

It is reported that the request to meet with Brzezinski in a bid to express Turkey's desire for the modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces--which will spark off an armaments race--came from the Turkish side. In this meeting, Brzezinski favorably received the arms requests by the militarist clique and approved the ensuring arms trade. Talks conducted by Ozal with the imperialist IMF, the World Bank, OECD member countries, [word indistinct] banks and Washington government officials have proved once more the subservient relations the junta has with the U.S. and NATO imperialists and the fact that the military coup in our country was planned in Washington and NATO centers.

During his visit to Washington, the military junta's deputy prime minister and state minister, Turgut Ozal, also met--among other White House officials--President Carter's assistant for security affairs, Zbigniew Brzezinski. Let us examine who is this Brzezinski whose aid the pro-American junta solicited as soon as it seized power in order to acquire more arms under the guise of modernizing the armed forces in accordance with NATO plans.

As is well known, Brzezinski is the most trusted among assistants for Carter, the President of the United States--the foremost imperialist state. Among the U.S. bourgeois politicians that have settled into the White House, Brzezinski is the preeminent representative of the U.S. war monopolies and the most militarist circles. Brzezinski's name is directly linked with the Carter administration's policies pursued during the last few years of undermining detente, of escalating armaments and particularly of increasing the threat of a nuclear war as well as NATO's aggressive plans.

Brzezinski's political personality is revealed by the contents of the new U.S. nuclear strategy which he masterminded. This strategy is based on the probability of a regional and limited nuclear war. It envisages an intensified preparation in the field of nuclear arms by the Pentagon in the event of such a possibility. But the real purpose is to prepare to inflict a nuclear blow on the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries. This strategy--in whose preparation Brzezinski played an important role--envisages a nuclear blow to the main Soviet strategic centers, big cities and industrial regions. In brief, dear listeners, under the guise of an imminent limited nuclear war, he is dragging the world to a nuclear disaster.

Brzezinski is one of those who planned the NATO resolutions of Brussels. He wants the deployment of 600 nuclear missiles to Western Europe in order to ensure imperialism's military supremacy over socialist countries. Brzezinski favors a military attack by the United States in the Middle East. He is directing preparations to this end. Brzezinski is the fervent supporter of cooperation with the militarists in Beijing based on anti-Sovietism. He favors the intensified arming of the Chinese armed forces. Brzezinski is also the planner of the military operation in Iran--a dangerous adventure undertaken before war broke out.

Brzezinski has prepared and directed the slander campaign against the Soviet Union which extended its aid to the Afghan people and he has personally participated in these provocations. Brzezinski, who provocatively posed with a weapon in his hands at the Afghan border when he visited Pakistan, is making efforts to arm the Chinese and Pakistani armed forces and to prepare armed gangs in a bid to destroy the Afghan revolution.

Brzezinski believes that a half-million-strong Turkish Army is not powerful enough and that the existing NATO and U.S. bases are not sufficient. He is foremost among the White House and Brussels ringleaders who are making efforts to arm the Turkish Armed Forces in order to strengthen NATO's southeastern flank, to draw Greece back into NATO's military wing and to use our country as a springboard and outpost in aggression against the socialist countries and military adventures against neighboring countries. Thus Brzezinski's political personality is revealed. He is the enemy of peace, of detente and of the peoples.

W. EUROPEAN COMMUNISTS OPEN BRUSSELS MEETING

LD081652 Brussels in French to Africa 1600 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] Twentyone delegations are taking part in the conference of West European Communist parties which opened this morning in Brussels. Its theme is the economic crisis in capitalist countries and problems linked to European integration.

In his opening speech Louis Van Geyt, president of the Communist Party of Belgium, stressed the need for Communist parties to present alternative proposals for the short-term and long-term. Mr Van Geyt also spoke of Communists' concern at the upsurge of the extreme right. He paid tribute to the victims of Bologna, Munich and Paris.

MILITARY FIGURE ON FAILURE OF POLITICAL PARTIES

LD081333 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 5 Oct 80 p 5

[Manuel Beca Murias interview with Captain Rodrigo Sousa e Castro: "The Parties Have Failed"]

[Text] Lisbon, 4 October--Captain Rodrigo Sousa e Castro is called a "watchdog." He watches over the partly socialist constitution that was written after the military coup in 1974. When the military handed over power to a civilian government 2 years later a revolutionary council of officers was appointed to watch over the constitution. He is a member of this group.

In 1974 he belonged to the group of young officers in the captains' movement or the armed forces movement, as the officers behind the coup were called. They all had one thing in common--they had served in the Portuguese colonies, where their view of society had been changed and this had inspired the coup.

In 1975 he was among the officers behind the countercoup that put Portugal on the road of Western democracy. Today he is considered to support the country's president, Ramalho Eanes, who completely neutralized the military's leftist influence in November 1975.

Manuel Beca Murias, DAGENS NYHETER's special correspondent, interviewed Sousa e Castro in the shadow of the threat that the constitution could be rewritten after this fall's two elections.

[Question] What positive things were achieved by the revolution in 1974 and what promises remain to be fulfilled?

[Answer] The transition to democracy and the decolonization of the Portuguese colonies are the two main achievements. However, the goals of achieving full economic and social justice have not yet been reached. The loss of our colonies and the simultaneous crisis in the world economy were difficult realities that determined the growth of the Portuguese economy, and no government either on the right or the left could alter this. Behind the political-ideological questions there is a deadlocked situation that is hidden behind repeated demagogic promises from the political leaders.

[Question] Do you think that the right has gained any ground in the last 12 months?

[Answer] We cannot speak of progresses for the right or decline for the left, but only of the general inability of the different parties to put forward and implement proposals which correspond to the fundamental wishes of a majority of the Portuguese people.

[Question] Do you think that the elections will correct this possible list to the right?

[Answer] Never since 1974 have the electors been as unsure as they are on the eve of this election. Neither the Democratic Alliance nor the left has any sure indications of what is going to happen. If the Democratic Alliance loses, this means that the destruction of the center-left will have become a reality in Portugal in less than 2 years, if the socialist coalition will not, once and for all, adapt its progressive program to Portuguese reality. But even then the party would be faced with a revolt in its right wing. To sum up: This is a challenging prospect for an outsider, but a worrisome picture for every good Portuguese.

[Question] Is there a danger of a rightwing coup?

[Answer] That is a good question for the next NATO Council meeting....

[Answer] He is a misunderstanding--he was never an officer in the sense that he had a military career behind him. He was a civil servant--in strictly political terms--under the Salazar and Caetano regimes. He is an ultra conservative who has been given the halo of being an educated man. He pursued colonial policy skillfully and effectively--mostly as a politician, not as an officer. He arrived on the political scene a generation too late. Recently he has disillusioned many of his admirers. Of the presidential candidates he is the one who uses the most opportunistic and most unfair methods. He can cause local acts of violence since he makes use of veterans from the colonial period who have pronounced rightwing sympathies. He is bound to make the presidential election the most violent since 25 April 1974.

SWISS COMMISSION REVIEWS FAULTS IN TYPE 68 TANK

[Unattributed dispatch: "Elimination of Fault in 68 Tank"]

[Text] Bern, 2 Oct (SDA)--The military commission of the National Council chaired by Rudolf Friedrich (FDP, Zuerich) has informed the members of the great chamber in writing that the experiences gathered to date in the elimination of faults on the type 68 tank justify a certain optimism. The results of the tests, however, have not yet been fully analyzed. The schedule for the elimination of faults has been streamlined so that the action should be wound up largely by the end of 1983. The shortcomings in the tanks of the first to third series of the type 68 tank can essentially be eliminated with the different contract credits (verpflichtungskredite) already approved. The Federal Council in July 1980 authorized the military department to pool available credit in the amount of 90 million francs for the entire fault-elimination program. The military commission has approved this course of action.

LE SOIR DISCUSSES BELGIAN GOVERNMENT CRISIS

LD091553 Brussels LE SOIR in French 8 Oct 80 pp 1-2

[Unattributed report: "Resignation Accepted, Martens Appointed Prime Minister-Designate"]

[Text] Mr Martens is no longer head of the outgoing government--he is already prime minister-designate. In fact, on Tuesday morning, the king accepted the Martens III government's resignation and immediately asked the former prime minister to form a new team. As early as 1000 Mr Martens was back at 16 Rue de la Loi where he discussed the situation with his main collaborators.

This means that the final effort made by the outgoing prime minister on Monday night to reverse the centrifugal movement which had developed within his team in recent days has been unsuccessful.

And yet, to endeavor, at the king's request, to restore a consensus among the six partners the prime minister submitted for their attention on Monday a 13--was it an omen?--page document in which he presented in three parts his recast proposals aimed at balancing public finances.

However, the Liberals expressed the view that despite a breaking up of the amounts concerned and the appoortionment of the sums in question among several items, these proposals did not differ from those which they had deemed it necessary to reject previously. Therefore, the 8-hour deliberations among majority party presidents and inner cabinet ministers proved unsuccessful.

About midnight on Monday the prime minister announced that he would submit another report to the king. He did this early in the morning with the known result.

On leaving the Monday meeting, Liberals and Socialists gave different versions of the reasons for the failure.

Party for Freedom and Liberty [PRL] President Jean Gol, who was accompanied by Party of Freedom and Progress [PVV] President Willy de Clercq and Postal Services Minister Herman de Croo, made the following statement: "The recent events are serious. Right from the beginning of the meeting we realized that the Socialists had decided to participate in it merely to see whether the Liberals were prepared to go along with what the Socialists and Social Christians had decided.

"The same proposals, albeit watered down and dressed up for the occasion, which our ministers had already rejected, were submitted to us and no real good will effort was made by the Socialists with a view to resolving the crisis."

At the end of the meeting a conciliatory proposal was put forward--it was proposed to reduce the taxes on small and medium enterprises by a total of 3 billion, but the Socialists rejected this proposals," Mr Gol also stated, adding that it then became clear that "there are in this country some political parties who stand in fear of the trade unions.

"As far as we are concerned, we are quite willing to continue in government and are prepared to negotiate but only with a view to taking responsible action. We want to extricate the country from the present crisis; we are not concerned about any ministerial portfolios. In our view, the negotiations have so far been unsuccessful."

As for Mr De Clercq, he emphasized the fact that even though the Liberals seemed islated last week, they are less isolated now since the proposal in favor of small and medium enterprises has been rejected by the Socialists, who, he asserted, were responsible for the failure of the discussion, adding that "this is serious because in the present tragic situation it is absolutely necessary to prevent any political crisis.

"We joined this government to ensure that public and social security finances are reorganized and if we cannot do this we see no need to remain in it," Mr De Clercq concluded.

Analysis by Socialists

Obviously, the Socialist Party President Andre Cools, Deputy Prime Minister Guy Spitaels, Dutch-speaking Socialist Party President Karel van Miert and Economic Affairs Minister Willy Claes emphasized that their political group has always accepted the prime minister's proposals whereas the Liberals first accepted budget decisions and proposals submitted to social interlocuters and then insisted on modifying them.

"It is certainly up to the prime minister to draw appropriate conclusions from this meeting and to report on it to the king," Mr Spitaels emphasized. And Mr Cools added: "It is not up to me to advise the king but since the Liberals are so fair and so strong, why not ask them to form a government?"

In particular, Mr Cools emphasized the fact that the Socialists did not reject the latest proposal for special aid to small and medium enterprises but only asked that the consequences of such aid, especially with respect to employment, be removed from the chapter headed "savings." However, we came up against the "Liberal groups's interpretation of the matter--the Liberals insisted that the 15 billion of savings in question be exceeded anyway," Mr Cools stated.

"We were not opposed to adjustments but we were opposed to one-way adjustments and if new sources of revenue were to appear, it would be normal to reduce savings, the French-speaking Socialist Party president stated, adding that "it is high time that the legend that the Socialists are against small and medium enterprises should be laid to rest. We have shown that the contrary is true, especially by presenting a bill providing for a one-person company."

The crisis must be resolved as soon as possible. The country can no longer understand what is going on and cannot afford any renegotiations, "Mr Cools also stated, adding that he is willing to do whatever is necessary to ensure that the crisis ends very soon.

Dutch-speaking Socialist Party President Karel van Miert said that he was sorry that the Liberals seem to wish to engage in a confrontation with the trade unions. "Trying to make others accept only its own viewpoint, as the Liberal group is doing, is contrary to the country's interests--there is no other way of extricating ourselves from the present situation except through ensuring the broadest possible consensus," Mr Van Miert stated.

According to Mr Claes, the Liberals' desire to save more than 15 billion was a kind of "obsession."

In conclusion, Mr Cools recalled that "in order to ensure the necessary reorganization, it is necessary to try to convince through consultations--in which not only trade unions but also employers, the middle classes and the farmers would participate--the greatest possible number of people."

The French-speaking Social Christian Party [PSC] Wants a Government That Would Last 4 Years.

The French-speaking Social Christians waited until Tuesday afternoon to make their reactions known. Their president--Mr Vanden Boeynants--stated among other things: "The PSC will reply positively to the prime minister-designate but it believes that a number of things must change seriously. At any rate, we want to see examined as a matter of urgency a bill which would ensure stability for the government's action. In the future we must have a government that will last as long as parliament. The PSC will ask the prime minister-designate clearly to determine a method for the functioning of his government that would make it more effective in its work and render its responsibilities more clear-cut.

We will agree to assume government responsibilities," Mr Vanden Boeynants added, "only insofar as the government program will make it possible to implement a policy which we believe to be really valid."

Replying to a question put to him, the PSC president also said that he had followed with great interest a statement made by Mrs Spaak who said that she is willing to support the government from the outside. "It is important to realize that an opposition party can envisage the possibility of supporting a sensible and balanced solution," he said. "However," he added, "we are mainly concerned about economic, social and budget problems."

The French-speaking Front [FDF] president is not the only person who envisages the possibility of supporting the government from outside. For instance, on Tuesday afternoon PRL President Gol stated that his party is prepared to participate in the implementation of the institutional reform which has already been initiated and also to participate--within an interparty agreement framework--in the implementation of a final reform acceptable to Brussels.

What Now?

The most likely solution is the formation of a bipartite Socialist-Social Christian Government. A Martens IV government would be a return to the Martens II formula, in other words the team that existed at the time when the FDF had been forced to remove their colleagues from the tripartite cabinet.

It is probably this trend which promoted FDF President Antoinette Spaak to announce that her party is prepared to give external support to a government that followed a policy acceptable to the FDF. Moreover by asserting that "any party is always a candidate for government" she was clearly leaving a possibility open for the future.

In any case it is difficult to see how Mr Martens might think of renegotiating a new tripartite government. Everybody realizes that things must move quickly. The outgoing majority party chiefs are aware of that and it will be noted that the king named the prime minister-designate without hesitation, and that this prime minister-designate is the prime minister who has just resigned.

Since the Socialists have stated on several occasions that they had accepted the prime minister's proposals, like the Social Christians, negotiations between the two parties would be kept to a strict minimum.

A Liberal-Social Christian bipartite government is impossible for several reasons. First, disagreement on Mr Martens' proposals. The fact that such an alliance does not give a majority in either the French-speaking community or in the Walloon regional council. Then there is the fear of strikes like the ones in 1960-1961.

However these are some of the speculations being made behind the scenes in the political world. Mr Wilfried Martens holds the cards and knows which trump he must use. If negotiations between Socialists and Social Christians failed, and that cannot be ruled out a priori, we would not be able to avoid new elections.

PAKISTANI PRESIDENT ARRIVES FOR BONN VISIT

[Text] President Mohammad Ziaul Haq arrived in Bonn today for talks with Federal German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. They will have a luncheon meeting during which Federal German Foreign Minister Genscher will also be present.

President Mohammad Ziaul Haq is also scheduled to meet Federal German President Carstens. Bonn Government sources said the German leaders hope to learn from President Zia the latest results of his good will efforts in the conflict between Iran and Iraq.

Press Release on Haq's Talks

[Text] Pakistan and the Federal Republic of Germany have agreed that a political solution of the Afghan issue should be urgently striven for and that the Iran-Iraq conflict should be resolved through negotiations between the two countries without outside interference. This has been stated in a press release issued in Bonn last night after talks between President Gen. Mohammad Ziaul Haq and FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. FRG Foreign Minister Genscher also participated in the talks.

The press release said the Afghanistan issue was discussed in detail and the Pakistan president informed FRG leaders about preparation of a draft resolution for a debate on the Afghan issue in the UN General Assembly. The FRG chancellor and the Pakistan president agreed that the core of a political solution to the Afghan issue must be complete withdrawal of Soviet troops as well as respect for the independent and nonaligned status of Afghanistan and the right of self-determination of the Afghan people.

Concerning the Iran-Iraq conflict, the press release said President Mohammad Ziaul Haq briefed the German leaders on his good will visit to Tehran and Baghdad as a representative of the Islamic Conference, as well as his discussions in New York and Washington. The president and the FRG chancellor were agreed that third countries should not interfere in the Iran-Iraq conflict and negotiations between the two parties should begin as soon as possible. It said both sides attached great importance to free shipping through the Strait of Hormuz for oil supplies to the world economy.

The press release said the Pakistan president and the FRG chancellor also had an exchange of views on the East-West situation in general, on important developments in Europe and on forthcoming arms control negotiations. They also discussed the Middle East situation.

According to the press release, also discussed was how the FRG can help solve the humanitarian problems of the more than 1 million Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

The president invited the FRG chancellor and the foreign minister to visit Pakistan. The invitation was accepted with thanks.

DPA on Talks, Haq Departure

LD091922 Hamburg DPA in German 1752 GMT 9 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 9 Oct (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Pakistan's President Ziaul Haq concur in the view that third states should not interfere in the Iraqi-Iranina conflict and that negotiations between the two parties to the conflict should be started as soon as possible. The Federal Press Office reported after a detailed exchange of views between Ziaul Haq, Schmidt and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher that both sides pointed to the great importance of free shipping through the Straits of Hormuz for the energy supplies of the world economy.

In addition Schmidt and the Pakistani president agreed that use should be made of the possibilities offered by the UN to seek a political solution to the Afghanistan question as quickly as possible, and that this should be based on the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops and on respect by all parties for an independent and nonaligned Afghanistan and for the Afghan people's right to self-determination.

Speaking at a press conference, the Pakistani president called on the conscience of the world not to lose sight of the fate of Soviet-occupied Afghanistan. Raising his voice, Ziaul Haq said: "If it is Afghanistan today, it could be Poland tomorrow. Then you will wake up." The oppression of 15 million Afghans by a superpower should not be allowed.

At the start of his 1-day working visit Ziaul Haq was welcomed with military honors by Federal President Karl Carstens. In the course of 1-hour talks between the two heads of state Carstens stated his concern at the warlike clashes between Iraq and Iran, which could have repercussions on Europe and on peace throughout the world.

Ziaul Haq congratulated the Federal Government and in particular the chancellor on their courageous criticism of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and their demand for the withdrawal of Soviet troops. The problem cannot be solved militarily but only politically. At present there are already 1.2 million Afghan refugees in Pakistan. This number will doubtless increase to 1.5 million by the end of the year. The president discussed with Schmidt and Genscher possibilities for German contributions to resolve this humanitarian question.

The Pakistani president described his exchange of views with Schmidt and Genscher as "very useful." He thanked the Federal Government for its financial aid to Pakistan, which has generously been increased. This evening Ziaul Haq, who invited the chancellor and federal foreign minister to visit Pakistan, left for home.

DIE WELT ADVOCATES GERMAN PRESENCE IN HORMUZ AREA

DW091525 Bonn DIE WELT in German 9 Oct 80 p 6

[Cay Graf Brockdorff editorial: "The Germans to the Gulf"]

[Text] Brussels NATO quarters are wondering what will happen if Khomeyni, for some reason only he may deem sensible, orders his navy to close the sea route of Hormuz.

At the moment there are no indications that he has any such intentions. Yet, these Brussels quarters go on to say, who can predict what Khomeyni will be thinking tomorrow morning?

Naturally the Americans are strong enough to reopen the straits. The actual problem lies somewhere else: Any action by the U.S. Navy against naval forces of Iran would be bound to jeopardize most extremely the lives of the U.S. hostages. This is why Washington is carefully trying to internationalize the protection of the Hormuz Straits. France has naval forces in the Indian Ocean. According to NATO data, Great Britain, too, has two modern warships there at present.

The Federal Republic of Germany, however, is absent. It is dependent on the import of crude oil from the states bordering on the Persian Gulf, to be sure, yet it stays out of the game. The German Government refers to constitutional regulations.

Hence, a noteworthy situation has emerged: The United States is much less--in an emergency even not at all--dependent on the oil from the Persian Gulf. But Bonn is. The consequence would be chaos if the oil were to cease flowing for an extended period of time. Still, it would be the Americans as a great order-maintaining power who would risk the lives of their hostages and sailors to clear the straits.

While this situation is undisputed, the Federal Government in Bonn rejects any idea of the Federal Republic possibly being called upon to dispatch a German warship to the Indian Ocean as a politically symbolic act of support for the Americans: The constitution does not permit it, they say. Yet the constitution, in the view of foreign observers, above all of the allies, presents itself as a strangely flexible instrument.

The provision to which the spokesman of the Federal Government--and, by the way, also those of the opposition, at least its competent spokesmen after some union remarks to the contrary during the election campaign--refer is Article 87 A, Section 2, of the Basic Law: "For purposes other than defense the armed forces may be used only to the extent as expressly permitted by this Basic Law." In this connection the Maunz/Duering/Herzog/Scholz commentary elucidates (quite in keeping with the dominant school of thought): "What must be interpreted as "defense" in this connection is the repulsion of an adversary who attacks the Federal Republic by force of arms, with military means, from outside." According to this, the Bundeswehr is permitted to fight only if the Federal Republic's territory is attacked militarily. One simply agrees that this stipulation does not rule out "forward defense." As regards exceptions permitted by the Basic Law, only action in the country is "expressly" mentioned (catastrophes and incidents requiring police-like tasks).

When the stipulations were formulated no one thought about action outside the Federal Republic, or rather there was the desire to rule it out so that there would not be the slightest impression of aggressiveness. Article 115 A, dealing once more with the "case of defense," starts out only from the assumption "that the area of the Federal Republic were attacked with arms or that such an attack was in the immediate offing." But the Federal Republic is a NATO member. It is committed to fight when a NATO partner is attacked.

In addition, it signed the NATO statement on Atlantic relations in Ottawa in 1974. The alliance declares in Article 11 that its interests can be affected by events in other parts of the world.

The Federal Security Council has lifted restrictions for the federal navy north of the 61st latitude; so it is permitted to operate at the limit of the pack ice zone where there is no area of the Federal Republic, but where an attack on these ships of the federal navy would be a "case of defense."

But where an attack could take place on vital German interests, where the appearance of one single German destroyer with guided missiles could increase deterrence politically and militarily, there the federal navy is not supposed to go?

Juridical problems are not decisive, at least not self-imposed juridical limits. The decisive question is: What should the President of the United States tell the widow of a navy pilot when she learns that her husband has crashed on a flight over the Straits of Hormuz while German sailors were dancing in Kiel? Some German politicians have agreed beyond what the parties have said that they would prefer letting their sailors dance to publicly supporting the taking of risks and the making of sacrifices which one can shift to others--as long as they will tolerate it. And a general has even brought up the polemical slogan "gunboat policy."

Due to concern for the German elections, Washington has handled the problem so far without giving it much publicity. But experts predict that this will change. The German politicians ought to prepare themselves for it. A change of constitution will be hardly necessary. The Basic Law has been interpreted rather broadly so far with regard to defense problems. That can also be done with this problem--if there is a desire to agree beyond party limits on the common national interest.

GOVERNMENT TO PROTEST GDR'S NEW CURRENCY EXCHANGE RULES

[Text] Bonn, 9 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government regards the increase in the minimum foreign currency sum to be exchanged by Western visitors [to the GDR] as a "heavy strain on relations between the two states." Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling said in Bonn this evening that this measure clearly contradicts the numerous statements by the GDR that it, too, is striving for a further normalization of relations with the Federal Republic.

The head of the Federal Republic's permanent mission in the GDR, State Secretary Guenther Gaus, has been instructed by the Federal Government to make representations to the GDR Foreign Ministry tomorrow.

COMMENTATOR GENNRICH VIEWS SPD-FDP COALITION DIFFICULTIES

[Claus Gennrich editorial: "Schmidt Will Have Difficulties"]

[Text] The new and old SPD/FDP coalition will have more difficulties along with its larger majority. With its 45, instead of 10, Bundestag seats [more than its rivals] it has created a greater distance between itself and the opposition. But under certain circumstances Schmidt can be less certain of that majority than the earlier smaller majority. The need for discipline in the ranks of the Social Democrats, who cover a wide spectrum, will now seem less compelling to some deputies. The risks for contradicting the government will lessen. It was embarrassing enough for Schmidt and Wehner that some Social Democrats opposed the Olympic boycott in the last Bundestag. Leftist Social Democrats wanted to attach conditions to the later help for Turkey, and even at the end of the legislative period they caused the reorganization of conscientious objection and [alternative] civilian service procedures to fail. But the strays from the party line have always shied back from crossing the limit that could have caused a fall of the government.

Now that limit seems to be fogged and Wehner seems to be without a whip. Even Wehner's threat to resign could seem desirable to some "conscientious leftists" among the Social Democrats: A change of faction leadership is in the offing anyway. On the horizon has appeared a candidate desirable even for leftist deputies, namely Justice Minister Vogel, who had been considered a "rightist" and who is supposed to replace Wehner. As the inspirer of the resolution on Turkey, he managed to attach hopes of leftist Social Democrats to his person, although he does not like to talk about that. This is only one card in the game of his ambitions.

But Wehner's castigation of the conscientious leftists, who hid behind the FDP through their vote splitting--the Free Democrats who would save the government--is more clear now. Although he will not find much of an audience, the chancellor's majority, to the edge of which leftist strays could move, has not increased due to an election victory on the part of the Social Democrats. The FDP, which is responsible for the increase, will hold its bigger partners fragility up to him, and do so with concern and satisfaction. The FDP, which is very much concerned about its credibility and existence despite its new self-confidence, will not accept changing majorities with which the SPD might outmaneuver the smaller party: It will also not accept a too open undermining of joint coalition positions by parts of the Social Democratic faction.

While the broader shield provided by the [increase in the number of] FDP seats will encourage leftist Social Democrats to stray with apparent impunity when it comes to votes, the weight of the FDP in the coalition increases the disgust of those Social Democrats who tend anyway to contradict Schmidt. Thus the gains of the GDP carry a double insecurity into Schmidt's party. Just like in a system of interconnecting pipes the FDP influence via the realization by Schmidt, promoted by the coalition negotiations, that there is only a small financial margin for "reforms" causes an immediate increase in the displeasure that expanding groups of leftwing Social Democrats have with the party leadership, and that also in parliament.

Leftwingers in the Bundestag group like Gansel already fully enjoy their new power, exercising caustic criticism of Schmidt's election campaigning and particularly his last television appearance. The shifts in weight in the coalition have already weakened the SPD. This is reflected by the sharpness with which Wehner, the number three man in the leadership, reprimanded Bahr, the election campaign strategist. The political unanimity otherwise displayed by Wehner and Bahr, which at times gave Schmidt a hard time, is forgotten. Now Wehner has directly made Bahr his target. Wehner's shrapnel has caused Bahr to decide to withdraw as quickly as possible: He will be leaving the Ollenhauer House [SPD headquarters] even before the 1982 party congress, presumably leaving his place to Duesseldorf Minister Farthmann.

The grumbling against Huonker, minister in the chancellor's office, initiated by the untiring promoters of a Schmidt-Honecker meeting following the cancellation of that trip, remains hidden and subdued. Gaus failing to achieve his ends, reshuffles in the Cabinet are unlikely to create any new emphases: Hauff from the Research Ministry to the Transport Ministry, the parliamentary state secretary in the defense ministry, Von Buelow, to Hauff's old place, Prosecutor Penner presumably new parliamentary state secretary at the Hardthoehe [Defense Ministry]. Schmidt will keep ministers under control. The complaint of the left wing in the Bundestag group about the lack of new impulses will not subside, however.

To prevent the FDP from tackling the coalition negotiations too smartly to suit the SPD's taste, the larger government party met the FDP halfway in the joint statement on the first meeting of the negotiators with vague passages on the consolidation of the NATO alliance and solid state finances. And yet, Genscher's party sees itself maneuvered by the election success into the fix of tying voters to itself who now expect a tangible, nonsocialist accent even thoughthe FDP's coalition promise in that respect draws a narrow borderline from the outset. This tightrope walk requires Genscher's whole tactical skill in the coalition talks and in the new government. He cannot just make the most of his opportunities, but he also bears them as a burden.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN ON GISCARD'S UPCOMING PRC TRIP

[Text] Paris, 9 Oct (AFP)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's official visit to China next week will aim to strengthen bilateral cooperation with Peking and encourage China's role in promoting international detente.

Assistant Presidential Spokesman Jacques Blot said today that the visit, from October 15 to 21, will mark the common wish of Paris and Peking "to pursue and develop, at the highest level, the dialogue between the two countries."

France attaches "great importance" to its relations with China, whose "role and consequence in world affairs continues to grow stronger," Mr Blot said.

"In a world that tends to become multi-polar, China, like Europe, can constitute one of the poles necessary for world stability and peace," he said.

Though discussions are expected to concentrate on bilateral economic exchanges, Mr Blot did not rule out the possibility that the question of military cooperation would be raised.

Following his arrival in Peking, Mr Gisacard d'Estaing is to meet with the new Chinese premier, Zhao Ziyang. He will also hold talks with the chairman of the Chinese Communist Party, Hua Guofeng, party deputy chairman Deng Xiaoping and other high-level officials.

From Peking, Mr Giscard de'Estaing's itinerary will include a visit to the central city of Xian, 1,000 kilometers (625 miles) from the capital, for a primarily cultural visit.

On October 18 and 19, the president and his wife, Anne-Aymone, will make a private visit to Lhasa, capital of the autonomous province of Tibet, in what will be the first trip to Tibet by a Western head of state.

From there, they will travel to the port city of Shanghai on October 21 where the president will speak on youth before an audience at the Fudna University grand amphitheater. They will leave for France that night.

France was among the first Western countries to exchange ambassadors with China in 1964.

Though economic and educational exchanges have developed since that date, Mr Blot said the visit will aim to "give a new impetus" to bilateral relations, notably in the economic field, and to clear up certain recent "irregularities" concerning French exports to China.

The spokesman noted that the most important exchanges between the two countries have been in the cultural, scientific and technical areas, and said France hopes future commercial exchanges will follow "the same direction".

French officials accompanying the president on the trip include Foreign Minister Jean-Francois Poncet, Justice Minister Alain Peyrefitte and Jean-Francois Deniau, administrative reform minister and former foreign commerce minister, who recently traveled to China to prepare the president's visit. Jean Lecanuet, chairman of the Senate foreign affairs committee, and Pierre Sudrau, deputy chairman of the National Assembly foreign affairs committee, will also accompany the French head of state.

LE MONDE VIEWS FEARS OF SPREAD OF IRAQI-IRANIAN CONFLICT

[Editorial: "Apprehensions"]

[Text] When he launched his forces against Iran President Saddam Husayn clearly envisaged a lightning war.

He envisaged the taking of positions that would enable Iraq to back the demands it is making to a country in the process of disintegration and whose army and regime seemed doomed to collapse. However, while no third country wishes to extend this conflict, its prolongation in its present form itself poses a serious threat. Iraq no longer seems capable of winning a decisive victory and its adversaries, who have already given proof of their obstinacy over the hostage affair, are rejecting any negotiated settlement in advance.

In giving a clear warning to Jordan, which is supporting Iraq to a point verging on joint hostilities, U.S. Secretary of State Muskie was assessing the risks of the conflict being extended. The unexpected resistance and organizational capacity which Iran is demonstrating could in fact lead neighboring countries to take part in the hostilities, especially since Tehran has now threatened to resort to reprisals against the Gulf countries which, in addition to their official support for the Baghdad regime which they have expressed in moderate terms, are offering this regime logistical facilities.

Several states have allowed the Iraqi air force to base itself at their airports, protected from the enemy's attacks. The Iranian Phantoms which have shown a degree of efficiency could go and chase them out and reconnaissance missions have already been carried out over Saudi Arabia.

After officially asking the United States for military protection, which has taken the form of sending four AWACS radar aircraft, Saudi Arabia announced on 5 October that it would go to the aid of Kuwait, Bahrain or any other Gulf state which might be attacked by Tehran. For his part, President as-Sadat, although on bad terms with Iraq, is supporting the U.S. "stabilizing" action at military level and is placing ports and airports at the disposal of anybody who would like to be associated in this action.

The danger of the conflict spreading is leading those who might possibly take part to secure assurances. For instance, President al-Asad, expected in Moscow this Wednesday, is going there to sign the treaty of friendship between Syria and the Soviet Union suggested to him 10 years ago which he had always succeeded in avoiding. The aggravation of tension in the region since the "separate peace" between Israel and Egypt has forced Damascus to abandon an increasingly difficult balancing act. Since they had nothing further to hope from Washington, the Syrians are increasingly turning toward Moscow.

Aside from its most certain result--a tragic waste for two countries which are mutually damaging their oil installations and their main source of wealth more each day and do not seem capable of reaching any compromise at all--the Iraqi operation in Iran could have serious consequences in Tehran. Moscow, which was up to quite recently still as badly treated as the U.S. "great satan" in Tehran, is now finding some audience among those who regard the neighboring great power as the only guarantor against Iraqi "imperialism."

By proposing, without any danger of the offer being accepted, to give "aid in all spheres including the military sphere" to Tehran's divided leaders, the USSR is placing itself in an advantageous position for the future. Nonetheless it fears an extension of the conflict for the same reasons as Washington, in other words because nobody knows where a war, whose duration nobody had foreseen, might lead.

FOREIGN TRADE MINISTER ON EXPORT NEEDS

LD091321 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 5-6 Oct 80 p 4

[Elisabeth Chavelet interview with new French Foreign Trade Minister Michel Cointat: "Before Exporting You Have To Learn To Sell"--date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] Question: Minister, France's foreign trade has reached an alarming deficit of FR 40.5 billion in 8 months. What steps do you plan to take to improve that situation?

Answer: It is primarily a psychological mission which I plan to carry out with the French people. At a time when France is having to pay a huge energy bill, it is clear that foreign trade is becoming a key pillar for the economy. There are two reasons for this: Because exports are a precondition for pursuing our development and because a trade balance helps to keep the franc in a strong position.

This is the vital trade need of which the French must become aware. Although we in France are regarded as brilliant artists, talented creators, remarkable producers and researchers we are not good storekeepers. In plain language, we do not know how to sell. We have a great deal to learn on that subject.

Question: Following whose example?

Answer: The Dutch, who are remarkable traders, to give just one example. While the Netherlands does not have a really good soil or climate, do you know that it accounts for 65 percent of our deficit in horticultural products? It is not natural that France with its climatic conditions should have an annual deficit of FR1 billion, increasing 30 percent each year, in horticultural products and cut flowers.

Surpluses Are Wealth

Question: After that diagnosis Mr Minister, do you already have some idea of what treatment to give the French people to instil a sense of trade into them?

Answer: My experience as agriculture minister taught me a great deal. For farmers exports are all too often merely a means of dumping their surpluses. To put it bluntly they only export what they have in surplus quantities, and when the bottom falls out of the market they prefer to give away their goods. I, however, say that surpluses of milk, powdered milk, wheat and meat are a source of wealth. Why? Because only countries with surpluses win long-term contracts.

I would like to give you an example: A few years ago we had devoted 10 million centimes to making the Chasselas grape known in Belgium. Well, we did not sell a single kilogram because our prices were 1 centime higher than that of the Belgian grape and the French preferred to allow their grapes to rot rather than penetrate the Belgian market. That is a curious sense of trade.

Question: The French are often accused of not adapting enough to the taste of the French products' foreign clientele. It is vital to make the natives adapt the products.

Answer: That is true: It is not enough just to export. The Germans like a sweeter wine, so let's sell them a sweeter wine. The British like Cheddar-type cheeses. So don't let's force Camembert into them. In this respect we should undoubtedly follow Renault's example since that company has marvelously understood the need to adapt to its foreign clients' taste.

Introducing Morals Into the Market

Question: Aside from our vast agricultural potential are there other sectors which could contribute to limiting the effects of our oil deficit?

Answer: Two actions are needed. At export level it is the leading industries which, in the coming years, will be called upon to develop exports. However we must also take action on imports. We should concentrate our efforts on limiting consumer durable imports and on more efficient exploitation of our rich forestry resources to reduce our imports of timber, paper, furniture and so forth.

Question: Are you worried about the new upsurge in automobile imports in France?

Answer: As a deputy I recently proposed a law aimed at introducing morals into the market by curbing unauthorized imports. As a minister my action will be determined by the government's position.

Spain in the EEC

Question: Do you think that the development of our trade is linked with Europe's expansion?

Answer: Any expansion will require many safeguards. If Spain joins the Common Market it will be necessary to take steps to protect our lettuce, vegetable and wine producers. Once these safeguards have been introduced it is clear that producers such as industrialists in the southwest stand to gain from Spain joining the EC. Ask the Bretons whether their sales of shellfish and dairy products have not benefited from the British market being opened up to them?

Question: Is it on this expansion issue that you were divided from Jacques Chirac during the European elections in June 1978?

Answer: It is from Michel Debre that my European stance differs. He says: National independence first, that is the only way of saving France. I say that to be saved France must place itself in a "economic interests group" with its neighbors to form a force capable of resisting the superpowers. Europe with nine or ten members will not be "swallowed", whereas France alone....

PCF'S GREMETZ ATTACKS FRENCH FOREIGN POLICIES

[Maxime Gremetz article: "Fine Principles!"]

[Text] Many articles that have appeared recently present Valery Giscard d'Estaing's foreign policy in a very favorable light--as independent, active and effective.

Jean Francois-Poncet's recent speech at the United Nations enables us to make a fresh assessment of the main lines of this policy--alignment with the FRG, allegiance to the United States and refinement in deception, language and attitudes, a deception that is especially necessary when many events are putting Valery Giscard d'Estaing and his government in a predicament to conceal the fact that they do not wish to do anything that might upset Schmidt or Carter.

Thus, for example, the French Government refuses to recognize the lawful government in Bolivia and is preparing to recognize the fascist junta. In the same way Valery Giscard d'Estaing is remaining silent about the death threat hanging over the Korean democrat Kim Dae Jung.

Yet there is no lack of fine words. "Self-determination for peoples and security for states, decolonization, dignity and equality for men, rejection of unilateral action, condemnation of recourse to force...." What indeed could be more praiseworthy? But what does it mean in practice?

The right of peoples to determine their destiny for themselves. If, as Jean Francois-Poncet said, it is indeed a question of respect for a "fundamental and universal principle," why is the government pursuing its shameful neocolonical policy with all its might against acccording this right to the peoples of the overseas departments and territories? He mentions Afghanistan. But there is a political solution, advocated by Karmal's government. Did the president of the republic take advantage of Pakistan's President Zia's stopover in Paris to encourage him to respect Afghanistan's sovereignty and to cease infiltration of military forces into the country? Obviously not.

Jean Francois-Poncet makes a show of pity for the "barbarous oppression by a bloody tyranny" in Kampuchea. But what is he waiting for before demanding the expulsion of the Pol Pot representative from the United Nations and recognizing the lawful government of Kampuchea?

This country is being restord to life thanks largely to Vietnamese assistance, described by Francois-Poncet as "protectoral," but how does he describe France's role in central Africa?

The French Government would like to see Namibia "attain international sovereignty and genuine independence?" But why then did the recent "international conference of solidarity with Namibia," held in Paris from 11 to 13 September, condemn the French Government so harshly? Someone is lying and it cannot be the people concerned and their authentic representative--the South West African People's Organization.!

As for the alleged "offense against human rights and human dignity" of apartheid in South Africa, which Francois-Poncet appears to be discovering rather late in the day--it does not seem to be troubling the French firms which, with the French Government's encouragement, continue to conduct fruitful business there?

The Middle East question too gives rise to some wonders of deception. The "little" phrases of Valery Giscard d'Estaing caused great uproar. Under pressure from us in particular, French "initiatives" were announced. Finally, after Carter's call to order in Venice last June, there has only been one "mission" of the Nine, led by Thorn. Since then, he has traveled around to familiarize himself with the conditions for settling the problems, conditions which have after all been common knowledge for some time. This is what Francois-Poncet calls "making the presence of the Nine felt" in order to conceal better the total lack of initiative on the part of France.

And it seems that it is under the cover of the Nine, this allegedly "independent" Europe which still deludes some people, that maneuvers are being prepared against the forthcoming Madrid meeting of the states that signed the Helsinki agreements.

Although, under popular pressure and through our party's actions, statements of good intentions were made a few months ago, the present tone gives the impression that France is temporizing and is not preparing to do everything to make Madrid result positively in constructive measures for peace and disarmament.

It is obvious that Francois-Poncet's pompous flights of oratory are aimed in effect at concealing the realities of a foreign policy that is turning its back on France's independence and on the great policy of nonalignment.

Together with all working people and all democrats in our country who desire peace and progress, we believe that France has a quite different international role to play. It can and must take concrete initiatives in favor of detente, peace and disarmament.

In this sphere too it is only by action and struggle that we can advance in the right direction.

NEW AMBASSADOR TO CHILE APPOINTED

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS EVALUATES ELECTION RESULTS

[Mario Mesquita editorial' "Election Criteria"]

[Text] Confirmation and strengthening of the government coalition, reflected not only in an increase in the number of votes and deputies but also in a more homogeneous influence throughout the country; stablization of Socialist influence (the party achieved a result 2 December almost the same as that of the coalition) and a significant decrease in the Communists' poll, with repercussions even in the PCP's traditional areas of influence, specifically in the Alentejo--these are the broad outlines of the voting for the Assembly of the Republic. In general the electorate "shifted" rightward, votes being transferred from the United People Alliance [APU] to the Democratic Alliance and the Republican and Socialist Front, and from the latter to the government majority.

Only the extreme right recorded a percentage below that of December, possibly as a result of the "useful vote" tactic.

It will help nobody to deny the unambiguousness of this result or to seek in circumstantial or peripheral facts the explanation for a phenomenon which concerns Portuguese society as a whole. The day of 5 October 1980 represented the culmination of a process of reversal, after 6 years of political instability.

Over and above the already mentioned possible influence of international events--such as Poland and Afghanistan--the reduction of the APU's poll seems to demonstrate the electorate's estrangement from a political, economic and social model incompatible with the geostrategic area of which Portugal forms part. For the first time, the PCP's election score sustains a clear setback, in reflecting in votes the gradual loss of political power that it has sustained over the last few years.

An analysis of the tactics that emerged during the campaign period will not suffice to interpret these elections, but the opposition forces would do well to ponder the correctness and effectiveness of the methods used. However justified the complaints concerning irregularities during the elections or the misuse of the media, the impression we are left with is that the opposition campaign failed largely due to the aggressive and personalized style it adopted, whereas the Democratic Alliance chose to make good use of its time in power, with a view to the elections.

The bare facts of the results show that the voters remained unaffected by the personalization of the campaign. Government stability was perhaps the element most highly valued by the voters, and naturally this benefited the existing government. The Democratic Alliance has governed in a controversial manner but it did give the country the impression that it was governing, which has not happened often since 15 April [1974]

At a time of international economic crisis stability is a criterion governing choice. This is what the West German voters showed on 5 October when they brought back Helmut Schmidt's center-left coalition, instead of the rightist venture personified by Franz Josef Strauss. It was shown too on the same date by the Portuguese voters, who brought back the right and center-right coalition led by Franscisco Sa Carneiro, against the alternatives that presented themselves on its left.

The coming months will provide the essential pointers to the coalition's possible "new style." From last December through 5 October the Democratic Alliance governed against considerable odds thanks to the proximity of the general elections. Now in principle it will enjoy a 4-year term in office. Let us hope that this broadening of the time horizon will not correspond to an invitation to the social groups expelled from the government area as a result of 25 April [1974] to gain revenge.

Rotation in government is normal in a democracy. The exercise of government by the center-right and democratic right is a factor inherent in the political system itself, as is the right to opposition or simply the "right to stay at home." On Sunday we wrote: "Yesterday the rallies ended, today we go to the polls, tomorrow the rallies will start again." Now the general elections have been held, the presential elections are almost upon us. The precampaign period began a long time ago. It will be no less important, especially since the government majority is not a constituent majority [two-thirds majority required for constitional revision].

LISBON PAPER INTERVIEWS FRETILIN 'FOREIGN MINISTER'

LD091219 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 3 Oct 80 p 8

[Unattributed interview in Lisbon with Revolutionary Front for an Independent Eastern Timor (FRETILIN) "Foreign Minister" Mari Alkatiri; "Portugal Must Shoulder Its Historical Responsibilities"--date of interview not specified]

[Excerpts] FRETILIN Foreign Minister Mari Alkatiri passed through Lisbon this week en route for New York, where the problem of Eastern Timor will be debated once more 13 October. Mari Alkatiri is based in Mozambique--the country which has so far given that nationalist movement most aid.

EXPRESSO: What was brought you to Portugal?

Alkatiri: As you know, the Portuguese Cabinet quite revently made a statement which seems extremely ambiguous to us--to FRETILIN. Let it be said in passing that the other previous governments adopted no stance. However, it seems to us that this ambiguity is beginning to be clarified to an increasing extent.

EXPRESSO: What is the nature of this ambiguity?

Alkatiri: The communique puts forward no kind of solution to the problem of East Timor. It is based essentially on an attempt to resolve humanitarian problems, adocating within this perspective a rapprochement with Indonesia. This means that the Portuguese Government is apparently determined to make contact with Indonesia so that the latter might allow thousands and thousands of Timorese to leave its territory. It is easy to imagine many people fleeting the terror and conditions being created whereby even those who are not overwhelmed by the terror will want to escape the oppression. It is this actively playing along with Indonesia, which wants to depopulate East Timor so that there is no more resistance to its desire for domination. The humanitarian problem is wrongly posed. This is fundamentally a political problem and the humanitarian problem can only be correctly resolved if the policy is properly balanced. It would be absurd, if not tragic, to contemplate removing people from their land, depopulating a country when there is an aggressor right there who wants just that, without prevailing on the aggressor to withdraw--prevailing on the aggressor and prevailing on the international community to put pressure on the aggressor to get him to withdraw.

EXPRESSO: What, in FRETILIN's view, are Portugal's responsibilities vis-a-vis East Timor?

Alkatiri: We proceed from the premise that Portugal is an ex-colonial power that has simply abandoned the colony to its fate. It did not try to defend it when the colony was under total Portuguese sovereignty. On the contrary: When Indonesia threatened to invade the country Portugal abandoned it. On that basis, we, as a patriotic force, deemed it right to declare independence. But when we declared independence the invasion force was already crossing the border.

EXPRESSO: What does FRETILIN expect of Portugal at this time?

A katiri: We expect and demand of Portugal, given its historical responsibilities, a clear stance, without which no progress can be made. Clarity means condemnation of the Indonesian occupation and support for the (Maubere) people under the leadership of FRETILIN and recognition of FRETILIN as representative of the people of East Timor.

EXPRESSO: What is the current population situation in East Timor?

Alkaitiri: Taking into account statistics from the time of the Portuguese the population must now be a little more than 300,000. Formerly it was around 700,000. Subsequently Indonesia killed around 200,000.

EXPRESSO: Are many people still being killed?

Alkatiri: The number of deaths is falling since, in view of the Indonesian offensive against our liberated zones, we opted for the organization of the mass surrender of the population. Thus the population is moving from our zones to the enemy zones. The International Red Cross and other humanitarian organizations operate in the enemy zones and this inhibits the Indonesians.

EXPRESSO: What is the basis of this humanitarian action advocated by the Portuguese Government?

Alkatiri: The population of around 325,000 now in the zones controlled by the Indonesians has not really had adequate support in humanitarian terms. The International Red Cross has only two doctors there and a few orderlies. Humanitarian organizations connected with the churches have a few more. What is more, the population needs food aid.

Of these 325,000, around 20,000 want to leave Timor and they are already registered, waiting for countries to take them in.

EXPRESSO: Is Indonesia prepared to let them go?

Alkatiri: It has not given permission yet, but its policy is currently oriented toward letting as many as possible go since the more departures there are the less resistance there will be to foreign occupation.

This evacuation of East Timor by Timorese creates conditions for the repopulation of our country by foreign elements. At this moment 3,500 Javanese families are set to repopulate East Timor.

EXPRESSO: The U.S. attitude toward East Timor is being debated in Portugal.

Alkatiri: The United States is directly implicated in the aggression. It has been stepping up support for the Indonesians. Indonesia would have been unable to remain in East Timor for nearly 5 years without U.S. support.

EXPRESSO: And at UN level?

Alkatiri: The UN General Assembly will start discussing the East Timor issue on 13 October. We hope to make some progress regarding recognition of our just rights and condemnation of Indonesia as aggressor and occupier.

EXPRESSO: And Portugal?

Alkatiri: Until 1970 it adopted a passive stance, voting for our proposals. This year saw the cabinet communique, which appears to be positive, but for it to be entirely positive there needs to be continuity. And this continuity must take the form of joining forces with FRETILIN and the countries which have befriended our cause.

HELSINKI CITES NORWEGIAN'S REMARKS ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

LD092032 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1800 GMT 9 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Norway's former minister of the law of the sea, Jens Evensen, has declared that he supports the idea of turning the north into a nuclear-free zone.

Evensen said yesterday that the idea of a nuclear-free zone in the north should be reconsidered.

The Norwegian Government is surprised at Evensen's statement.

Today Evensen denied that he has criticised the Norwegian Government and said that he put forward the idea as a way to curb nuclear armament.

OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH SWEDISH DEFENSE CHIEFS

[Lars Hellberg report: "Sweden Understands Contingency Stockpiling"]

[Text] Stockholm, 7 October--"Swedish defense chiefs not only have an understanding of the Norwegian Government's attitude toward contingency stockpiling of allied equipment but also consider it a logical consequence of our NATO membership and of the change in the balance of forces," Storting Defense Committee Chairman Per Hysing-Dahl, Conservative Party, told AFTENPOSTEN's Stockholm correspondent.

This is the unambiguous impression he has after the committee's talks with Swedish Defense Minister Erik Kroemmark, military leaders and the Swedish Riksdag's Defense Committee.

Sweden has been following the Norwegian debate on the siting question with great interest. "Without going into great detail about it here, it is clear that the choice of site is of significance for the Swedes' own long-term planning," Hysing-Dahl pointed out.

The Defense Committee chairman praised the Swedes for the open account he was given of the consequences the tight budget situation could have on the new long-term defense plan that will be adopted in 1982.

But despite the concern expressed by Swedish military leaders over the relative weakening of the defense forces that has taken place in the last few years, Hysing-Dahl's main impression is that Sweden still has strong, modern defenses. On the other hand the committee was briefed on the problems connected with the renewal of air defense and the new efforts that are necessary in the equipment sector in general. The outcome of these talks is of great significance for Norway. We have been given the positive impression that the military leaders are still investing in a strong modern air defense force, at the same time as all efforts are being made to ensure that the rationalizations in peacetime organization will not weaken mobilization and combat capacity. But it is of course not easy, Hysing-Dahl said. In their talks with the Norwegian parliamentarians the Swedes have expressed interest in an expansion of cooperation on the materiel side, but it was not possible to go into details on the 3-day visit.

DEFENSE MINISTRY AIDE DISCUSSES MILITARY STOCKPILING

[Unattributed report: "Stockpiling in Troendelag Is Politically Motivated"]

[Text] The first meeting between Norwegian and U.S. military leaders to discuss the contingency stockpiling issue will take place at U.S. European command headquarters in West Germany today.

[Defense Ministry] Undersecretary Bjoern Bruland announced this when he yesterday gave the Labor Party disarmament committee an account of the political treatment that the question of contingency stockpiling has been given. Bruland said that military appraisals indicated that the need for contingency stockpiling was greatest in northern Norway because of the time factor, but for political reasons the government chose Troendelag for stockpiling for American forces.

Undersecretary Bruland's account of contingency stockpiling to the internal disarmament committee, which was appointed earlier this year following an initiative from Thore Joern Jagland, labor youth chairman, was described to AFTENPOSTEN as a partial publication of the so-called Bruland report, which was completed on 29 August this year, only 2.5 months after the Bruland commission was set up. The Defense Ministry has denied this, and points out that it was only a question of a summary of the essential course of events surrounding contingency stockpiling. The account has been made public by the Ministry's press department.

Undersecretary Bruland pointed out to the disarmament committee the various factors that had been of importance for the security and political appraisals made by the government, and which carry varying weight in the two stockpiling alternatives, northern Norway and Troendelag.

"Contingency stockpiling could influence our political freedom of action. It would have an effect on the low tension in the northern regions that is a goal of Norwegian security policy," Bruland said, stressing that exercises for the U.S. reinforcements will be fitted into the existing framework for such exercises.

Bruland said that the need for reinforcement is not pressing in northern Norway, but that Norwegian forces would be available earlier than foreign reinforcements. "The government has for this reason decided to acquire and stockpile equipment for a further combined Norwegian regiment in northern Norway," he said.

Bruland said that the government justifies its position on the contingency stockpiling issue with the argument that Norwegian territory is safeguarded at the same time as our neighbors are put at ease.

Bruland also presented an appraisal of the combat capacity of a U.S. Marine brigade for which material will be stockpiled in Norway.

"Deployed in time this defense potential could have a decisive effect on the defense capacity in northern Norway. With contingency stockpiling of heavy material it would, in the commission's opinion, be possible to transfer forces to northern Norway by aircraft even though hostilities might have begun," Bruland said. But he pointed out that this would depend on the implementation of the defense commission's recommendations on the expansion of air defense resources in the area and on whether the forces to be deployed there themselves have strong air defenses.

Bruland also said that the risk involved in the transportation of reinforcements to Troendelag would be less than to northern Norway, simply because of the greater distance to the Warsaw Pact countries' bases.

STORTING'S HYSING-DAHL VIEWS DEFECTS IN DEFENSE BUDGET

[Unattributed report: "Hysing-Dahl: The Facade Covers Weaknesses in Defense Budget"]

[Text] "Funds granted to the defense forces must be adjusted to the tasks the defense forces have and the government must not see the NATO target of a 3-percent growth in the defense budget as a ceiling which must not be exceeded," Storting Defense Committee Chairman Per Hysing-Dahl, Conservative party, said, pointing out that the budget proposal does not cover the purchase of air defense equipment. Defense Chief Sverre Hamre did not wish to make any comment to AFTENPOSTEN on the budget at the present time.

In his comments Hysing-Dahl said that the government's proposed defense budget has a facade that hides great weaknesses. In the difficult time for security in which we are living the government is meeting the situation with a reduction in the defense forces' share of the total national budget and a reduction in their share of the gross national product. The real increase is eaten up by the cost of the troops in Lebanon, expenses in connection with the law on working conditions and various other areas which cannot be said to increase the defense forces' combat capacity.

"I am especially worried that the Defense Ministry in its budget proposals builds on the illusion and the dangerous notion that we alone can create an area of low tension in the northern regions by limiting our freedom of action, as is reflected in the attitudes to the contingency stockpiling of allied materiel," the defense committee chairman said.

He also commented on the real increase in the defense budget, which amounts to 3 percent and is thus in line with NATO's joint target. Hysing-Dahl thinks that the government takes account of this target as if it were an extra addition that the government must not exceed. "What is missing is an appraisal of how the funds fit the tasks that the defense forces are expected to carry out." Hysing-Dahl also pointed out that the government also refers to the recommendations of the defense commission while at the same time in reality putting these recommendations to one side.

"It is worrisome that the government in its defense budget says nothing about adjustments for price rises," Hysing-Dahl said, pointing out that within the strict framework proposed there will not be funds to acquire air defense equipment.

"It is also extremely regrettable that the government is once again looking at the idea of reducing the number of days spent in military service. When the matter was first raised, it was said that it would be a once-only occurrence, but the government intends to raise the matter again in 1981. In my opinion this is not a defensible policy," Per Hysing-Dahl said.

MISSILE DESTROYER ARRIVES IN GULF OF OMAN

[Desmond Wettern report: "The Navy Sails to Oman"]

[Text] The 4,100-ton Missile Destroyer Coventry arrived from Singapore in the Gulf of Oman yesterday to lend British support if international action is required to keep open the Strait of Hormuz.

A Ministry of Defence spokesman said last night that the warship was not with either of the two American carrier task groups in the area, "but Britain is having close discussions with the Americans and other allies."

The Coventry will be able to operate independently for some weeks as the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Tanker Olwen 36,000 tons, should join her today after having been delayed for 24 hours in Singapore.

The other four warships in the task group, of which the Coventry is a part, are at present undergoing assisted maintenance in Hong Kong and Singapore, and are expected in the Gulf area next month.

There has been no change in the Russian naval strength in the Indian Ocean which consists of a missile cruiser, two or three destroyers or frigates, a landing ship, probably two or three submarines and a large number of supporting auxiliaries.

ACCELERATED REDUCTION OF UK TROOPS IN ULSTER REPORTED

[Colin Brady dispatch: "Ulster Pullout Quickens"]

[Text] The phased reduction of the regular army's presence in Northern Ireland, following 11 years of anti-terrorist duty is to accelerate during the next few weeks.

An estimated 400 troops are to be pulled out of two key bases in Belfast, once the cockpit of violence in Ulster, but now a relatively peaceful zone compared with areas along the border with the Irish Republic.

The withdrawal, to be completed by the end of November, is in keeping with government policy of gradually returning the main security role in the province to the police and the locally recruited Ulster Defence Regiment.

Piecemeal reductions in strength have been made during the past two years to match the fluctuating security situation, but this is the biggest single movement of troops back to Britain.

About 11,600 soldiers will be left, a marked reduction on a strength of 15,000 at one stage, and further withdrawals are expected.

The men are being pulled out from what was once the elegant Grand Central Hotel in Royal Avenue, Belfast's main thoroughfare and from a base in Flax Street's textiles mill in Ardoyne, formerly the most volatile and violent district in the city.

Although the slow withdrawal strategy was set down years ago, government economies became a factor to help hasten the move. It is also a reflection on just how much violence, particularly by the provisional IRA, has shrunk during the past few years. This year 62 people, including seven regular soldiers, have been killed by terrorist action compared to the widespread shootings, bombings and other violence in 1972 when the provisionals' activity was at its zenith. The army's death-toll since 1969 is 334, and 104 Ulster Defence Regiment volunteers have also been killed.

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU RETURNS FROM YUGOSLAV VISIT

[Text] President Kiprianou returned from his official visit to Yugoslavia shortly after midnight [today]. Foreign Minister Rolandhis, who accompanied him on the visit, also returned with him.

The president was received at Larnaca airport by the president of the House of Representatives, who replaced him in his absence; members of the Council of Ministers; the Yugoslav charge d'affaires; house deputies; the national guard and police chiefs; and other officials.

During his visit to Yugoslavia, Kiprianou had talks with President of SFRY Presidency Mijatovic and President of the Federal Executive Council Djuranovic. Kiprianou also visited industrial installations.

ATAKOL CALLS FOR EQUAL AID TO BOTH CYPRIOT COMMUNITIES

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol has said that all countries are pursuing a discriminatory policy against the Turkish Cypriots. He said: Economic aid extended to the Greek Cypriots causes the Greek Cypriot administration to adopt a more intransigent attitude and hinders the path to a Cyprus solution.

In a statement to ANTOLIA AGENCY in New York, Atakol said that the World Bank, the IMF, other international organizations and states have since 1974 extended to the Greek Cypriot administration aid of about $1 billion. He added that the aid extended to the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus during the same period was that supplied by the Red Cross in the form of food and clothing amounting to $23 million. Atakol said that with the aid extended to it during the last 6 years, the Greek Cypriot community has become one of the leading countries in terms of per capita aid. Noting that the economic aid extended to the Greek Cypriot side created an imbalance between the two Cypriot communities in favor of the Greek Cypriots, Atakol continued: The whole world is pursuing a discriminatory policy against the Turkish Cypriots at a time when UN members are voting against discrimination. We believe that such an attitude and mentality is far removed from efforts directed toward the peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem. This attitude is rendering the Greek Cypriots more intransigent at the intercommunal talks and hinders the path to a solution.

Atakol said that this issue was discussed at his meeting with UN Secretary General Waldheim. He added that he asked the secretary general to work toward securing equality in the distribution of aid. Atakol said: We hope and expect that the UN Secretariat General will work to ensure that the aid extended to Cyprus be distributed equally between the two communities. Many of the orgnizations extending aid to the Greek Cypriot side are affiliated with the United Nations. In addition, other international organizations attach great value to the views of the Secretariat. Secretary General Waldheim [words indistinct] the distribution of aid.

LAND STATISTICS--The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has 2,682,266 [word indistinct] dunams of land, 60.6 percent of which is arable land. Official statistics recently published say that 1,236,535 dunams of the arable land are used for agriculture and 388,306 dunams are forests. Thirty-two percent of all the land, 866,425 dunams, is unarable. The remaining 8 percent is comprised of cities, roads and rivers, covering 241,000 dunams. FOREIGN MINISTER MITSOTAKIS RETURNS FROM EC MEETING

ATO81654 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1630 GMT 8 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, who earlier had participated in the work of the UNGA, returned from Luxembourg at 1530. At Ellinikon Airport, Mitsotakis made the following statement:

[Begin recording] I will only tell you that I feel special satisfaction upon returning from Luxembourg where I participated for the first time as an observer in the meeting of the Community's foreign ministers. It was a great moment for Greece, and for me it was a special personal honor and pleasure. It was a very interesting conference in which, naturally, we only attended as an observer; however, it was a very useful, very interesting experience. From now on--until 1 January when we shall become a full member--Greece will participate as an observer in all Community conferences. Thank you very much. [end recording]

PUBLIC OPINION POLL SHOWS PUBLIC DIVIDED ON NATO ISSUE

ATO91805 Athens TAKHIDHROMOS in Greek 9 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Athenians seem to be almost equally divided on the issue of Greece's ability to solely defend its territorial integrity should we withdraw from NATO and close the U.S. bases. This is the result of a public opinion poll that was conducted late last week by ICAP HELLAS AE Company on behalf of TAKHIDHROMOS.

Analytically: In reply to the question of whether or not we are in a position to confront alone "any threat, from wherever it may come, against our national integrity" provided we finally withdraw from NATO and close down the local U.S. bases; 40 percent said that we are not, 39 percent said that we are, and 21 percent said they "do not know."

In order to draw these conclusions, 600 people in all were questioned--male and female, 15 years of age or older--chosen so as to constitute a representative sample of the population of the capital area where more than 1/3 of the nation lives. Men and women from the more prosperous and poorer classes were equally divided [on the question] as in the general sample. Only the "I do not know" answer was found more among women (30 percent) and the poorer classes (25 percent).

Great differences in views exist among the various ages, especially between the two extremes, as the following table shows:

	15 - 19	50 and more
Is not in a position	42 percent	43 percent
Is in a position	50 percent	29 percent
I do not know	8 percent	28 percent
	100	100

FOREIGN MINISTRY ANALYZES U.S. PROPOSALS ON BASES

AT091448 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 9 Oct 80 p 1

[By contributor Alexandros Velios]

[Text] According to exclusive reports by MESIMVRINI, the Greek side has completed its study (more precisely its analysis) of the U.S. plan of proposals for the new Greek-U.S. defense agreement that was delivered by U.S. Ambassador McCloskey to Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis on 15 September.

The responsible service of the Foreign Ministry under Secretary General Ambassador Rousos, in cooperation with responsible staff officers of the Defense Ministry, have analyzed point by point the U.S. proposals which are pervaded by a spirit similar to the one that governed the recent U.S.-Turkish agreement, and envisage increased qualitative and quantitative aid (for the development of the Greek military industry).

However, these proposals are not considered to be absolutely satisfactory with regard to the joint command of the bases (which has been demanded by the Greek side).

At the same time, according to the same reports, an analysis of Greek proposals for a new Greek-U.S. defense agreement has also been concluded.

As MESIMVRINI recently reported, during the last phase the Foreign Ministry computer was entrusted with making a comparison between the U.S.-Turkish agreement "DECA" [last word in English] and the DCA [last word in English] of 1976.

At this moment the Greek side is completely ready to note to the Americans the points in their proposals which should be improved in the light of Greek demands and the U.S.-Turkish agreement. However, both analytical studies "have been filed"--that is, the Greek side has not proceeded to draft its evaluations and counterproposals--given the fact that the indispensable prerequisite for advancing the issue (return to NATO) seems to have been led into a new impasse at this time.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA REPORTS NAVY TO PARTICIPATE IN NATO EXERCISES

[Text] One of our navy ships will participate in the joint NATO exercises in which the Turkish Navy also will participate. A Greek will command the flotilla of allied ships.

The exercises will begin 14 October and will last more than a month. They will be conducted in Mediterranean ports and will aim at the quick movement of naval units to areas in which the timely presence of NATO forces is required.

According to our reports, the naval force, which bears the name "Naval-OC-Force Med," [title in English] is constituted every 6 months. One destroyer each from the United States, Britain, Italy, Turkey and Greece participates in it. This time it was a Greek officer's turn to be in command; he will depart next Tuesday on the destroyer Kanaris which will also serve as the command ship.

Although an official note was not delivered, it has been learned backstage in the Naples Command that the Turks may not participate in the exercise citing Greece's participation as the cause.

RIZOSPASTIS NOTES LATEST GOVERNMENT NATO POLICY FAILURES

AT081559 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 8 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial: "The Only Solution"]

[Text] After the foreign minister's talks in New York, it is now very clear where our national issues lie.

The government was not able in the least to promote the most significant goals of its foreign policy. Furthermore, it was forced to admit that the demands of its allies were tantamount to national concessions, and that the pressures it is encountering are being manifested through efforts to "destabilize" our internal political life. Now, following these talks, a new round of consultations will begin until the next regular NATO meeting in December.

The situation is truly critical—but not in the sense which the New Democracy government attaches to it. When the New Democracy governments speaks about a "critical bend" it principally means its own difficulties, fears and dilemmas, the deadlocks of the policy of Atlanticism. When we speak of a critical situation we principally mean the danger of return to NATO, Greece's involvement in the aggressive strategy of imperialism, and the endangering of democratic normality through American threats and interventions.

These dangers cannot be dealt with by new efforts to "agree at last" with the Americans; nor can they be dealt with by diplomatic maneuvers and tightrope walking between "we leave" and "we do not leave" NATO. They also cannot be dealt with by looking for a new negotiating "trump card" in some general and vague "national consensus."

There is one way out of the current, very difficult situation—that is, the immediate suspension of negotiations with NATO, complete withdrawal from it, and the final abolition of foreign military bases. Only such a policy can deal with multilateral dangers, and guarantee the active support of the people and their democratic forces and true national consensus.

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren today received at the Cankaya Mansion Iraqi President Saddam Husayn's special envoy, Minister of Youth Karim Mahmud al-Mulla, who arrived in Ankara yesterday. A statement by the press and public relations department of the Office of the Head of State said that the special envoy brought to General Evren President Saddam Husayn's message on developments in the region, and on relations between the two countries, expressing his best wishes. Relations between Turkey and Iraq were taken up during the talks. The statement added that the visiting minister briefed General Evren on the views of Iraq on the conflict between his country and Iran. The special envoy also briefed Prime Minister Ulusu and acting Foreign Minister Ilhan Oztirak on the same subject.

ADANA MILITARY COURT SENTENCES TERRORIST TO DEATH

[Text] The 1st Military Tribunal of the Adana Martial Law Command has condemned to death one of the two terrorists charged with the murder of two students. The other was sentenced to 15 years in prison. A statement by the Press and Public Relations Department of the Adana Martial Law Command says that Ismail Araci, accused of killing Guven Bilgin and Ali Osman Beygilli, two students of the Adana engineering school, on 23 March 1978, was condemned to death. Osman Birbicer, who was Araci's accomplice in the incident, was sentenced to 15 years in prison, to be barred from public employment and to be on 15 years probation after he serves his sentence.

TURKES, ERBAKAN BROUGHT TO ANKARA FOR STATEMENTS ON 'CRIMES'

[Text] NAP Leader Alpaslan Turkes and NSP Leader Necmettin Erbakan, who are being detained by the armed forces, were brought to Ankara today and made statements at the Martial Law Command Military Prosecutor's Office. Turkes and Erbakan had been detained following the operation on 12 September in accordance with a National Security Council decision. Both party leaders have been staying at the military installations in Uzunada in Izmir since 12 September.

According to information received by a Turkish Radio and TV Administration [TRT] correspondent from Ankara Martial Law Command officials, Turkes and Erbakan were brought to Ankara today. The Ankara Martial Law Command Military Prosecutor's Office received statements from Turkes and Erbakan about their previous crimes and some of their parties' activities. Their parliamentary immunity had prevented such requests for statements [before 12 September]. The TRT correspondent learned that Turkes and Erbakan are being held in the custody of the armed forces in Ankara.

TURKMEN COMMENTS ON GREECE'S RETURN TO NATO MILITARY WING

[Text] Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen held a news conference before he left New York where he attended the 35th UN General Assembly session. In reply to a question about Greece's return to NATO's military wing, Turkman said Turkey favors Greece's return but that, as pointed out by our Head of State General Evren as well, Greece's return must be effected through conditions acceptable to both sides. Asked what these conditions would be, Turkmen replied: The real issue between Turkey and Greece is the matter of command areas in the Aegean.

In fact, this can be solved simply. The solution we have proposed envisages the return of Greece to NATO's military wing first, to be followed by the discussion and solution of the Aegean air and naval command problems through negotiations within NATO. However, no allocations for command areas in the Aegean should exist at the time of the return.

During his news conference, Turkmen added that he had talks with about 40 foreign ministers during his 2-week visit to New York. Turkmen said that bilateral relations as well as international issues were taken up during these talks. Turkmen is expected to meet with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington in London on his way back from New York.

GUNAYDIN NOTES NEW SLOGANS APPEARING IN CYPRUS

[Resat Akar report from Nicosia]

[Text] Before the 1974 peace operation, one could see only "Enosis" or "Partition" inscribed on the walls in Cyrpus. However, after 1975, such slogans as "Cyprus belongs to the Cypriots," "Down with fascism," "The only alternative is revolution," "All peoples are brothers," "Down with the creators of 20 July," "Down with imperialism" and "Denktas and Kiprianou cannot represent the peoples of Cyprus" are conspicuous in northern Cyprus, from Lefka to Karpass [Lefke to Karpas peninsula].

Similar slogans are repeated at meetings organized by teachers and government employees as well as by workers who protest the high cost of living. Just as in Turkey, the number of organizations, associations and press organs in Cyprus which denounce the Turkish peace operation in Cyprus and which are so much misled as to look upon Greek Cypriots as "brothers" and upon Makarios as a "progressive revolutionary" are increasing every day. In fact, these organizations and associations have reached a stage where they do not hide their hatred for their own kinsmen.

The birth of such organizations, which seek to eliminate outright the successful outcome of the sacrifices made both by Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community during the peace operation--as if the negative activities of the entire world against Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community were not enough--should be considered as a dangerous development.

If one considers how anarchic incidents started and developed in Turkey, one could easily see how similar incidents are escalating in Cyprus. In view, therefore, of the deep distresses suffered by Turkey and by the Turkish Cypriot community for years, necessary countermeasures must be urgently taken in both Turkey and Cyprus. Otherwise, it will be very difficult to counter this escalation later. It is high time that these measures were taken.

VOTCP COMMENTS ON IRAN-IRAQ WAR, JUNTA'S ROLE

TA091519 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 9 Oct 80

[Station commentary entitled "The Iraqi-Iranian War and Turkey"]

[Summary] "For 2 years the imperialist countries, and particularly the United States, have been escalating international tension."

"Following the revolutions in Afghanistan and Iran, the United States and NATO realized that their imperialist interests in the Middle East are threatened and they engaged in efforts to safeguard these interests."

They tried to strengthen their military positions and to protect their economic interests in the area.

"The People's Democratic Republic of Yemen is turning to socialism. An anti-imperialist people's revolution took place in Iran. Forces with anti-imperialist tendencies began assuming power in many Arab countries in the region."

"It is under these conditions that the United States made its junta realize a coup in Turkey, which it wants to transform into a key aggressive tool in the region. It is not a coincidence that the war between Iran and Iraq erupted 2 days after the coup in Turkey." However, all these schemes are bound to fail.

The Iraqi-Iranian war serves the interests of the imperialists alone. This conflict is the result of the plot designed by the United States in order to ensure the establishment of pro-American regimes in these two countries. This war is weakening the anti-imperialist regimes in both countries. "Under these circumstances, the only solution is ending the war as soon as possible." Turkey has common borders with both Iran and Iraq and is undoubtedly effected by the war. "Above all, Turkey gets 40 percent of its crude oil from the Kirkuk-Dortyol pipeline, and the war rendered the pipeline inoperable."

"The junta in Turkey is using the Iraqi-Iranian war as an excuse to increase the pressure in the country and especially in Turkish Kordestan." The weakening of the anti-imperialist regimes in Iran and Iraq increases the threat that the pro-American junta in Turkey will act as the gendarme in the Middle East. The only way to stop this development is by stopping the war as soon as possible and reducing the tension in our region.

"The militarist junta in our country is secretely supporting Iraq and taking sides in this war." This pro-American junta, which is against our people, cannot be expected to act in accordance with the interests of the people in the region and safeguard peace. "The enemies of our people are also the enemies of other peoples, of friendship and of peace."

VOTCP URGES PEOPLE TO 'OPPOSE GALLOWS' OF JUNTA

[Station commentary: "Oppose the Gallows"]

[Text] The pro-American junta of generals ordered the execution of two people near dawn on 8 October. One of them was Necdet Adali who was a member of a leftist adventurist group. No matter how wrong their philosophies and policies are objectively, the youths in the roots of these adventurist groups want nothing more than their country's independence and their people's happiness. Besides, the agent provocateurs, the bloody attacks of the fascist NAP played a major role in causing these youths to break away from the masses and be dragged into individualist armed terrorism. The bloody terror gangs of the fascist NAP spewed death to every person who defended our country's independence, democracy and the people's liberation. The increasing wildness of the fascist NAP gangs under the protective wings of the government and the torturous murders of progressive, democratic and revolutionary persons by these gangs naturally led many people to arm themselves. In a completely unsafe situation, the people had to protect their own lives. These conditions led to the formation of adventurist movements which were incompatible with the struggle path of the working class. These truths should not be ignored. The Communists are totally opposed to the elimination of these youths, regardless of what leftist adventurist group they belong to, by the pro-American junta.

Concerning the execution of fascist Mustafa Pehlivanoglu, one of the perpetrators of the bloody massacre in Balgat, the pro-American junta has reached an understanding with the fascist NAP within the army as well as outside it. By eliminating one of the (?blind) tools of the fascist NAP, the junta is trying to conceal its cooperation with the NAP. Trying to create the impression that it is opposed both to communism and fascism, the junta is trying to prevent the reaction that might come from the democratic forces.

It is a known fact that the aim of the pro-American junta is to eliminate leftism. Every method is being used for this end. Madenis [Turkish mine, metal, metal works and machine industry workers union] Lawyer Ahmet Hilmi Fevziouglu was thrown out of the fifth floor of the Bursa Security Directorate after being tortured. The Tob-Der [Turkish Teachers Unity and Solidarity Association] chief for the Mardin branch was tortured and killed while in military service. Lately, gallows have been set up. The pro-American junta is in cooperation with the fascist NAP. Its efforts to appear opposed to fascism should not deceive anyone. The pro-American junta's promise that it will return to democracy will remain as mere demagogy in the road lined with gallows.

Our people, oppose the gallows;! Freedom to all the political and anti-fascist prisoners. Dev Yol, Dev Sol, all pro-liberation youths; do not resort to individual terrorism methods, do not give the pro-American junta chances, unite your forces in the direction shown by the Turkish Communist Party. The resistance of the people must be organized for the junta to collapse. The rightist military regime of brute force will be destroyed with the joint resistance of all the pro-democracy pro-freedom forces.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE WARNS JUNTA TO RETURN TO DEMOCRACY

[Text] The communist and socialist members of the Council of Europe's Parliamentary Assembly have called for Turkey's immediate expulsion from the council. The Council of Europe passed a resolution warning the militarist junta.

Reports from Strasbourg say the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe passed a resolution calling on the Turkish Government--which is an extension of the militarist junta--to respect human rights, to immediately release all political prisoners and to ensure a return to the democratic system as soon as possible. The resolution warns that in the event Turkey does not return to the democratic system, article eight of the Council of Europe's statutes will be implemented. As will be recalled, this article was implemented against the militarist and fascist junta in Greece that had eliminated all human rights and liberties as well as democratic institutions.

It is reported that the communist and socialist members of the assembly and other members who support democracy have called for Turkey's expulsion from the council in protest against the militarist junta.

Former Turkish legislators Metin Toker, Besim Ustunel Turan Gunes and Cevdet Akcali who tried to justify the action taken by the junta generals in Turkey are regarded as the followers of the militarist administration.

[Text] On Wednesday, the main committee of parliament approved a trade minister's decree under which, in future, the exports to Iran of commodities of foreign origin will be subject to compulsory licensing. It is being announced from parliament in this context that even though at one time Austria did not participate in economic sanctions against Iran for neutrality reasons, it had stated "that it did not want to derive any unjustified advantage resulting from reroutings via Austria."

This is a model example of joining an American embargo despite neutrality!

LEADERS DENOUNCE GDR CURRENCY CONVERSION MEASURE

Schmidt Speech

LD121810 Hamburg DPA in German 1629 GMT 12 Oct 80

[Text] Berlin (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt regards the GDR action in raising the minimum rate of currency conversion as a sign that a fear of "possible domestic consequences of detente" prevails in East Berlin "for the time being." This fear has once again led to a "phase of studied efforts at demarcation," Schmidt said in a speech in Berlin today at the opening of the 13th congress of the German Postal Workers Union. The increase came as a complete surprise to him and the Federal Government and represents a grave setback to detente, putting a "considerable strain" on the relationship of the two German states.

Schmidt said that in the Basic Treaty and the Helsinki Final Act the GDR undertook to cultivate goodneighborly relations and expand travel opportunities. The new measure is at variance with all these statements. The economic reasons given by the GDR finance minister are "absurd to the point of silliness." If the value of the GDR mark in relation to the Deutschmark has in fact quadrupled or quintupled, it would be easy for the GDR to make its currency convertible. But that is something it can only dream about. In reality the GDR measure is aimed at drawing a line of demarcation in the minds of GDR citizens. Schmidt emphasized that it is a fact that the GDR move, without consultation, is a "radical infringement" of the underlying political basis of relations with the Federal Republic. This will have to be discussed in Madrid with all participants in the CSCE process.

The chancellor said that the Federal Government will not accept the GDR measures. It will do "what is in our power in order to clear up positively, in the interests of the people concerned, the problems which have arisen." It will not flag in "its efforts to improve the situation in divided Germany, regardless of the setbacks, which we have also suffered in the past," he said. This time too one will act with "self-confidence and single-minded perseverance." Improvements in the relationship of the two German states must not be "put in question by forces who are obviously unable to cope with their own sense of insecurity and with detente."

Schmidt pointed out that the Federal Government is at one with the three powers and Soviet party chief Leonid Brezhnev in the desire to observe strictly and apply fully the Quadripartite Agreement. He assumes that "all four signatories of this treaty are urgently interested in maintaining tranquillity" in Berlin.

Schmidt came out against "hawks or orthodox forces in the East Berlin leadership, who feel that developments in Eastern Europe are putting wind in their sails for a demarcation course, throwing the ball to the former CDU/CSU candidate for the chancellorship and his party for domestic disputes in our state." Schmidt said: "In view of the reaction by the CSU, which is readily taking up this ball--I am speaking of Herr Stoiber--let me say plainly: Such a game would be at the expense of the people in divided Germany and at the expense of detente in Europe."

Dietrich Stobbe, the governing mayor of Berlin, called on the SED leadership to state whether it wants to pursue detente. After 12 years of detente one ought to know whether the SED wants to assume responsibility for the consequences which will flow from a change of course.

Official Reactions

[Text] Bonn, 10 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government regards the surprise measure of the GDR drastically increasing the amount of money which must be exchanged by visitors from the West as a "severe setback" for the development of inter-German relations.

This was stressed by Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling on behalf of the government at a press conference in Bonn today. Bonn can not accept the GDR's measure. Before Boelling's statement, East Berlin's action was discussed by Chancellor Schmidt, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and the federal minister for inner-German relations, Egon Franke. The statement affirms that Bonn regards the one-sided measure as a very serious step which is clearly contrary to the efforts for European detente within the meaning of the Helsinki Final Act. The matter will have to be discussed at the CSCE followup conference in Madrid.

In the statement Boelling stressed that changes in travel conditions between the two German states must not be made unilaterally because these questions are part of the "political underlying assumption" on which business between the two German states is conducted. The inclusion in the compulsory exchange requirement of old-age pensioners and children under 16 who had hitherto been exempt especially is to be condemned. The Federal Government will seek to clarify the problem "in the interest of the people" during the pending negotiations with the GDR. Boelling also announced that the GDR's permanent representative in Bonn, Ewald Moldt, had been summoned to the federal chancellor's office for a talk with Minister of State Huonker later today. Huonker was going to explain Bonn's attitude to Moldt and ask for an explanation of the GDR's unilateral measure.

Replying to questions Boelling said that the GDR leadership should not imagine that it could unilaterally violate agreements and at the same time carry on business as usual. The Federal Government regarded the increase in the compulsory exchange not merely as an upset in inter-German relations but as a grave matter "justifying fundamental worries". Even so, chances for improving mutual relations have not thereby been rendered invalid. Boelling rejected "with the utmost emphasis" any conjecture that the Federal Government might have known of the measure before the federal elections and that the GDR had postponed it till after 5 October because of the possible outcome of the elections.

The CDU/CSU has called on the Federal Government to demand the immediate cancellation of the increase in the compulsory conversion by East Berlin. The spokesman on inter-German affairs for the CDU/CSU lower house group, Abelein, said in Bonn today that the government should bring the entire political and economic weight of the Federal Republic into play to back its demands. The GDR measure was a grave violation of the CSCE Final Act which must be raised at the followup conference in Madrid. Abelein and CSU lower house deputy Graf Stauffenberg declared it was significant that the drastic increase in the compulsory conversion had been announced only 5 days after the election. Stauffenberg called the measure contrary to existing agreements and against peace. The SPD/FDP coalition was reaping the harvest for its policy over many years of tolerating East Berlin's constant violation of agreements.

Writing in the CDU press service, CDU Deputy Von Wrangel said that the measure was unscrupulous. East Berlin was trying to raise the wall of separation still higher. Von Wrangel spoke of a blow below the belt for the Federal Government whose inter-Germany policy was disintegrating because it was not secured in any way. Bonn must not confine itself to mere protests. The increase in the compulsory conversion was a violation of the assumption underlying the traffic agreement, against the basic agreement and against the CSCE Final Act.

Boelling Comment

LD111408 Hamburg DPA in German 1340 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 10 Oct (DPA)--Secretary of State Klaus Boelling, Federal Government spokesman, has rejected as "totally unbelievable" the reasons advanced by the GDR for increasing the exchange amount. In an interview for WELT AM SONNTAG, Boelling stressed that East Berlin's reference to the depreciation of currency did not hold true since the Federal Republic, after Switzerland, had the hardest currency in the world, and every GDR citizen knew that.

In any case, inter-German relations offered no justification for the GDR measure.

Asked whether East Berlin's halt would further delay a meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED chief Erich Honecker, Boelling referred to Bonn's standpoint according to which a favorable moment for such a meeting would have to be waited for. Unfortunately the GDR's conduct did not allow the assumption that such a moment was to be expected in the near future. However, despite this serious setback this did not exempt the Federal Government from the national duty of continuing to work wholeheartedly for the common bonds among the Germans, Boelling emphasized.

Effect on Negotiations

[Text] Berlin, 12 Oct (DPA)--The increase in compulsory exchange amounts when traveling to the GDR will, in the opinion of the federal spokesman, Secretary of State Klaus Boelling, affect the planned negotiations with the GDR, in which Berlin's energy supply is likely to play a major part. In an interview for BERLINER MORGENPOST, Boelling said today sanctions were usually a blunt instrument in politics since they led to escalation.

Asked whether the Federal Government might accept partial cancellation of the increased exchange amounts, Boelling said the Federal Government "is not interested in horse trading [Balkanische geschaefte], as it were." Bonn cannot possibly accept this violation of the CSCE Final Act and the Basic Treaty.

Protest to GDR Envoy

LD101632 Hamburg DPA in German 1555 GMT 10 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA)—Gunter Huonker, minister of state at the federal chancellor's office, has told Ewald Moldt, head of the GDR's permanent mission in Bonn, that the Federal Government most strongly objects to the "massive increase in the compulsory exchange," a government spokesman said. In the talk, which lasted approximately 1 hour, Huonker explained the reasons for this in detail to the GDR representative, emphasizing that this is an "extraordinarily serious matter."

Comments by Party Leaders

[Text] Bonn, 12 Oct (DPA)—The parties represented in the Bundestag are unanimous in their opinion that the GDR had agreed with Moscow on raising the minimum money exchange requirement for Western visitors to the GDR. This was made plain by party spokesmen on Second German Television (ZDF) this evening in the program "Bonn Perspective".

CDU Bundestag Deputy Alois Mertes was of the opinion that the Soviet Union feared the human bonds which give cohesion to the German people and for this reason had not only approved East Berlin's measures but possibly had even wanted them.

Horst Ehmke (SPD) stressed that the action had to be seen against the background of the overall political climate, which has been characterized by a deteriorating situation between the two superpowers and developments in Poland.

FDP Bundestag Deputy Hans Guenther Hoppe emphasized that the Soviet Union was clearly alarmed at the developments in Poland.

Brandt Interview

LD111056 Hamburg DPA in German 1036 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Oct (DPA)--The increase in the minimum amount of Deutschmarks to be exchanged when traveling to the GDR or East Berlin represents a serious setback for the normalization of relations between the two German states, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt believes. Although the primary object of the policy of detente was to lessen the danger of war and prevent incalculable developments, Brandt said on Deutschlandfunk on Sunday from the German viewpoint it has been especially important to bring about improvements in the humanitarian sector. Now, talks have to start again and "it will have to be made plain to them what this means," Brandt said in an interview pre-released by Deutschlandfunk to DPA.

GENSCHER RECEIVES SOVIET ENVOY; GDR MEASURES TO BE RAISED

[Excerpt] Bonn, 10 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher received Soviet Ambassador Semenov for an exchange of views in Bonn today. The Foreign Ministry spokesman, Sudhoff, announced at the beginning of the talk that the GDR's compulsory conversation measures would impart a special note to the talk. The matter would be raised during the discussion of East-West relations.

CDU/CSU PARLIAMENTARY SPOKESMAN DENOUNCES HONECKER SPEECH

LD132134 Hamburg DPA in German 2015 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 13 Oct (DPA)--In the view of the CDU/CSU, SED leader Erich Honecker's speech in Gera has further toughened the GDR's policy towards the Federal Republic. CDU/CSU parliamentary group spokesman Eduard Ackermann said in an initial statement this evening that Honecker's demand for recognition of GDR state citizenship and turning the permanent missions into embassies contradicts the Federal Republic's constitutional law. No responsible parliament in the free part of Germany could accept this. It was to be expected, said the spokesman, that Honecker would continue to push his policy of demarcation. He apparently is afraid that the population in his sphere of rule, in the same way as in Poland, might be anxious to win a bit more freedom for itself.

Politicians' Comments

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 14 Oct (DPA)--Leading Bonn politicians today expressed disappointment at East Berlin's new course of demarcation vis-a-vis the Federal Republic. In the opinion of the chairman of the lower house inter-German committee, Kurt Mattick (SPD), the speech by GDR state and party leader Erich Honecker yesterday evening confirmed East Berlin's break with the policy of detente. The CDU/CSU lower house group spokesman on German policy, Olaf von Wrangel, spoke of a "return to the ice age of the cold war."

In his speech to party officials in Gera, Honecker reaffirmed the demand for recognition of a separate GDR state citizenship and the turning of the permanent missions of the two German states in Bonn and East Berlin into embassies.

In an interview with the NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG, Mattick said with regard to the possibility for further development of relations between Bonn and East Berlin, "I think it will be very difficult in the period ahead." He said that the motive for the sudden switch in East Berlin's policy was the fact that the Soviet empire had been shaken by developments in Poland.

Like Mattick, Von Wrangel also strongly rejected Honecker's demands for recognition of a separate GDR state citizenship and the upgrading of the permanent missions of the two states into embassies. He renewed his demand on North German Radio for countermeasures by the Federal Republic, such as a reduction in payments to the GDR. Von Wrangel expressed the hope that the government and opposition would arrive at a common position on this matter. "This would not fail because of us," he said.

DEFENSE MINISTRY DENIES KNOWLEDGE OF SOVIET TROOPS NEAR POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 13 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Defense Ministry has no knowledge of a concentration of Soviet tanks in the GDR on the frontier with Poland. This was stated today by a ministry spokesman with reference to reports to the contrary by BILD-ZEITUNG. The paper wrote on Monday with reference to Western secret services that Soviet armored formations and troop units were constantly on the move at night in the bezirks of Neubrandenburg, Frankfurt-Oder, Cottbus and Dresden. They were heading for the Polish frontier.

GENSCHER TO LEAD DELEGATION TO MADRID CONFERENCE

LD111000 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Genscher, vice chancellor and FRG minister of foreign affairs, intends to visit Madrid from 11 to 18 November to lead his country's delegation during the first week of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Given that Genscher's intention has been the subject of consultations with West Germany's allies, it is possible that the foreign ministers of the main European powers--and perhaps also American Secretary of State Muskie--will arrange to meet in Madrid on 11 November.

PAKISTANI PRESIDENT REMARKS ON MIDEAST ISSUES

DW101307 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2145 GMT 9 Oct 80

[Text] [Question] How do you assess the military conflict between Iran and Iraq?

[Answer] I have been on a peace mission and I am very optimistic. I have listened to the brothers in Iran and the brothers in Iraq. These two neighboring states, both Islamic, are fighting against each other. It is my impression that they will show insight very soon and that the conflict will be ended.

[Question] What kind of an end will the conflict have?

[Answer] As I said, I am an optimist. I seek the more friendly sides of life, the silver lining on the horizon. I hope that will be seen sooner or later.

[Question] You do not believe that the conflict will expand?

[Answer] No, I believe in the other states' approach to the problem, particularly the big powers. I have said before that others ought to keep out. The best kind of activity at the moment is doing nothing, particularly as regards the big powers. It looks as if they are adhering to this, and I hope that the conflict will remain limited.

[Answer] We should not be concerned with this fabricated news. We should accept the word of King Husayn who has said that he will not intervene in the battles. Naturally we can visualize where his sympathies lie, but actually this, too, is impermissible because we should not take sides.

[Question] In your country you have problems with the refugees from Afghanistan. How do you assess the situation in that country?

[Answer] We are suffering from the consequences of this occupation to the extent that we have more than 1 million refugees in Pakistan. The Soviet Union, however, says that it does not want to stay in Afghanistan. I would like to assume, for a change, that it means what it says. We must hope that it will sooner or later allow the Afghan people to determine themselves what kind of government they want to have.

[Question] You are optimistic in that respect as well?

[Answer] Yes, perhaps there is no other choice.

[Question] But there are no indications of a withdrawal.

[Answer] No, nor do I see it in the foreseeable future. Still the Soviets say that they will not stay there forever. Let us for a change take this at face value, too.

Press Conference in Bonn

BK101004 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 0200 GMT 10 Oct 80

[Text] Addressing a press conference in Bonn last night after his talks with FRG leaders, the president stressed that Pakistan favored a political rather than a military solution to the Afghan problem. He said there were indications that the Soviet Union also favored a political solution of the issue. In answering a question the president said he had reached this conclusion on the basis of the fact that the Soviet Union has stressed such a solution in bilateral talks and had expressed similar opinions in international forums. He expressed the view that the Soviet Union has adopted this attitude as a result of the reaction of world public opinion. Answering another question, he appealed to the Western press to call on the conscience of the world not to lose sight of the fact that a big power has intervened militarily in an independent, nonaligned Muslim state and has stationed 90,000 of its troops in that country. He said the real issue is preservation of the independence of Afghanistan, which was independent until a few months ago. Elaborating on this issue in its human and economic dimensions, the president said the Afghan refugees were a heavy burden on the Pakistani economy. He said that the total assistance provided by the world is absolutely inadequate and does not meet the needs of the Afghan refugees, whose number is constantly increasing, and that if this situation continues the number may reach 1.5 million by the end of this year.

Concerning the Iran-Iraq conflict, President Gen Mohammad Ziaul Haq said he was honored to know the stand of both countries in this connection. He said the fact that the leaders of these countries expressed their desire to hold talks with him on this issue is itself encouraging. The president said the Islamic Conference secretary general, Habib Chatti, has been asked to revisit Tehran and Baghdad to assess the possibilities of peace. He said that whenever the need arises he would immediately leave for Tehran and Baghdad. In answer to a question, the president referred to his speech at the UN in which he had clarified the superpowers' role in this issue, and said that the basic issue is the Shatt al-Arab which is a colonial legacy. He said both countries should act with restraint and peace should be established in the region.

Answering another question, the president said he is optimistic about an improvement in relations between India and Pakistan. This depended mainly on the sincerity of both countries. Pakistan had been trying to improve relations with India for the last 3 years and some success has been achieved in this connection. He said, however, that there were some differences which could be resolved through genuine efforts. He also referred to the Kashmir issue and expressed the hope that this could also be settled under the Simla agreement.

PCF NOMINATES MARCHAIS AS PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

[Text] Paris, 12 Oct (AFP)--The French Communist Party national conference today unanimously nominated its leader Georges Marchais as candidate for the presidential elections to be held in April, 1981.

Campaign Launched

[Text] Paris, 12 Oct (AFP)--French Communist Party leader Georges Marchais launched his campaign for next year's presidential elections today, promising that he would conduct a "dynamic and energetic" fight, without concessions, for change in which his principal weapon would be "the truth."

In a speech today at the end of the national party conference in suburban Nanterre, at which he was unanimously nominated as the Communist candidate for the Elysee, Mr Marchais declared that he would fight for "justice, liberty, solidarity and for the greatness of France."

He proposed that all candidates join in debating the issues and promised that he would willingly participate.

During his address to the party conference, Mr Marchais, contrary to expectations, made no attack on the Socialist Party or its leader Francois Mitterrand. Other speakers at the weekend conference showed no similar hesitation.

Most of them strongly attacked both the "capitalistic" policies of President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and the political line followed in recent years by the Socialists, who were linked with the Communists in a "Union of the Left" until its collapse after the legislative elections of March 1978.

The speeches would seem to rule out collaboration between the two parties in a second round of voting that would be necessary if no candidate received a majority in the April 26 elections. However, the fact that Mr Marchais refrained from attacking the Socialists during his conference speech may indicate that such collaboration cannot be automatically ruled out.

[Text] Georges Marchais dropped a small bomb on television's Channel Two this evening. At the end of the program "Cards on the Table" the secretary general of the Communist Party very clearly let it be understood that in the second ballot of the presidential election the Communist Party will refuse to stand down in favor of the Socialist candidate. Here is what Georges Marchais said:

Automatic stepping-down is a habit which is out of date. Moreover, he added, this standing-down was not entirely automatic on the part of the Socialists in previous elections. During this program Georges Marchais added that he has the personal qualities to be head of state. He also stated that he has always thought that for the Communists not to put up a candidate was a great sacrifice in 1974. Ever since the Joint Program much water has flowed under the bridge and the Socialist Party has abandoned the policy of union.

ANSA REPORTS LIKELY COMPOSITION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

[Excerpts] Rome, 10 Oct (ANSA)--The Christian Democrat (DC), Socialist (PSI), Social Democrat (PSDI) and Republican (PRI) parties, plus one (right of center) Liberal Party (PLI) minister, emerged today as the probable ingredients of Italy's next government.

The arrangement, which has already been dubbed the "four plus one" preparation, was what apparently came out of the ruling Christian Democrat Party's leadership meeting in Rome Thursday.

The DC, Italy's largest party and the one which has ruled the country either alone or in partnership with other parties since shortly after the end of the Second World War, came out for the creation of a new government that had a wider majority of parliamentary support behind it than its predecessor.

Premier-Designate and DC Chairman Arnaldo Forlani announced plans to get started on the actual job of putting together a cabinet in consultations with the prospective coalition partners starting tomorrow. The PSI, PSDI and PRI will be holding their own leadership meetings in Rome today.

DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli received the support of the party's Executive Board yesterday for a three-point strategy approach to settling this country's fortieth post-war government crisis. He called for:

--The creation of a so-called "democratic solidarity" coalition which included the three parties of Cossiga's out-going team.
--An expanded parliamentary majority to back up the next government.
--Pursuit of a "concise and open confrontation" in communications with the communist opposition.

In his remarks to the DC leadership yesterday about the new government's platform, Forlani made it clear that he intended to consult with the Communist Party (PCI) on policy matters. He said he would be conferring with all of the parties which "shared the worries and rationale that led to a democratic solidarity commitment" in the past.

The idea of leaving one cabinet post for a member of the Liberal Party reportedly came from former Deputy Secretary Carlo Donat Cattin, a spokesman of the DC's conservative majority, as a means of offsetting the added leftist weight he thinks the PSDI-PSI alliance will pull in the new government.

The names that have leaked to the press as likely ministerial candidates include Lelio Lagorio (Socialist) as deputy premier and Paolo Emilio Taviani (DC) as interior minister.

FORLANI BEGINS WORK ON NEW GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

[Excerpts] The Prime Minister designate is holding a new round of consultations. Here is a report from Montecitorio by Innocenzo Cruciani:

[Cruciani] The meeting between Arnaldo Forlani and the Socialist delegation led by Bettino Craxi has just ended. The problem of the political formula has been resolved: It will be a four-party government including Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats and Republicans. The prime minister-designate has now started work on the program. Following unanimous approval by the Christian Democrats; Forlani can now also rely on the positive conclusions of the Socialist, Social Democratic and Republican directorates which met today.

Craxi, in fact, went to Forlani to inform him on the conclusions of the Socialist directorate. The problems of the program platform and political guarantees, for which the Socialist Party asked to face this new government experience with major confidence, however, remain open. Craxi reminded the Socialist leaders of this at their meeting today. Craxi then said that when the Christian Democrats offered and emphasized their unity, the Socialists did not remain indifferent but expressed the hope that this unity will be stable and political. The Socialist Party left wing, however, criticized the party secretariat. It submitted its own political motion [at the meeting of the directorate] and voted for it.

Appreciation for the prospects of resolving the crisis was also expressed by the Social Democratic directorate. Longo emphasized the existence of a parity relationship in the new majority between the Christian Democracy and the forces of lay democracy on the basis of equal rank.

In his speech at the meeting of the Republican directorate, Spadolini insisted that the new government should pursue the same aims as the cabinet which resigned. The Republican directorate empowered the secretary to develop with the prime minister-designate negotiations on the program.

The so-called Liberal question is still open. This morning Forlani had a long conversation with Zanone who then told journalists that the Liberal Party will not support the government in disguise. Earlier, the Liberals said that they are not willing to stay in antechamber. By these expressions they meant to clarify their opposition to being part of the majority but not of the government which will represent this majority. The Liberal directorate will say its final word on 12th October.

As we said at the beginning, this afternoon Forlani resumed his consultations--this time limited to the parties ranging from the Liberals to the Communists. The prime minister-designate had a talk with the Socialist delegation which ended a short time ago. Shortly afterwards, he met the Social Democrats, followed by the Republicans.

Today Forlani was also supposed to meet with the Communists, but the talks were postponed until tomorrow morning because the condition of Luigi Longo, president of the PCI, had worsened. However, we can note a statement by a Communist representative, Napolitano, who said that should some questions raised by the Communist Party be accepted the Communist opposition might be different.

Santagati, deputy of the Social Movement, however, stated that the new government would be mortgaged by the Christian Democratic left wing.

A note by the press agency of the "new forces" [leftwing Christian Democratic faction], led by Donat Cattin, says that the government must be formed within the framework of five parties of definite democratic roots, which means that the Christian Democrats of the "new forces" confirmed their opposition to a government with the Communists. This was actually stated by the faction's press agency itself.

Let us recall that Forlani is now talking to the Social Democrats. He will then continue his consultations by receiving the Republican delegation.

FOREIGN MINISTER RETURNS FROM U.S. TRIP

LD131544 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1500 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral is back in Lisbon from Washington where he had a meeting with the U.S. Secretary of State. In New York he addressed the 35th UN General Assembly session.

Washington Press Conference

LD131228 Lisbon in English to North America 0300 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Before leaving Washington for Lisbon, Prof Freitas do Amaral, the Portuguese vice-prime minister and foreign minister, told journalists that Portugal obviously had no possibility of defending--nor did she want to defend--any return of East Timor to the former colonial status.

At the end of his 2-day visit to Washington, where he had the opportunity to talk to high American official including Mr Edmund Muskie, the Secretary of State, Mr Freitas do Amaral said that his talks with the American official had covered a wide range of international problems, including Poland, Afghanistan, the Middle East, Southeast Asia, the conflict between Iran and Iraq and, generally speaking, the overall strategic threat posed above all by Soviet imperialism that must be considered by the NATO countries.

The Portuguese foreign minister added that progress had been made in studying the new forms that cooperation with the United States should take in the present world context, namely the scope of strengthening Western solidarity within NATO.

Answering a journalist's question, he said that there was no question of granting the United States new bases in Portugal, but he added that there had been a study of the potential use to be given to the Lajes airbase in the Azores within the context of the present world situation.

SA CARNEIRO EXPLAINS WHY CONSTITUTION NEEDS AMENDING

LD101451 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Eduardo San Martin 7 October interview in Lisbon with Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro: "General Eanes Belongs to a Politicomilitary Group Which Advocates Collectivist Socialism"]

[Text] Question: One of the reasons why these elections [to the Assembly of the Republic] were especially important is because the constitution can be revised following them--a constitution which proclaims in its second article that Portugal is a democratic state that is organizing itself "with the aim of ensuring the transition to socialism." What are the main aspects of this constitution which your coalition wishes to change.

Answer: The first aspect is that of changing the political framework to fulfill the promises of 25 April [1974] and institutionalize full democracy--something which has not happened with this constitution, which was conceived for a transitional period during which there is still a politicomilitary power. At present, the armed forces do not come under the government, and parliament confines itself to approving the military budgets. The armed forces' legislative body is the Council of the Revolution. The Council has great political and legislative power, such as the power to annul laws approved by the government and parliament, if it deems them contrary to the constitution. This is what must be reformed, especially at the political level. At the ideological level, we have a constitution embodying a program of collectivist socialism which affects the economic system. We must change this and make an open constitution which will make electoral free play possible. We also must change, but not very significantly, the powers concerning the president of the republic, the government and parliament to guarantee the stability of majority governments.

Question: You were not leading your party when in 1976 the then Popular Democratic Party voted in favor of this constitution and when it was the first party to support General Eanes' candidacy for the presidency.

Answer: I was ill when the constitution was made; that was why I could not take part. I returned in September 1975 [date as published] and resumed the leadership of my party. The Social Democratic Party [PSD] deputies' task was a task of resistance to the Socialist and Communist inclination to make an even more Marxist and even more militaristic constitution. The party decided, despite my opposition, to vote in favor of the constitution, but published a statement expressing its disagreement with some precepts of this constitution. I was indeed in the party when it decided to support General Eanes' candidacy. I also opposed that, but the majority current in the party prevailed.

Question: What has happened during the last 4 years to cause Eanes to become your principal political opponent?

Answer: It is more a matter of a difference in political blueprints than of a problem of personal relations. Eanes has moved away from the stances of the parties comprising the Democratic Alliance which supported him in 1976. General Eanes is within the area of the Socialist Party [PS] and has the Communist Party's support in many respects. He belongs to a politicomilitary group which in 1975 published the well-known "Document of the Nine," which rejected social democracy as a form of capitalism and advocated state socialism--collectivist, albeit democratic, socialism. I believed that Eanes, who was elected president principally with the support of the PSD and the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS]--because the Socialist electorate did not vote totally for General Eanes--would follow a totally democratic and open line. This appeared to be the case initially, but by the end of 1977 it was clear that the president of the republic was identifying himself with that politicomilitary group's idea of socialism. After the Democratic Alliance's victory last December, Eanes did not change his stance; rather he criticized the government, kept his distance from it and never supported it. So two stances, two lines, became clear, and this election victory for the Democratic Alliance now is, in my opinion, the beginning of defeat for Eanes' politicomilitary blueprint and, of course, for Eanes himself.

"It Is Unacceptable That an Undemocratic Constitution Should Remain in Force"

Question: We will talk about the presidential elections later. I would like to dwell on the problem of the revision of the constitution. For this to be carried out in accordance with what is stipulated, a two-thirds parliamentary majority is needed. However, the Democratic Alliance has only 55 percent of the state in the Assembly of the Republic. So you are talking about achieving the revision by means of a referendum. But the constitution itself does not envisage this kind of consultation under any circumstances. So how is the revision of the constitution by this method to be made possible without resorting to an unconstitutional procedure?

Answer: The constitution does not envisage referendums, but nor does it rule them out. We now have a constitution that is the consequence of the 1975 agreement between the parties and the armed forces movement. Having held democratic elections to a parliament with powers to revise the constitution, even though we have not attained a two-thirds majority, I believe that it is unacceptable that a document should remain in force which does not have a fully democratic nature.

I believe that it is not acceptable that the majority of the country should have to continue to endure an undemocratic constitution solely because there is not a two-thirds majority. It is far more acceptable in this situation for the revision to be approved by an absolute majority in parliament and for it to be submitted afterward to a referendum in order to surmount this difficulty of the two-thirds majority.

Question: Bearing in mind that the Council of the Revolution decides on the constitutionality of the laws approved in parliament and that the president of the republic has powers of veto over these same laws, do you not believe that your procedure would be doomed to failure if Eanes is reelected and the present Council of the Revolution continues to exist?

Answer: That is very clear, and that is why the presidential elections in 2 months time are so important. To this effect, the revision of the constitution and full democracy in in Portugal also depend on these presidential elections.

Question: You have said that if General Eanes were reelected, you would not be prime minister. DOes this mean that your coalition would refuse to form a government or that you personally would refuse to form a government?

Answer: The Democratic Alliance would never refuse to form a government, but both I, myself, and the deputy premier and foreign minister (CDS Leader Diogo Freitas do Amaral) have stated that we would not agree to head the government if General Eanes is reelected. We know the difficulties which will be created, especially bearing in mind that Eanes would be at the same time president of the republic, chairman of the Council of the Revolution and commander-in-chief of the armed forces. Under those circumstances I believe that the institutional struggle, the struggle for the revision of the constitution, will be centered above all in parliament, and my work could be more useful in parliament than in the government, as prime minister.

Question: According to Sunday's results, the Democratic Alliance has about 48 percent of the votes and the parties supporting General Eanes about 46 percent. If neither of the two main candidates is elected by an absolute majority on the first round, it seems clear that the Democratic Alliance's candidate--General Soares Carneiro--has a better chance on the second round, with a relative majority. But do you totally discount a victory for General Eanes on the first round, bearing in mind that presidentialelections are not the same as legislative elections and that a transference of votes could occur?

Answer: Of course, the two elections are not the same, but Eanes has been a protagonist of the PS in the legislative elections. He intervened in the campaign in favor of the PS and associated himself and his reelection with the results of the legislative elections. [PS Secretary General] Soares himself went so far as to say that voting for the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] (Socialist coalition) was the same as voting for Eanes and that to vote for Eanes was to vote for the FRS. The FRS has secured fewer votes than when the PS ran alone. As a result of this, I believe that the defeat for the Socialists in the legislative elections also constitutes the first defeat for Eanes' candidacy in the presidential elections. On the other hand, after the Democratic Alliance's results in Sunday's elections, I believe that it is our candidate who has every chance of being elected in the first round.

Question: As you know very well, the government coalition between the Socialists and the CDS in 1978 ended badly. There are even those who asserts that the PS' electoral erosion started at that time. Do you expect that your alliance with the conservatives of the CDS will end better?

Answer: Yes, and this is demonstrated by the experience of the last 9 months. There is a fundamental difference between the 1978 government agreement between the Socialists and the CDS and the Democratic Alliance. The former was only a government agreement to emerge from a situation of instability, and, as has always happened in the past, when the Socialists were in power, the Communists did what they liked and had more influence over government affairs that the PS' partners. For that reason the PS-CDS agreement was broken, because of the PCP's influence on economic and social policy.

Question: And yet your party has had to pay perhaps too high a price to preserve its alliance with the CDS. In return for only one-third of conservative deputies within the coalition, you have had to give to the CDS portfolios as important as foreign affairs, defense and foreign trade, among others.

Answer: I do not believe that it is a very high price. The sharing out of portfolios was effected bearing in mind the government's efficiency, and it seems to me that the allocation of portfolios which was effected is perfectly appropriate. The allocation of portfolios which we effected has worked well and in fact will be maintained now.

Question: The role of the left--booth the PS and the PCP--in parliament has been reduced, but they retain--the latter in particular--their decisive influence in the trade unions. It is foreseeable that the Socialists and Communists will use the trade union struggle to conduct a policy of opposition outside parliament, especially if progress is made with revising certain precepts of the constitution, which many workers regard as a gain of theirs. Is your government capable of withstanding a general offensive in this field?

Answer: They already attempted to do this after last year's elections, but the struggle which they planned of systematic strikes failed totally, and I do not believe that they are now capable of unleashing a new trade union offensive. I believe that we will continue to have an atmosphere of relative social peace.

"We Are in Favor of Spain's Entry Into NATO:

Question: Your government has been accused of curbing inflation artificially over the last 9 months for electioneering purposes.

Answer: It is not true, because we do not tamper with policy to engage in electioneering--and that is why we won the elections--and because, moreover, it would have been suicidal for us, since we, ourselves, would have inherited that situation. Inflation has been reduced very significantly, from 23.2 percent last year to 15 or 16 percent this year. Our policy will be to keep inflation at these levels and at the same time to increase investments and the capacity for creating employment.

Question: It has sometimes been said that Spain's entry into NATO would necessarily reduce Portugal's strategic importance within the Atlantic alliance, and yet you are in favor of Spain's entry into NATO.

Answer: I believe that in this connection we must not pay attention solely to the interests of one country or its armed forces. I believe that Spain's entry into NATO is necessary for the defense of southern Europe, the peninsula and the West, although this is a problem for Spain and not for us. But if Spain decides to join, our stance is in favor of its entry.

MILD EARTHQUAKE REPORTED IN AZORES

MINISTER PUNSET EVINCES 'OPTIMISM' ON EEC MEMBERSHIP TALKS

LD191241 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 8 Oct 80 pp 3-4

[Own correspondent report on 7 October press conference in Paris given by Spanish Minister for Relations with EEC Eduardo Punset: "Negotiatons with EEC: Punset Seems Optimistic"]

[Text] Paris, 7 October--Spain has its place in Europe and negotiations are proceeding along normal channels. The EC's internal difficulties will have some effect on the timetable, but it will only be extended within "reasonable" limits, since it will be in "terms of some months" longer. Nevertheless, the negotiations will be difficult and the effort to adapt the Spanish economy to the "new era" will be a major one.

These are the general outlines of the remarks made at a press conference given this morning by Minister for Relations With the EEC Eduard Punset Casals. Our minister threw cold water on some illusions and skillfully managed to dedramatize certain topics, while at the same time emphasizing the difficult nature of others.

Meetings

The main reason for his optimism is the cordial atmosphere in which all his talks in Paris took place. Both yesterday with Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet and at lunch with Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Pierre Bernard-Reymond and today at this morning's meeting with Prime Minister Raymond Barre, this cordial atmosphere seems to have cleared away all the storm clouds created in connection with Giscard d'Estaing's 5 June speech.

Our minister also met with Jean-Francois Deniau, the former foreign trade minister and now newly appointed minister delegate for administrative reforms to the prime minister; in his former capacity as ambassador to Madrid he always followed Spain's rapprochement to Europe with interest.

With all his interlocutors Eduardo Punset encountered a favorable response to Spain's position expressed, especially on specific points, particularly in French approval for the working program for the next 2 years established with the EC authorities.

Positive Points

Has a change occurred in France's position since 5 June? Our minister replied, cautiously, that this question should be put to the French authorities. However, he was able to observe several positive points. The first was the clear confirmation that Spain must join the EC. There was no doubt concerning this point on the part of his interlocutors--not only on this occasion in Paris but also in his contacts in Brussels and Luxembourg.

The second positive point concerned the timetable. Certainly the EC's internal difficulties will influence the membership timetable for the new member countries, but the timetable will only be extended by a matter of months. This is a "reasonable period," especially bearing in mind the historic importance of Spain's EC membership. In this connection Punset was keen to lessen the drama of the issue as much as possible, above all because he believes that basically the rate of the negotiations as now envisaged will provide sufficient work for the negotiators in the months ahead before the Nine are ready to tackle the agricultural and budgetry issues.

Spain has managed to ensure that the working program will be followed for the next few months and also that there be a related consideration of the EC's internal problems, both agricultural and budgetary, without this constituting proper negotiations.

On several occasions France's proposals regarding an "a la carte" or "two-speed" or "variable geometry" Europe were mentioned during the press conference. The Spanish minister's reply was always forthright. This subject was not even mentioned during his talks in Paris. He added that the issue was not raised during his contacts with EC authorities in Brussels either and that there is no knowledge of such a plan within EC circles.

When asked about the effects of the French presidential election campaign on negotiations, our minister tried to place the issue outside the context of the French political situation. Negotiations are in themselves "a serious, very complex and very difficult matter" and it is inevitable that political events will exert an influence on them, but this influence can never be decisive or alter the basic direction, namely, Spain's membership—which is something that nobody is now challenging.

GOVERNMENT-PCE TALKS HELD ON ANDALUSIAN AUTONOMY

LD081145 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 7 Oct 80 p 13

[Unattributed report: "Partial Agreement in Government-PCE Negotiations"]

[Excerpt] The meeting held yesterday at the Moncloa Palace between the government delegation headed by Prime Minister Suarez and the PCE delegation to discuss the issue of state building and the autonomies concluded with partial agreement. There was agreement that Andalusia should achieve the degree of autonomy envisaged in Article 151 of the constitution; there was no agreement, however, on the procedure which should be employed to this end.

Santiago Carrillo, who headed a Communist delegation comprising the leaders of Galicia (Angel Guerreiro), the Basque country (Roberto Lertxundi), Andalusia (Fernando Soto) and Catalonia (Gregorio Lopez Raimundo), said after the lengthy meeting (it lasted 4 hours) that "there seems to be agreement that it is impossible to find a solution to the Andalusian autonomy process without resorting to Article 151 in form and substance, and in this spirit the search for a formula to recover Almeria's full participation in the legal process would not be difficult."

Mr Carrillo assessed the talks as "useful," and added that "the government does not have a very complete formula for resolving the problem of Almeria, but it is not impossible to find one." It must be emphasized that the PCE secretary general did not mention at any time the "Martin-Villa solution"—that is, the formula of Article 144, which the Communists reject, as do the Socialists, and so the above-mentioned final agreement could come through amending the law on forms of referendum.

THATCHER ADDRESSES TORY PARTY CONFERENCE

LD101450 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1435 GMT 10 Oct 80

[Text] Britain is on the road to recovery--the foundations have been laid--and U-turns are out, the prime minister told the Tory Party conference at Brighton today. To doubters who suspect an imminent toning down of tough policies Mrs Thatcher said: "You turn if you want to--the lady's not for turning." Her message was unequivocal. The government will not be deflected and ministers expect inflation to curve downwards as we approach what the Tories hope will be an autumn of understanding followed by a winter of commonsense--not discontent,

Mrs Thatcher had the expected rapturous welcome when she told the conference, "Challenge is exhilerating...this week has demonstrated we are a party united in purpose, strategy and resolve,"--and in a jibe at Labour's disagreements at Blackpool last week--she added: "We actually like one another."

The prime minister said: "In its first 17 months this government has laid the foundations for recovery. We have undertaken a heavy load of legislation--a load we do not intend to repeat because we do not share the socialist fantasy that achievement is measured by the number of laws you pass." After listing the formidable barricade of obstacles the government had swept aside, she said: "The left continues to refer with relish to the death of capitalism. Well if this is the death of capitalism, I must say it's quite a way to go."

Mrs Thatcher said the prime economic objective was the defeat of inflation. "Inflation destroys nations and society as surely as invading armies do. Inflation is the parent of unemployment. It is the unseen robber of those who have saved." She said the government's policy for the defeat of inflation was traditional. It existed long before monetarism became a convenient term of political invective.

European countries had lived through rampant inflation and knew it led to "suitcase money, massive unemployment and the breakdown of society itself." Now after many years of monetary self-discipline, they had stable, prosperous economies. Mrs Thatcher said the only question was: "Has Britain the courage and resolve to sustain the discipline for long enough to break through to success? Yes we have, and we shall." She went on: "This government is determined to stay with policy, and see it through to its conclusion. That is what marks this administration as one of the truly radical ministries of post-war Britain."

Inflation was falling and would continue to fall, but the government was aware of the hardship and worries that went with the conquest of inflation. The foremost among these was unemployment. The figures could be softened in many ways. The percentage of unemployment was much less now than in the 1930s. More married women went out to work and a quarter of a million people found new jobs each month.

"But when all that has been said, the fact remains that the level of unemployment in our country is a human trageday," said Mrs Thatcher. "Let me make it clear beyond doubt--I am profoundly concerned about unemployment. Human dignity and self respect are undermined when men and women are condemned to idleness. The waster of a country's most precious asset--the talent and energy of its people--make it the bounden duty of government to seek a real and lasting cure," Mrs Thatcher said. "Does anyone imagine," she went on, "that there is the smallest political gain in letting this level of unemployment continue? Or that there is some obscure economic religion whcih demands this level of unemployment as part of its grisly ritual? This government is pursuing the only policy which gives any hope of bringing our people back to real and lasting employment."

Mrs Thatcher said she understood the resentment in the private sector over the advantages enjoyed by the public sector. Higher public spending, far from curing unemployment, could be the very vehicle that lost jobs and caused bankruptcies in trade and commerce. She warned local authorities that rate increases could cripple local businessmen.

And she insisted that high pay settlements in the public sector meant there was less money for equipment, and would result in higher charges which could drive private companies out of business. "If spending money like water was the answer to our country's problems, we would have no problems. If ever a nation has spent, spent and spent again, ours has. Today that dream is over. All that money has got us nowhere. But it still has to come from somewhere," said the prime minister.

Independence did not mean contracting out of all relationships with others, Mrs Thatcher said. "A nation can be free--but it won't stay free for long if it has no friends and no alliances. Above all, it won't stay free if it can't pay its own way in the world."

An individual needed to be part of a community--and to feel that he was part of it. "There is more to this than the chance to earn a living for himself and his family, essential though that is," Mrs Thatcher said. "Of course our vision and our aims go far beyond the complex arguments of economics. But unless we get the economy right, we shall deny our people the opportunity to share that vision and to see beyond the narrow horizons of economic necessity.

"Without a healthy economy, we cannot have a healthy society. And without a healthy society, the economy won't stay healthy for long," she said. A healthy society was not created by the state, for when the state grew too powerful, people felt that they counted for less and less. "It drains society not only of its wealth, but of initiative, of energy, the will to improve and innovate as well as to preserve what is best," Mrs Thatcher said. "But our aim is to let people feel that they they count for more and more. If we can't trust the deepest instincts of our people, we shouldn't be in politics at all."

"And some aspects of our present society do really offend those instincts," Mrs Thatcher said. Decent people wanted to do a proper job of work--not to be restrained or intimidated from giving value for money, and saw crime and violence as a threat not just to society but to their own orderly way of life. "They want to be allowed to bring up their children in these beliefs, without the fear that their efforts will be daily frustrated in the name of 'progress' or 'free expression'." She added: "That is what family life is all about. There isn't a 'generation gap' in a happy and united family." Without the generally accepted standards for people to rely on, there was no society but "purposeless anarchy".

A healthy society was not created by institutions like schools and universities either. It was the voluntary creation of its people. "If our people feel they are part of a great nation, and are prepared to will the means to keep us great, then a great nation we shall be and shall remain," she said. "What, then, stands in our way? The prospect of another winter of discontent? I suppose it might. But I prefer to believe that certain lessons have been learned from experience that we are coming slowly, painfully, to an autumn of understanding. I hope it will be followed by a winter of commonsense."

"If it isn't we shall not be diverted from our course. To those waiting with baited breath for that favourite media catch-phrase 'U-turn' I have only one thing to say--you turn if you want to; the lady's not for turning.

"And I say this not only to you, but to our friends overseas--and to those who are not our friends.

"In foreign affairs, we have pursued our national interest robustly while remaining alive to the needs and interests of others. We have acted where our predecessors dithered." Mrs Thatcher then paid a personal tribute to Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington. "Whenever I think of our much-travelled foreign secretary, I am reminded of the advertisement--you know the one I mean--about the peer that refreshes those foreign parts that other peers can't reach. I think I got that right!" she said.

On East-West relations, Mrs Thatcher said: "Long before we came to office--and therefore long before the invasion of Afghanistan--I was pointing to the threat from the East. I was accused of scaremongering. But events have more than justified my words.

"Soviet Marxism is ideologically, politically and morally bankrupt. But militarily the Soviet Union is a powerful and growing threat. It was Mr Kosygin who said: 'No peace-loving country, no personal integrity should remain indifferent when an aggressor bolds human life and world opinion in insolent contempt'.

"We agree. The British Government is not indifferent to the occupation of Afghanistan. We will not allow it to be forgotten."

She went on: "For unless and until the Soviet troops are withdraw, other nations are bound to wonder which of them may be next."

Mrs Thatcher's message to critics who complain that the government was complicating East-West relations and endangering detente was--"the real danger would lie in keeping silent."

"Detente is indivisible, and it is a two-way process. The Soviet Union cannot conduct wars by proxy in Southeast Asia and in Africa; foment trouble in the Middle East and the Caribbean; invade neighbouring countries; and still expect to conduct business as usual," she warned.

"Unless detente is pursued by both sides, it can be pursued by neither. It is a delusion to suppose otherwise. That is the message we shall be delivering loud and clear at the meetings of the European security conference in Madrid in the weeks immediately ahead," she said. "We shall also be reminding the other participants in Madrid that the Helsinki accord was supposed to promote the freer movement of people and ideas. The Soviet Government's response so far has been a campaign of repression worse than any since Stalin's day. It had been hoped that Helsinki would open gates across Europe. In fact, the borders today are better armed--and the walls are no lower."

Mrs Thatcher said she saluted the workers of Poland who had shown that their human spirit was "unvanquished". "The Polish workers have shown that it is the communist system that is in crisis. The Polish people should be left to work out their own future without external interference."

On Rhodesia, Mrs Thatcher hailed the settlement as "a success won in the face of all the odds" which had created new respect for Britain. "It has given fresh hope to those grappling with the terrible problems of southern Africa. It has given the Commonwealth new strength and unity. Now it is for the new nation, Zimbabwe, to build her own future with the support of all those who believe that democracy has a place in Africa."

Mrs Thatcher was scathing in her attack on Labour's defence policies which she contrasted with the government's attitudes of "realism and resolve". She said: "Not for us the disastrous fantasies of unilateral disarmament, of withdrawal from NATO and of abandoning Northern Ireland. The irresponsibility of the left on defence increases as the dangers which we face loom larger. We for our part have chosen a defence policy which potential foes will respect. The acquisition of the Trident missile system would "ensure the credibility of our strategic deterrent until the end of the century and beyond."

She described the decision to site cruise missiles in Britain as a demonstration of "the wisdom of firmness" in arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union. "We intend to maintain, and where possible to improve, our conventional forces, so as to pull our weight in the alliance. We have no wish to seek a free ride at the expense of our allies."

On membership of the EEC, Mrs Thatcher said the government had shown that it was possible "to combine a vigorous defence of our own interests with a deep commitment to the idea and to the ideals of the community."

She criticised the last Labour government for failing to rectify the then "grossly unfair" budget contribution--and contrasted it with the government's negotiated budget settlement which would "give us and our partners time to tackle the underlying issues."

She said the problem of New Zealand's lamb trade with the EEC had been solved so as to protect the interests of New Zealand farmers "while giving our own farmers and our own housewives an excellent deal."

Looking ahead to the establishment of a common fisheries policy Mrs Thatcher noted that the government has recently made "important progress towards agreement."

As for other difficulties in the EEC she remained confident "that they too, will yield to the firm yet fair approach which has already proved so much more effective than the previous government's five years of procrastination."

Moving to world affairs as a whole, Mrs Thatcher said the world faced "darkening horizons."

"The war between Iran and Iraq is the latest symptom of a deeper malady," she told delegates. Europe and North America were "centers of stability in an increasingly anxious world.

"The Community and the alliance are the guarantee to other countries that freedom of choice is still possible," said Mrs Thatcher. "They stand for order and the rule of law in an age when disorder and lawlessness are ever more widespread. The British Government intends to stand by both these greater institutions. We will not betray them."

The prime minister said that restoring Britain's place in the world and the West's confidence in its own destiny were two aspects of the same process.

Referring to the speech by party chairman Lord Thorneycroft earlier in the week, Mrs Thatcher recalled his words that leaders of great nations should look into the hearts and minds of the people they sought to govern.

"I would add that those who seek to govern must in turn be willing to allow their hearts and minds to lie open to the people," she said.

Mrs Thatcher ended her speech with a rousing call to Tories to defend their values and traditions.

"This party, which I am privileged to serve, and this government which I am so proud to lead, are engaged in the massive task of restoring confidence and stability to our people. I have always known that task was vital. Since last week it has become more vital than ever.

"We close our conference in the aftermath of that sinister utopia unveiled at Blackpool. Let Labour's Orwellian nightmare of the left be the spur for us to dedicate with a new urgency our every ounce of energy and moral strength to rebuild the fortunes of this free nation. If we were to fail that freedom could be imperilled. Let us resist the blandishment of the faint hearts, let us ignore the howls and threats of the extremists, let us stand together and do our duty and we shall not fail."

Mrs Thatcher's speech was greeted by a five-and-a-half minute standing ovation from the conference and a rendering of "For She's a Jolly Good Fellow" and "Land of Hope and Glory."

LABOR PARTY'S LEAD OVER CONSERVATIVES DROPS TO THREE PERCENT

[Text] Labour's lead over the Conservatives has fallen to three per cent, compared with 9 1/2 per cent three weeks ago, according to a Gallup poll conducted for THE DAILY TELEGRAPH between Oct. 1 and 6. Most of the interviewing took place just after last week's Labour Party conference.

Party support shown was:

	Today	Sept.	Aug.	July
Con.	40	35 1/2	38 1/2	40
Lab.	43	45	44	43 1/2
Lib.	13 1/2	16 1/2	14 1/2	14
Other	3 1/2	3	3	2 1/2

Labour is now back to where it was before the announcement of unemployment topping the two million mark. The survey was based on a nationally representative quota sample of 1,025 electors in more than 100 districts.

PRESIDENT MAKES STATEMENT ON YUGOSLAV VISIT

NC102012 Nicosia Public Information Office in English 10 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] My visit to Yugoslavia has been successful in all respects. The basic aim, of course, was to strengthen the already existing friendly relations and cooperation between the two countries.

As is well known, there is full cooperation between the two countries in the political field through the policy of non-alignment which Yugoslavia and Cyprus have been following with consistency. We have declared our dedication to the principles of non-alignment and our determination to continue our efforts so as to contribute in the best possible and most positive manner to the consolidation of world peace and cooperation. Of course, the non-aligned world does not have the power that other countries have, but it has a tremendous moral force which can play a very important role in world affairs. Already it has played an important role in many cases.

During my visit to Yugoslavia, I had the opportunity to extend warm thanks to the president and leadership of Yugoslavia for their firm support to the Cyprus people's struggle for freedom. The Yugoslav leadership adopts fully the Cyprus Government's policy on the Cyprus problem, just as it supports the policy followed by Cyprus in general. Everywhere we met with friendship and understanding and we agreed that there should be concrete measures for the further development of our cooperation in the various fields, such as the economic, the commercial and the cultural fields. In November a mixed committee will be set up in Cyprus to study specific measures for the development of trade and the promotion of other related matters where there is room for further development of relations between the two countries.

It is significant that the need was ascertained for a special dialogue with OPEC countries regarding the oil question, given that most of the OPEC countries are non-aligned and that the countries mainly affected by the present energy crisis are non-aligned. In this respect we expressed the desire to participate actively in such a negotiation as member of the non-aligned group that will carry out negotiations, which was gladly accepted by the Yugoslav side.

The Yugoslav Government will do everything possible to help find a solution to the Cyprus problem within the framework of the UN secretary-general's initiatives. Regarding the Cyprus problem Yugoslavia supports the implementation of UN resolutions and the principles of non-alignment, as well as the dialogue now being conducted on the basis of the two high-level agreements, and it will do what it can to help towards progress.

Generally, my visit to Yugoslavia has been very useful, the hospitality excellent, the feelings towards Cyprus and its people very warm. I can say that the ties and friendship between Yugoslaiva and Cyprus, established by their two great leaders, President Makarios and President Tito, will be continued. As very rightly said by the president of the Presidency of Yugoslavia, the two late leaders have bequeathed a great deal to continue along the path charted by them until we bring to a conclusion our mission which is to solve specific problems and also to create conditions for a better order in the world both economically and politically.

I firmly believe that such visits are very useful and nothing can substitute top level contacts. I think that our relations with Yugoslavia have been strengthened even more by my visit and will be strengthened even more in future as a result of it. Frankly I can say there is internationally a high regard for Cyprus and deep appreciation of the way we have been handling the various problems.

Radio Reports on Talks

[Text] The most basic part of the Greek-Bulgarian summit talks which started in Sofia yesterday ended at noon today with a meeting of the two delegations in their full composition. It is a joint conclusion that the Greek-Bulgarian summit talks have had full success in all sectors. We have a relevant reportage by the ERT, Greek Radio and Television, correspondent in Sofia, Aris Xipolitidhis: [Begin recording by Xipolitidhis]

The most basic portion of the Greek-Bulgarian summit talks which started in Sofia yesterday ended in today's meeting of the two delegations in their full composition. It is the joint conclusion of both the Bulgarian and the Greek sides that the talks have been successful in all sectors.

Appropriate personalities on the Greek side also stressed that President of the Republic Konstandinos Karamanlis is exceptionally satisfied with the welcome accorded to him here not only by the political leaders of Bulgaria but also by the people, and that this proves that his as well as Zhivkov's efforts toward expansion of relations between Greece and Bulgaria are also the desire of the people at the base.

Questions discussed during today's meeting between Karamanlis and Zhivkov, which took place in the presence of foreign ministers Mitsotakis and Mladenov and other officials from both sides, covered international and bipartite issues. According to existing reports, both sides agreed that the climate of peace and security which exists in the Balkans, as a contribution to peace, must be protected at all costs. Under this spirit it was resolved to expand the effort for cooperation between Balkan states so that a third inter-Balkan meeting may take place in the near future, after the preceding two meetings in Athens and Constantinople.

In respect to bipartite issues, it was reported that during these talks there was a lengthy discussion of the question of distribution of Nestos River waters and that an agreement was reached on the process to be followed.

A Bulgarian technical delegation will visit Greece in order to be informed on Greek plans and requirements so that the foreign ministers of the two countries may probably meet in Athens within the next three months to seek the final solutions to the problem on the basis of the final findings of the technical experts.

The talks, in any case, have furnished both delegations with the opportunity of reaffirming their desire for a final solution to the problem which would meet the requirements of both countries. The only thing remaining now to complete the Sofia talks is a meeting of the Greek and Bulgarian foreign ministers, scheduled for tomorrow afternoon, which will also be attended by Deputy Chairman of the Bulgarian Government Lukanov who is responsible for economic affairs. This meeting will finalize the decisions adopted during all phases of the talks and will issue the joint communique. In the afternoon, Konstandinos Karamanlis, accompanied by Zhivkov, will visit the latter's native village.

[Text] An Athens News Agency Correspondent in the Bulgarian capital reports that, as has been learned from an authoritative source, Greece and Albania will soon begin talks on further improvement of their relations in the economic, commercial and cultural fields. The date for the commencement of the talks will be fixed after consultations to be held between the Greek Foreign Ministry and Albanian Embassy in Athens.

According to the same dispatch, other sources have noted the excellent level of Greek-Albanian relations. At the same time it is reported that Tirana is interested in cooperating with various other countries in Europe.

BRITISH TRADE SECRETARY ARRIVES IN ATHENS FOR TALKS

AT121923 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 12 Oct 80

[Text] British Secretary of State for Trade Nott arrived in Athens this evening at 1930 on a 2-day official visit at the invitation of the minister of coordination. The purpose of the visit is to achieve broader cooperation between the two countries in the economic field.

Tomorrow Nott will meet with the deputy minister for coordination, the minister of trade, the minister of industry and the minister of communications. On Tuesday the British secretary will be received by Prime Minister Rallis.

Economic Relations Discussed

AT131925 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Text] British Secretary of State for Trade John Nott visited acting Coordination Minister Paliokrasas at noon today. He was accompanied by the British ambassador to Athens. The ministers of industry and communications, Manos and Panayiotopoulos, attended the meeting which discussed pending issues of Greek-British economic relations, both on a bipartite and the EEC level. As stated by Paliokrasas, a particular discussion was held on the supply of two thermoelectric power stations for the public electricity corporation, and the supply of fuel to be used by them, on which Great Britain has already expressed an interest.

MINISTER OF COORDINATION RESIGNS FOR HEALTH REASONS

[Excerpt] Today Minister of Coordination Ioannis Boutos sent a letter to Prime Minister Rallis in which he announced his resignation for reasons of health. The text of Boutos's letter is as follows:

Dear Prime Minister, as is well known to you, during my trip to the United States I underwent a general medical examination. The conclusion of the examination was that a discontinuation of my activities is necessary and that it is impossible for me to continue exercising my duties as minister of coordination. For this reason, I am compelled to submit to you my resignation which I request you to accept. I also ask that you allow me to express to you my gratutude that during a critical stage you entrusted me with the handling of the country's economic affairs and always surrounded me with your complete trust. It is obvious that my services will always be at your and the party's disposal.

AT101548 Athens APOGEVMATINI in Greek 10 Oct 80 p 16

[Text] An evening newspaper (MESIMVRINI) yesterday reported that the government had completed the study of the U.S. proposals (the "new plan) which U.S. Ambassador in Athens McCloskey had submitted to the Greek side regarding U.S. bases in Greece. In this connection, the government spokesman has said that everything that has been reported in this regard is inaccurate.

TURKMEN SAYS GOVERNMENT WILL NOT MEDIATE BETWEEN IRAN, IRAQ

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who attended the 35th session of the UN General Assembly in New York, arrived in Turkey by air a while ago. Replying to reporters' questions upon his return, Turkmen said that at this stage it was out of the question for Turkey to mediate between Iran and Iraq.

In reply to questions in connection with the visa requirements being imposed on Turkish citizens by various European countries, Turkmen said: We have, on various occasions, expressed our reaction to these decisions that have caused us some grief. Contacts are continuing to cancel the decisions to impose unjustified visa requirements.

Arms Transshipments Not Allowed

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that Turkey is continuing its fully impartial attitude concerning the war between Iran and Iraq and that it will not allow the shipment of arms or materiel through Turkish territory to either of the sides. Turkmen added that Turkey will not mediate to end the war between Iran and Iraq and that no such request has been made by either of the sides.

Turkmen, who was in New York to attend the UN General Assembly session, returned to Ankara. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Turkmen said that in New York he made beneficial contacts with the foreign ministers of numerous countries. He added that the Cyprus question was discussed at the meeting he held with Secretary General Waldheim.

At Ankara's Esenboga Airport, a reporter reminded Turkmen that the number of European countries that were imposing a visa requirement on Turkish citizens were increasing. On the issue Turkmen said that the visa requirements were contrary to the EEC associations agreement and the Council of Europe agreement. He noted that this new regulation should end as soon as possible, and that steps in that direction are continuing.

TURKISH AIRLINES PLANE HIJACKED BETWEEN ISTANBUL, ANKARA

Negotiations on Hijackers' Demands

[Text] A Turkish Airlines passenger plane, a Boeing 727, was hijacked during its Munich-Istanbul-Ankara flight this evening. Its flight number is TK 890. It is now at Diyarbakir airport.

Our correspondents have learned that the airliner arrived in Istanbul from Munich at 1705 [local]. After taking the transit passengers from Istanbul, it left for Ankara at 1810. While it was over Goynuk, at around 1830, unidentified hijackers did not allow it to land in Ankara and ordered the captain to fly to Diyarbakir airport. Our correspondent reported a short while ago that the airliner is still in Diyarbakir. There are negotiations between the hijackers, who want their conditions accepted, and the crew.

It has been learned that the hijackers want to take the plane to a foreign country and that they landed in Diyarbakir for fuel. There are 148 persons in the plane, of which 135 are Turks and 6 are Iranian. There are seven crew members.

Hijackers Release 53 Passengers

[Excerpt] On arrival at Diyarbakir airport, the hijackers talked with the crew members and told them their demands. The hijackers talked with Diyarbakir Governor Erdogan Sahinoglu at 2030. It has been learned that the hijackers told the governor that they wanted to take on fuel at Diyarbakir airport and then to go to Jiddah, Saudi Arabia. They said that if these demands were met they would leave all the passengers at Diyarbakir airport. It is reported that the hijackers speak fluent Turkish. However, no conclusion has been reached about their nationalities.

Our correspondents report that the airport is completely dark, that the hijackers are talking to the governor from a distance and that therefore they cannot be seen very well. However, it is being guessed that they are the six Iranians who boarded the plane in Istanbul.

We have just received the news that the hijackers released 53 of the passengers. Forty of them are women, six are children and seven are sick or old people. The rest are still in the plane. Officials have said that it has been determined that the six armed terrorists who hijacked the plane are Iranian medical students.

The hijackers insist on taking fuel and going to Jiddah or Tehran. They stress that the other passengers will also be released if their demands are met. It is reported, however, that no positive reply has been given to their demands.

Meanwhile, the head of state, Gen Kenan Evren, who is in Diyarbakir to observe the Gen Fazil Bilge-80 military exercises, went to Diyarbakir airport accompanied by National Security Council members at 2200 and talked with the released passengers.

Rescue Operation Ends Hijacking

[Excerpts] The crew and passengers of the Turkish Airlines Boeing-727 hijacked to Diyarbakir by five armed hijackers during its Munich-Istanbul-Ankara flight were rescued following a successful operation conducted at 0515 this morning. No one was killed during the operation. However, two hijackers and some passengers were reported to be wounded. Officials reported that the hijackers, who pretended to be Iranians, were Turkish citizens and that they have previously been involved in various anarchic incidents.

Extensive security measures were taken in the airport and its vicinity last night and a decision was made to launch an operation. The operation, which began at 0515, lasted 1 minute. According to information received, the operation was conducted as follows: The back door of the plane was cut with a cutting torch at 0300. A special team then began entering the plane through this back door and shots were then heard. Following the shooting, which lasted 1 minute, passengers began coming out of the front and back doors. The hijackers were captured and detained at the airport building.

The hijackers' names are: Mehmet Aglak, Yilmaz Yalciner, Hasan Guneser, Mahdi Yatsikale and Coskun Aral.

Turkish radio and television correspondents reported that the passengers are still waiting at Diyarbakir airport and that they will be sent to Ankara by plane.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES RELEASE OF MARTIAL LAW PRISONERS

Demirel, Ecevit Release Scheduled

TA110812 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0800 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Text] Those who were under the protection of the armed forces since 12 September 1980 and on whom no investigation has been opened will be released today. Meanwhile, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and JP leader Suleyman Demirel who are in Gelibolu will return to Ankara.

GOVERNMENT ARRESTS DEPUTIES, PARTY OFFICIALS

Erbakan, Turkes Charged

NC111322 Paris AFP in English 1301 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Ankara, 11 Oct (AFP)--Leaders of Turkey's two main extremist parties were formally charged and arrested here today after already having been detained without charge since the Sep 12 military coup.

Necmettin Erbakan, 54, head of the National Salvation Party (NSP) which advocated an Islamic state, was charged in a hearing before a military court with violating legislation against theocracy.

The same court charged Alpaslan Turkes, 63, head of the allegedly neo-Nazi Nationalist Action Party (NAP), with separatism.

Turkes Formally Arrested

TA111908 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1900 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Text] NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes and certain administrators of this party have been arrested by the Ankara Martial Law Command Military Tribunal. According to information received by a Turkish Radio and TV Administration [TRT] correspondent, the information received during the preparatory investigation about NAP leaders by the Ankara Military prosecutor was assessed and, as a result of this, the Martial Law Command Military Tribunal decided to arrest Turkes and the other party administrators.

Other NAP Officials Arrested

[Text] NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes, former NAP legislators and some administrators of this party have been arrested by the Ankara Martial Law Military Tribunal. According to information received by a TRT correspondent, the information received during the investigation conducted by the Ankara martial law military prosecutor about the NAP administrators was assessed. Following the assessment, strong indications were obtained that the suspects armed the people against each other and drove them to mass massacres. Consequently, the Ankara Military Court decided to arrest the suspects.

The names of the other persons arrested along with Turkes are as follows: Agah Oktay Guner, Sadi Somuncuoglu, Necati Gultekin, Tahsin Unal, Nevzat Koroglu, Avni Carsancakli, Mehmet Dogan, Ali Fuat Eyuboglu, Ihsan Kabadayi, Turan Kocal, Mehmet Irmak, Osman Albayrak, Faruk Demirtola, Cengiz Gokcek, Sait Bilgic, Omer Cakiroglu, Tahir Sanmaz, Mehmet Yusuf Ozbas, Ali Gurbuz, Lutfu Ulkumen, Sait Ahmet Arvaz, Ahmet Er, Servet Fora, Sevim Debre, Fikri Turkmen, Suleyman Surmen, Ahmet Karaca and Erdem Senocak.

Following the investigation of the NAP administrators, arrest warrants were also issued in absentia for about 36 other persons.

Erbakan Trial Announced.

TA121030 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 12 Oct 80

[Text] The trial of MSP leader Necmettin Erbakan will be held at the 1st military tribunal of the Ankara Martial Law Command. He will be tried without detention. Erbakan and his nine colleagues are being tried for violating Article No 163 of the Turkish penal code. Erbakan, Sevket Kazan, Oguzhan Asiltuk, Sener Battal, Ali Gumeri, Tahir Buyukkorukcu, Fehim Adak, Temel Karamollaoglu, Ahmet Remzi Hatip and Huseyin Erdal are being charged with establishing and leading an organization in order to base the basic order of the state on religious principles in violation of the principle of secularism, with violating the law on rallies and marches, with possession of explosives and weapons, and with destroying incriminatory evidence.

Our correspondent has learned from the press and public relations department of the Ankara Martial Law Command that during the trial the court decided to arrest Huseyin Erdal, Temel Karamollaoglu and Tahir Buyukkorukcu. An arrest warrant was issued in absentia for Yasar Cocmen.

Necmettin Erbakan, Sevket Kazan, Oguzhan Asiltuk, Sener Battal, Ali Gumeri, Fehim Adak and Ahmet Remzi Hatip will be tried without detention.

Meanwhile, Ahmet Yildiz [former senator from the National Unity Group] and Erol Saracoglu [former RPP deputy] who are being tried at the 1st military tribunal of the Ankara Martial Law Command for their activities at the People's Houses clubs have been arrested for violating the law on organizations. An arrest warrant has been issued in absentia for Ferhat Aslantas, one of the suspects.

[Text] The security forces apprehended 393 persons in operations throughout the country during the past week. Of the 393, 28 are murder suspects, 24 are suspected of armed robberies and 8 are escaped convicts. An announcement issued by the Press and Public Relations Department of the Interior Ministry also says that during the operations the security forces found 24 rifles, 287 pistols, 32 shotguns, 245 sticks of dynamite, 13 dynamite caps, 71 meters of dynamite fuse, 290 TNT blocks, 6 time bombs, 5 bombs, 2 hand radios, 32 knives and 9,563 cartridges of various caliber. The security forces also uncovered two workshops manufacturing weapons.

The security forces also confiscated smuggled goods worth about 10 million Turkish liras in 68 different cases of smuggling. The security forces also confiscated 40 kilograms of hashish and 970 grams of heroin.

TWO MURDERERS OF FORMER DISK LEADER TURKLER APPREHENDED

TA111108 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 11 Oct 80

[Text] The security forces apprehended two persons suspected of killing Kemal Turkler, the leader of Maden-Is [Turkish mine, metal, metal works and machine industry workers union] affiliated with DISK [confederation of revolutionary worker unions]. In an announcement made today, Istanbul Security Director Sukru Balci said that 31 persons charged with wounding and murdering people for ideological reasons, perpetrating robberies, setting cars on fire, writing slogans on walls, etc. have been caught with their weapons. These 31 persons belong to armed anarchistic groups and include Abdullah Samet Karakus and Aydin Eryilmaz, two of the five persons who killed Turkler, Maden-Is leader and former DISK leader, in Merter on 22 July 1980.

Balci added that the remaining three persons, Ismet Kocak, Celal Adan and Yunus Unal, were still being sought.

The Istanbul security director stated that the 31 suspects had killed 12 persons and were involved in various robberies, wounding incidents, car burnings etc. He added that the 31 suspects had confessed their crimes during their interrogations and that eyewitnesses had identified them.

Balci said that two Sten guns, 19 pistols, 2,000 rounds of ammunition, masks and a cap worn by one of the murderers during Turkler's murder were also found.

ANKARA REPORTS EXPLOSIONS IN LONDON, U.S. CITIES

London Blast Reported

[TExt] A bomb that exploded last night in front of the Turkish tourism bureau in London caused material damage. When a bomb placed at the entrance of the bureau near Oxford Street in London exploded at 2130 Turkish time, the windows of the bureau were shattered. Persons calling the London offices of various news agencies reported that the illegal secret Armenian army claimed responsibility for the incident. According to the Turkish Radio and Television London correspondent, the police took extensive security measures in the vicinity after the incident. The police cordoned off the streets, asked for identity cards and searched vehicles. British police officials reported that the bomb was small and the work of an amateur.

Another bomb exploded in front of the Swiss tourism center building 1/2 hour after the explosion in front of the Turkish tourism bureau. No one was injured as the bureau was closed but the windows of the building were shattered. It was reported that the same secret Armenian organization claimed responsibility for this explosion. An explosion occurred in front of the Turkish Airlines office in London last December and the illegal organization secret Armenian army also claimed responsibility for that incident.

SCHMIDT TO LEAD CABINET MEETING ON RELATIONS WITH GDR

[Text] Bonn, 14 Oct (DPA)--According to government circles in Bonn today, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will interrupt his short holiday tomorrow to chair the cabinet discussion on the latest tensions in relations between the two German states. Observers in Bonn regard this action by the chancellor, who had originally intended to leave the chairmanship of Wednesday's cabinet meeting to Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, as a measure of the government's concern at the clear deterioration in relations with the GDR.

The Federal Government sees Erich Honecker's speech in Gera yesterday as confirmation of the assumption expressed the day before that the GDR leadership, under the influence of the continuing unstable situation in Poland and fearing its effects on the internal situation in the GDR, has obviously decided to adopt a harder line toward the Federal Republic. The drastic increase in the minimum currency exchange requirement for Western visitors to the GDR was seen as the first sign of this.

The Federal Cabinet will also analyze in detail and draw conclusions tomorrow about the tense state of inter-German relations against the background of Honecker's latest demands for recognition of a separate GDR state citizenship and an exchange of ambassadors between Bonn and East Berlin in place of the permanent missions. Also to be considered are the effects of the worsening situation on planned negotiations with East Berlin, including the talks planned for next spring on the interest-free overdraft credits granted to the GDR in inter-German trade--the so-called "swing". However, the cabinet is not expected to agree on any concrete countermeasures against East Berlin's recent policy of demarcation.

HUONKER, BOELLING REJECT HONECKER DEMANDS

[Text] Bonn, 14 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government today rejected Erich Honecker's demand for the recognition of a separate GDR citizenship and the conversion of the permanent missions of both German states. Minister of State Gunter Huonker, of the federal chancellor's office, and Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling today cautioned against needlessly dramatizing the tensions between both German states. They expressed the Federal Government's view that the current hardening did not mean a dead end in inter-German relations.

As reported by West German Radio (WDR), Huonker said in a WDR broadcast that it is his impression that for the moment inter-German relations and their development for the GDR, have to take second place to other matters of importance to the GDR. This is connected with events in Poland. A new phase has clearly opened in which the GDR is concerned with demarcation. That is why for the time being progress in inter-German relations was unlikely.

Boelling said that the demands Honecker addressed to Bonn in his Gera speech yesterday could not be accepted. Honecker knew that, Boelling said in an NDR (North German Radio) interview. In making these demands, Honecker assumed "that for the forseeable future at least no progress worth mentioning appears possible in the efforts to normalize relations." But Boelling refused to speak of a dead end in the policy of developing inter-German relations. "However, the horizon for further progress in the inter-German affairs is very overcast," he added.

Boelling said that even after the very negative impact of Honecker's speech, one would have to go on talking. He deprecated panicky reactions against the GDR. A cool head is needed. Honecker's speech is a bad omen for the future; but in no case should one resign oneself.

Huonker, too, came out against hurried reactions to East Berlin's move. Rash steps might well not move things forward while harming the citizens in both German states.

Boelling made a sharp rejoinder to Honecker's accusation against Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt that Schmidt was the architect and instigator [einpeitscher] of the NATO decision on the deployment of medium-range missiles in Europe. Honecker is running the risk, Boelling said, of being seen in the Federal Republic as a man unable, through practical deeds, to support his own protestations about continuing inter-German normalization and safeguarding the positive results of detente.

OFFICIALS PROTEST GDR CURRENCY CONVERSION INCREASE

[Text] East Berlin, 10 Oct (DPA)--The head of the permanent mission of the Federal Republic in East Berlin, State Secretary Gaus, today lodged a protest at the GDR Foreign Ministry against the drastic increase in the compulsory currency conversion for visits to the GDR.

After a talk lasting just under 30 minutes with departmental head Karl Seidel, Gaus told journalists that he had "protested in the sharpest terms" against the measure on instructions from the Federal Government. Gaus described this as the biggest and gravest setback in inter-German relations for years. He had made it abundantly clear to Seidel that questions affecting travel arrangements were for the Federal Government part of the "highly important sensitive core" of these relations. Gaus added that Seidel had rejected the demarche and called it interference in the GDR's internal affairs. Seidel had explained that the measure had been taken because of inflation in the Federal Republic. He then in turn had rejected this explanation.

Gaus said that on instruction of the chancellor and the foreign minister he had reminded Seidel of statements by GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker, who barely 6 weeks ago at the Leipzig Fair had given an assurance that the GDR was "very interested" in a continued normalization of the relations between the two German states. The present measures were in blatant contrast to Honecker's statement. Gaus described the GDR's action as a "particularly bad relapse and step backwards."

Gaus said that he had told Seidel that this would certainly not be the last talk about the matter. Asked whether the GDR was showing any readiness to negotiate Gaus replied that one could not say so. Nor could it be said, however, that it rejected negotiations out of hand. The only possibility in his view was to continue to negotiate and talk to one another in the same way as in 1974 when the GDR at the Federal Government's insistence canceled part of a earlier increase in the conversion rates.

Gaus said that he had been aware that something was about to happen in connection with GDR travel arrangements before yesterday's publication of the new order by ADN. However, he had had no indication of what such steps might be. The measures now taken had come as a complete surprise. Gaus feared that the number of travellers now might drop. The measure was in part very anti-social and especially hard on the elderly who wanted to visit relatives and friends and would find it difficult to pay the new conversion amounts.

Shortly after the end of the talk between Gaus and Seidel the official in charge of visiting arrangements of the Berlin Senat, Gerhard Kunze, called at the GDR Foreign Ministry.

BERLIN SENAT DISCUSSES GDR EXCHANGE POLICY

LD141628 Hamburg DPA in German 1458 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Text] Berlin, 14 Oct (DPA)--The Berlin Senat today discussed the situation following the increase of the minimum money exchange requirement by the GDR. Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe said efforts are being made in talks at various levels to have this drastic increase revoked.

According to Senat spokesman Hermann Meyn, Stobbe stressed that the speech by SED leader Erich Honecker in Gera also showed that the GDR, apparently fearing developments like those in Poland, was demonstrating "touchiness towards its citizens and showing Moscow that it is remaining true to its policy line." Stobbe reiterated his accusation that the GDR's increase of the minimum money exchange requirement struck at a "key of detente."

In the view of Heinrich Lummer, the CDU group chairman in Berlin's Chamber of Deputies, East Berlin is currently trying "by word and deed" to destroy the bases of the policy of detente. Honecker's recent remarks are aimed at a revision of the Basic Treaty between the two German states. Lummer stated in the CDU press service that the Soviet Union and GDR are in the process of putting in question every prerequisite for detente. These efforts can only signify a departure from the policy of detente which is apparently not a whim of Eastern bloc policy but an indication of its long-term intentions.

OFFICIALS, PRESS REACT TO NEW GDR DEMANDS

Interview With Franke

DW141218 Hamburg Nordeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0647 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Reporter Kramer interview with Federal Inner-German Relations Minister Egon Franke on the change in mandatory currency exchange requirements for visitors to the GDR--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] How do you assess the GDR's measures?

[Answer] How should I assess them? I think it is monstrous to aggravate or even cut off in this way the ability of people in the two parts of Germany to get together. But this seems to be what the orginators have in mind. We have had this sort of thing before, and the Federal Government endeavored at the time to have that measure retracted. We did not fully succeed but we did succeed to a considerable extent. Viewed from this angle this measure is part of the negotiating situation which will be confronting us with difficult problems in the near future.

[Question] What do you mean specifically? Is there the intention to negotiate on the drastic increase in the mandatory currency exchange requirement? Are talks to be held on this matter?

[Answer] There is no other way. Negotiations, talks alone can change things. Otherwise we would be in a very bad situation, because if you cease to talk to one another the consequences are developments which you can no longer predict and which you are then faced with, developments which then lead to drastic measures on the other side with you having no chance to exert influence on them. I believe that if any situation has ever made it clear how necessary it is to talk, this one has.

[Question] Will the Federal Government now suggest negotiations on this issue or is it intended to include this matter in other negotiation?

[Answer] At the moment this subject cannot be negotiated on but must be made part of a package. All talks conducted between us and the GDR must include this turn of events, and it will be necessary to deal with this topic again in a suitable manner. Let me recall that we had something similar in 1974, which I mentioned earlier, and so I see a similar situation emerging.

[Question] The CDU recommends economic sanctions against the GDR. The German policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag group, Plaf von Wrangel, demands a suspension of the forthcoming new negotiations on the credit granted when [GDR-FGR trade] accounts are overdrawn and on which no interest is charged, the so-called swing, as well as an immediate halt to all payments to the GDR which have not been contractually agreed on. Do you consider these measures appropriate?

[Answer] I think all strong words are totally out of place. This does not mean that talking in no uncertain terms should be avoided, but advancing proposals which experts have always considered unsuited is not a suitable mechanism. And I must admit indeed that the proposal thus advanced indicates the complete helplessness of the man who advanced it, and I will not comment on it any further.

[Answer] Concrete countermeasures? I have said that one must see the whole in context. This issue belongs to the forthcoming swing negotiations. This situation can naturally be compared with the situation we had some years ago. That fact must very much be considered in negotiations on the data in question.

[Question] The swing will be negotiated next year, or will it be earlier?

[Answer] Formal matters yes, but many meetings are in the offing before then, meetings where preparatory talks will be held in order to indicate the trend of developments. Well, the period up to the negotiations will not be filled with inactivity. This is how the statement of the Federal Government must be understood, in which said that it will not accept what has happened and that it will seek proper ways to see to it that the people involved in both parts of Germany do not suffer from this.

[Question] Does this mean that the increased mandatory exchange amount will be introduced in the preparations for negotiations on the swing?

[Answer] Naturally it belongs to that subject.

[Question] Do you have the impression that East Berlin is saying farewell to detente policy, steering toward some new cold war?

[Answer] Well, what does saying farewell to detente policy mean? It can mean a great deal. We have made it clear that we will do everything to mitigate any tension that might come about. We will adhere to this. Whether all involved will cooperate in the same spirit is a matter that can be assessed only from case to case. These new measures have complicated and not facilitated efforts aimed at achieving a uniform detente. These measures have complicated the efforts aimed at establishing reasonable good-neighborly cooperation--as it is so beautifully called--greatly.

CDU/CSU Demands

[Text] Bonn, 14 Oct (DPA)--The CDU/CSU has called upon the Federal Government to set up an interministry working group, chaired by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, to deal with the consequences resulting from the new East Berlin course toward the Federal Republic. In so doing the Federal Government must examine all political and economic possibilities for countering East Berlin's "grave violations of the spirit of the inter-German treaties."

The Germany policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, Manfred Abelein, today assessed SED chief Erich Honecker's latest speech as a "turn in GDR policy." At the same time he expressed the readiness of the CDU/CSU, in view of the importance of inter-German relations, to support the chancellor if he takes certain measures.

The foreign policy expert of the CDU/CSU, Alois Mertes, wrote in the Union press service that government and opposition now shared a common interest against the "legal aggression" of the GDR against inter-German peace. "We must not again become prisoners of the words 'cold war' and 'detente.' Firmness is not cold war, and compliance is not detente."

The opposition would now measure the government against the binding promises which it had given during the debate on the Basic Treaty with regard to German state citizenship and especially with regard to the legal nature of the permanent missions. Demands by the Young Democrats and Young Socialists regarding state citizenship showed that the danger of a new internal political confrontation in the Ostpolitik have not been removed. The CDU/CSU wants no repetition of this confrontation, Mertes said. It is up to the SPD/FDP coalition not to shake the foundations of the common interest "again, as in the election campaign."

On Honecker's speech and the increase in the minimum currency exchange requirement Abelein said that East Berlin obviously wanted to "strangulate the inter-German detente policy and replace it with total demarcation." The easing of human conditions, above all travel, was the actual underlying basis of detente policy. Agelein rejected Honecker's demands for recognition of GDR state citizenship, the turning of the permanent missions into embassies and the signing of a treaty on the course of the border on the Elbe as being incompatible with the Basic Law and the interests of the German people.

CSU Deputy Edoard Lintner said that the Eastern and Germany policy of the SPD/FDP coalition had fundamentally failed. In a statement published by the CSU in Bonn he said that the East Berlin rulers must be made to feel immediate countermeasures. It is completely inadequate for the Federal Government merely to contemplate reactions during next year's negotiations on methods of interzonal trade.

Brandt Comment

LD1'1352 Hamburg DPA in German 1309 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Text] Baden-Baden, 13 Oct (DPA)--SPD chairman and "architect of the Ostpolitik" Willy Brandt thinks it would be overhasty to speak of the end of the policy of detente in view of the present attitude of the GDR. In a Southwest Radio Baden-Baden interview today, Brandt stressed that relations between the two German states are embedded in the framework of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. He said that detente is a process full of contradictions. Contradictary, too, are the latest statements by GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker who, on the one hand, welcomed detente in Europe and approved closer economic cooperation between the German states and, on the other, stood for trends towards demarcation. This is indeed "a language that does not make for much optimism."

Allied Headquarters Statement

[Text] Berlin (DPA)--The Western Allies protective powers in Berlin commented on Friday evening on the announced minimum exchange increase by the GDR. The short statement by the British military government, chairing the Allied Headquarters, reads: "The Allies have noted the GDR's decree which provides for an increase in the minimum amount to be exchanged by visits to the GDR and the Eastern sector of Berlin coming into force on 13 October. The allies condemn any measure likly to lead to the reduced application of the regulations of the agreement on facilitating and improving tourism and visits for persons permanently residing in the Western sectors of Berlin."

Protest to Council of Europe

[Text] Bonn, 14 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government is going to raise the matter of the massive increase in the currency exchange requirement for Western visitors to the GDR at the Council of Europe. It was officially announced today that Hildegard Hamm-Brucher, minister of state for foreign affairs, will bring up the measures and the severe obstacles to tourist and visitor traffic they present at an exchange of views of the foreign ministers of the 21-member states in Strasbourg on Wednesday and Thursday.

The foreign ministers also intend to discuss the CSCE followup meeting which begins in Madrid on 11 November. Mrs Hamm-Brucher will represent Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in the committee meeting.

13 October Press Review

DW130821 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Press review on the new compulsory current conversion rate for East Berlin]

[Text] The Konstanz SUEDKURIER writes: Now the chancellor has stated: We will not accept this. The opposition even is demanding a halt to the considerable payments which go to the East Berlin coffers from West German tax funds thanks to the aforementioned humanitarian improvements. But this immediately raises the decisive question as to what the Federal Government can afford in the way of countermeasures lest it risk new chicanery by the Eastern side. Naturally it would be possible to apply the lever at the generous flow of money from the federal coffers. This could be done in proper doses. Yet this would entail risks for West Berlin It is also necessary to keep in mind that forces exist in the government camp which due to conviction take everything into consideration except any unfriendliness toward the rulers in the GDR.

The Ulm SUEDWESTPRESSE argues as follows: Seven years ago it took nearly a year until the GDR retracted the increase in the compulsory conversion rate. This period is not intended to serve as a model but to draw attention to the realities. What is a reality is the CSCE followup conference in Madrid where the GDR's international prestige might be a point of debate over the monetary affair; another is the new stipulation on the swing, meaning of the credit framework in inter-German trade, next spring. There is yet more that one could imagine; it deserves to be given some thought.

Essen's WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG makes the following comment: And yet, it is necessary to keep a cool head. There are ways to cut the foreign exchange influx to the GDR, of course. This will, and should, be done wherever the Federal Government so far has done more than was necessary to display good will. An example of this is the so-called swing in inter-German trade, which is tantamount to a no-interest credit to the GDR. But this is exactly where the difficulties begin. The GDR's course of action obviously has not been dictated by greed; it is rather intended to curtail the influx of visitors. Despite greatly increased prices the GDR must reckon with lower proceeds. Hence, a shortage of money will not change its mind. It will preferably impose more sacrifices on its people. We must watch out lest we hit the people with our countermeasures, WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGELMINE ZEITUNG declares.

DW141041 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Press review on FRG-GDR relations]

[Text] NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG writes: Erich Honecker has let the cat out of the bag. Addressing party comradades in Gera yesterday, the SED chief established with baffling frankness an interconnection between the explosive development of affairs in Poland and the worsening of relations with the Federal Republic. Any further investigation into motives is superfluous after this aggressive speech. It has now been officially confirmed, as it were, that the key to the GDR's new policy of delimitation is located in Poland. Attacks as massive and rude as those launched by Honecker yesterday come only from a politician who is scared stiff--scared of the spread of liberalization tendencies, of the effects of the free word in the exchange of ideas between FRG and GDR citizens.

The paper concludes by saying: By his speech Erich Honecker regrettably confirmed what the Federal Government had predicted yesterday: A return to normal conditions in inter-German relations is impossible for the time being because this is at odds with the interests of Moscow and East Berlin at this time.

Essen's NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG explains this point: It may be that the SED chief has now shifted to a hard course against the West out of fear of the Polish bacillus and for the sake of proving his loyalty to MOscow. It will primarily be the GDR which will suffer damage, because it is much more dependent on cooperation with the Federal Republic than vice versa. Bonn has the greater stamina in this regard. But if the SED really wants to transfer the East-West crisis to central Europe, more than just compulsory currency exchange will soon be at stake.

RHEINISCHE POST of Dusseldorf writes: The blackmailing undertone of the Honecker speech gives cause to fear the worst. Such an approach would certainly be a violation of the Basic Treaty and a final fatal blow to detente. But maybe this is what the SED chief wants because of his Poland complex--or maybe he is forced to want it. The double blow against inter-German detente--the increase in the compulsory currency exchange amount and Honecker's threat--creates difficult problems for Bonn right after the elections.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG notes in this connection: The illusion in Bonn has passed quickly that the Soviet Union might possibly be won over to making East Berlin revoke the curtailment of visits and travel to the GDR. PRAVDA's approval of the financial throttling--the increase in the compulsory currency exchange amount--by terming it a natural measure in particular indicates the Soviet intention to harden relations with the Federal Republic and Western Europe. It must be pointed out to the Soviet Union that inter-German relations are being maintained between states with different social systems only out of necessity. It must be pointed out to the Moscow leaders in the tone of PRAVDA that the German problem is open as before.

HESSISCH NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel speculates on possible Bonn counter-measures. The federal chancellor appears to be determined not to simply return to business as usual. Some possibilities have been vaguely mentioned: The CSCE followup conference in Madrid, the swing and the already envasaged negotiations. The Eastern rulers are unlikely to be impressed by what takes place or does not take place in Madrid. It is almost cynical to speak of new treaties when the old ones are being manipulated. So actually only the swing remains as a reprisal. A decision is to be made next spring about this credit which allows the account to be overdrawn without paying interest on it. East Berlin is dependent on Bonn's good will in this regard, but the limits are narrow. The masters of East Berlin cling to the idea that politics have priority over the economy. They are unlikely to accept any upsetting of their circles, writes HESSISCH NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORTS STRICTER COCOM REGULATIONS

[Report by Bonn correspondent signed SZA.]

[Text] Bonn, 9 October--The Federal Government confirmed on Thursday in a joint special session of the Bundestag's economic and defense committees that after coordination with the alliance partners it wants to apply stricter standards to exports to the East involving strategically important goods. Committee Chairmen Manfred Woerner and Elmar Pieroth (both CDU) stated after the closed session that the Federal Government agreed to report to the new Bundestag on the process of negotiations in the Western coordination committee for exports of strategically Important goods to the East (COCOM). Since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the United States has been pressing for drastically stricter COCOM rules, which have always been incorporated in German foreign trade regulations. France, however, wants some liberalization.

The reason for the session called at the request of the FDP was exports by the Bielefeld machine building firm Gildemeister to the Soviet Union. Government representatives stressed again that an examination did not show any indications that the plant had violated the foreign trade regulations. CDU Deputy Ottfried Henning early this week gave original documents to Woerner which Gildemeister employee had purloined for "reasons of conscience" and turned over to him. Woerner passed them on to the Federal Ministry of Economics which initiated another examination on the basis of that material and which agreed to give parliament a final report. The paper DIE WELT had printed excerpts from the Gildemeister documents, claiming that Gildemeister had exported machine tools for the production of arms and ammunition to the USSR which is prohibited by the foreign trade bill.

As soon as the special session was announced, deputies from the government and opposition camps objected to independent action with regard to the Federal Republic's Eastern trade regulations. That was confirmed on Thursday. The committees dismissed discussion of a recommendation announced by Pierothf that the enterprises ought to maintain voluntary restraint when interests of the community are involved. That will be discussed by the new Bundestag as soon as the government has produced the promised reports. Juergen W. Moellemann, the FDP faction's security policy spokesman, said that in viewing trade with the East from foreign trade and security policy points of view, more reasons speak for maintaining the current political practice and corresponding legal regulations.

GOVERNMENT BACKS SOVIET CREDIT FOR POLAND

DW131022 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 13 Oct 80 p 137

[Text] The Federal Government is guaranteeing a DM7.5 million credit which the Soviet Union will transfer to its socialist fraternal state Poland which is in an economic and political crisis. The unusual triangle deal between communists and capitalists is part of the large credit in the amount of DM1.2 billion which a consortium of FRG banks underwrote for Poland on Friday of last week. Of this amount DM400 million is intended for the opening of new coal fields in Poland. Since this is considered a contribution toward safeguarding the Federal Republic's raw material supply, Bonn will guarantee this DM400 million via the Hermes credit insurance. The parties granting the credit also include the Soviet East-West Trade Bank located in Frankfurt with an amount of DM15 million. Since 50 percent of the 15 million given by the Russian bank belongs to the guaranteed amount, Bonn has thus taken over the guarantee to accept financial committments if the Poles are unable to pay it back. The Hermes guarantee for the Soviet monetary deals was given despite great reservations on the part of the Finance Ministry; it was given upon pressure of the Ministry of Economics and the Foreign Ministry. Another institute, the Central European Trade Bank, was turned down. Some 70 percent of this bank, also located in Frankfurt, belongs to the Polish state, which is asking its capitalist neighbor, the Federal Republic, for financial assistance. The Warsaw-financed bank wanted to take part with DM2.5 million in the deal guaranteed by Bonn. When the guarantee was turned down by Bonn, the bank withdraw its offer. A German bank is now supposed to take over the small share.

COAL AGREEMENT WITH POLAND SIGNED

[Text] Frankfurt, 10 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Republic will receive an additional 800,000 tons of hard coal annually for 6 years from Poland starting probably in 1986. This was announced by the Polish Minister of Finance Marian Krzak at the signing of the DM1.2 billion credit package at the Dresdner Bank in Frankfurt today. The spokesman of the bank's board of management Friderichs said that the DM800 million united financial credits contained in the package would run for 7 years with three redemption-free years. Interest was 1.5 percentage points above the Londen Interbank offered rate.

DER SPIEGEL ON POSSIBLE GENSCHER FOREIGN POLICY

DW131014 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 13 Oct 80 pp 21, 22

[Text] FDP chief Genscher intends to adopt a security policy more in line with his own concepts. The Social Democrats anticipate a fight.

The SPD candidate of voting district no 18 gave vent to his anger in the backroom of the Hamburg restaurant "Waldschloesschen!" Herbert Wehner criticized that the West in the Vienna negotiations on troop reductions in Europe (MBFR) does not react seriously enough to proposals of the opposite side. It does not even contemplate negotiating on new offers from the East.

His guests, journalists from Poland, quickly realized who the target of these accusations was: Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

What the SPD floorleader had criticized 2 days prior to the elections because of concern over constantly increasing arms burdens was defended by the liberal partner directly after the vote count: "What we want, " said Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff, "is a continuation of the Genscher course in foreign policy."

The FDP will hardly be dissuaded from this maxim. Many Social Democrats are afraid that the foreign minister, having been strengthened by votes from the Union reservoir, especially in security policy will insist on principles which come nearer the concepts of the opposition than those of the SPD. A quarrel over positions seems to be inevitable as far as the comrades are concerned.

There are ample points of association with the CDU and the CSU. Thus, Genscher always uses the expression "realistic detente policy" borrowed from the Union--a formula which is treasonable to the foreign policy makers in the SPD. They charge that this is the slogan of meeting the East with greater harshness rather than an avowal of detente.

The comrades are taking as the latest circumstantial evidence supporting their suspicion the fact that Genscher, in his reply to parliamentary interpellations by the SPD and the FDP concerning the consequences of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), expressly declared detente "indivisible" in keeping with the CDU terminology. Punctiliously the foreign minister had his aides put down in writing how often the Eastern states have violated the CSCE Final Act. Thus the Warsaw Pact failed to invite Western observers to the recent military exercises, contrary to that agreement.

And when the Free Democrat says that the Third World ought to be kept free of "every kind of predominance policy," this is really an expression of the old anticommunist containment policy of the fifties.

Differences between the partners exist also with regard to Western policy. Wherever Chancellor Schmidt maintains a careful distance and where Willy Brandt warns against "hollow-sounding vows of loyalty," the chief of the liberals demands standing "shoulder to shoulder" with the Americans. The strategist Wehner has already realized the consequences this will have for the coalition: "There will be occasional friction, but we will not rub ourselves to powder."

In fact the Social Democrats will have no choice but to join Genscher's restrictive security policy course. Chancellor Schmidt will have to revise his MBFR discussion, according to which "no participating state will maintain or represent more than 50 percent of the troops of the alliance in central Europe."

Genscher always has rejected Schmidt's argument that progress will be achieved in the continuous Vienna talks only if the strength of the Bundeswehr is curtailed, "this is out," said Genscher.

The chief of the Foreign Ministry fears, and he is supported by the CDU/CSU, that Moscow could thus achieve the right of having a say with regard to the volume of the West German army. Troop reductions therefore can be agreed on only within the alliances. FDP military expert Juergen Moellemann said last week: "Genscher is inflexible there."

Differences of opinion will emerge not merely between Schmidt and Genscher. Genscher is in favor of Spain's becoming a NATO member. SPD chief Willy Brandt, however, rejects Madrid's joining the Western "community of fate" (Genscher), because an extension of the alliance would just create "irritation" in the East bloc.

The Social Democrats view with suspicion Genscher's Foreign Ministry's trend of being more skeptical with regard to disarmament suggestions than to pleadings for new arms systems. "Genscher believes," says SPD leftist Voigt, "that more arms mean more security."

Difficulties between the SPD and the FDP could come about next week already. The self-confident liberals consider demanding a third minister of state for the Foreign Ministry. He is supposed to take care particularly of security policy, much to the irritation of Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD). First applicant: FDP loudspeaker Juergen Moellemann.

PRESS CONSIDERS A CDU/CSU-FDP RAPPROCHEMENT

DW130841 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Press review on possibility of CDU/CSU-FDP Rapprochement]

[Text] WESERKURIER of Bremen writes: The defeat of the CDU/CSU Union clearly confirmed Kohl's thesis that a change of government in Bonn presupposes some rapprochement between the CDU/CSU and the FDP. The social liberals did not come to power through a landslide in the voters' opinion but through the exchange of the coalition partner. Even Strauss seems to be betting on the liberals now, although he is least of all fitted to introduce a new era. More attractive for the FDP are Albrecht, Leisler Kiep and Rommel, who withstood even in the hardest disputes the temptation to burn the bridges. For Chancellor Schmidt and the SPD the coming 4 years will be everything but easy.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG maintains: Everything indicates that Kohl's thesis was correct, namely that one cannot quickly regain government power, but that precise convincing work will be necessary point by point with regard to the widely extended field of problems in the next years, ranging from energy supply to state debts. Then it could turn out whether even more factual agreement can be achieved with the liberals. Only thereafter will it make sense to look for a candidate for chancellor. The Union needs a long-winded policy. Kohl has realized that, Strauss still seems to be facing that process of learning.

STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG notes: Strauss at any rate gave his blessings this weekend to the tactics of a more loosened policy: The Union will more clearly outline its liberal positions, thus trying to create difficulties for the FDP. The liberals will then have to realize that they would be politically better off together with CDU/CSU if they do not want to lose freshly won voters coming from the ranks of the Union's electorate. That is indeed the only strategically right course to embark on after Kreuth, if one wants to return to the Bonn Government level some day. However, it is a question whether Strauss will have the necessary stamina.

GISCARD DEPARTS FOR PRC TOUR

Schedule of Visit

LD151055 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Oct 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Giscard d'Estaing Will Visit Tibet During His Official Visit From 15-22 October"]

[Text] On Thursday, 9 October, assistant Elysee spokesman Jacques Blot issued the program for Mr and Mrs Giscard d'Estaing's official visit to China from 15-22 October. The head of state will arrive in Beijing at 1445 hours (0745 hours Paris time) Wednesday, 15 October. He will have talks with Chinese Prime Minister Zhao Ziyang before a dinner given by the Chinese Government at the Assembly Palace.

Thursday, 16 October, will essentially be devoted to talks with CCP Central Committee Chairman Hua Guofeng and to a visit to the Forbidden City.

The program for Friday, 17 October, begins with a reception for the French community at the French ambassador's residence. Mr Giscard d'Estaing will then have talks with Central Committee Vice Chairman Deng Xiaoping, followed by lunch. In the afternoon he will have more talks with Zhao Ziyang before a dinner given by the French Embassy.

The president of the republic will make a farewell visit to Zhao Ziyang in the morning of Saturday, 18 October, and will then leave Beijing, to which he will not return during his 1-week visit.

He will fist visit Xian (central China, some 1,000 km southwest of Beijing) for a cultural visit during which he will notably visit the tomb of Emperor Qinshi Huangdi.

On 19 and 20 October Mr and Mrs Giscard d'Estaing will make a private visit to Lhasa, capital of the Autonomous Province of Tibet. The president of the republic will be the first Western head of state to visit that province. On 21 October the presidential couple will go to Shanghai. Before leaving for France in the evening the president of the republic will make a speech in the Great Hall of Fudan University on the subject of youth.

During this visit the head of state will be accompanied by Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet; Keeper of the Seals Alain Peyrefitte; Jean-Francois Deniau, minister responsible for administrative reforms and former foreign trade minister who visited Beijing in that capacity to prepare for the visit; Jean Lecanuet, chairman of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, and Pierre Sudreau, first deputy chairman of the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Committee.

Stopover in Abu Dhabi

ADDITIONAL NAVAL VESSELS DEPART FOR INDIAN OCEAN

LD151124 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Text] A naval vessel, the missile launcher "Suffren", has just left for the Indian Ocean, following the instructions of the president of the republic. It will be followed in a few days by a fleet escort ship. These two vessels are going to join other ships of the French fleet which are already stationed in the Indian Ocean. The reinforcements are a result of the Iran-Iraq conflict which could upset France's oil supplies.

FOREIGN MINISTER SPEAKS ON AFGHANISTAN, CSCE, GULF WAR

[Text] Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet addressed the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Committee on Thursday, 9 October. The events in Afghanistan, he pointed out, still overshadow the international situation. No noticeable modification has been recorded in the country as regards the level of the Soviet intervention or the people's resistance which it is encountering and which has constantly spread. No prospect of progress toward a political settlement has yet emerged. The deadlock remains, with the danger it involves, Mr Francois-Poncet stated.

The minister reported on preparations for the Madrid conference. As was foreseeable, the international climate, resulting particularly from the Afghanistan crisis, is influencing the course of the preparatory conference as it will influence the conference proper. For its part France will participate with the intention of drawing up a serious and detailed account of the Final Act's application, he said. France will make specific proposals with the aim of attaining specific progress on all subjects. It will not make do with appearances, the foreign minister added.

With regard to the conflict between Iraq and Iran, the minister recalled the bilateral nature of this conflict and the importance which the French Government attaches to continued restraint by other states, notably the superpowers, in order to prevent the conflict from spreading.

U.S.-USSR TALKS ON EUROSTRATEGIC ARMS PREVIEWED

LD141405 Paris LE FIGARO in French 13 Oct 80 p 3

[Laurent Mossu Geneva dispatch: "U.S.-USSR: Preliminary Talks on Eurostrategic Arms"]

[Text] At the beginning of the week the United States and the Soviet Union embark on "preliminary talks on Eurostrategic arms." According to a joint communique, the discussions are to take place "without any preconditions." In other words, Moscow has given up its demand that NATO should first abandon its plan for the deployment of medium-range American missiles as from 1983.

It is the first time since the invasion of Afghanistan that the two superpowers are meeting bilaterally to discuss problems connected with strategic arms. Therefore, this is an important political event. Even though France is not directly concerned by the Geneva talks, inasmuch as it pursues an independent nuclear defense policy, its security will nonetheless be affected by the development of global talks.

During the first stage Moscow and Washington will try to determine the sphere which formal negotiations should cover. Right from the start serious divergencies have appeared. The Americans want to limit the talks to theater nuclear arms whereas the Russians want to extend them to include forward-based systems.

This obviously means that Washington has adopted as its point of departure the 200 or so Soviet SS-20 missiles now deployed in Europe (they have recently supplemented the 500 SS-4 and SS-5 missiles of the sixties) and the 572 NATO Pershing-2 and cruise missiles.

As for the Kremlin, it wants to extend the bargaining to all nuclear vehicles, including the F-2 bombers based in Britain, the Phantoms carried on board 6th Fleet ships and the five Poseidon submarines permanently on station in American waters. In return, the notorious Backfire aircraft--the Red Army strategic bombers which were also at the center of SALT II talks--would also be included in the discussions. But this time it would be a question of an inferior model with a range strictly limited to Europe. For the sake of comparison, let us recall that the SALT I and II talks concerned exclusively intercontinental arms.

The two superpowers have agreed first to send to Geneva essentially technical level plenipotentiaries. It is up to them to clear the ground which politicians could eventually break in turn.

Most observers believe that the new conference in Geneva will last a long time and will be held in absolute secrecy. It is likely to last several years.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON MADRID CSCE PREPARATORY MEETING

LD101009 Paris LE MONDE in French 10 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Quibbling in Preparations for Madrid Conference"]

[Text] The din of arms in the Persian Gulf and the renewed tension in Poland are not preventing the diplomats from pursuing their traditional "exercises," although the current crises are slowing them down a little. One of these "exercises" has been going on for more than 1 month in Madrid amid almost complete indifference. The aim, however, is to establish whether, and to what ends, the 35 participants in the Helsinki conference, held 5 years ago to define the basic principles of security and cooperation in Europe, can usefully meet in the Spanish capital on 11 November. However, the preliminary discussions which have been going on between officials since the beginning of September are not really helping to give this meeting an inspiring character.

On this occasion diplomacy has proved, literally speaking, that it can be concerned with commas: The only difference between two draft agendas submitted respectively by Spain and Hungary at the end of September is that the second version of the same text appeared without punctuation or paragraphs. This is the East's way of suggesting that the various subjects listed for discussion--account of the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, increasing cooperation in Europe, holding further meetings and so forth--should be approached on an equal footing without one section being given greater priority than another. In other words the record of the way in which the 1975 agreements have been implemented--more precisely the inventory of their violation by the communist bloc countries--should not overshadow a "positive" discussion on the new "detente" efforts to be made in the future.

Since then the Eastern bloc has stopped disregarding the commas and, on the contrary, has been dotting its i's: A Czechoslovak plan makes provision for the part of the meeting dealing with "prospects"--the organization of further meetings--to start in the second week of the conference. In other words the sensitive part of the agenda on the respect--or lack of respect--for the Helsinki agreements would be dealt with in 1 week, at least 1 week of plenary sessions.

Now the Western powers have no intention of skipping so quickly over a debate to which they attach real importance, to varying degrees of course. The Americans think that participation in the Madrid meeting, after the invasion of Afghanistan and the sanctions they are still imposing on Moscow, will only be useful if the West again forcefully raises the human rights problems dealt with in the Helsinki "third basket."

Mr Carter and Mr Muskie have not made any secret--although officially they deny that they are seeking to be polemical--of their intention to place the USSR in the dock for its failure to implement aspects of the 1975 agreements. The Europeans, especially the French, are more moderate, in that they hope to organize other Helsinki-type meetings, this time directed at military measures to increase security. Nonetheless they do not intend to gloss over the debate on human rights--one of the Helsinki conference's great achievements. The communist countries will, therefore, have to give way somewhat if they want the Madrid meeting at least to give the appearance that "detente" is still on the rails.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON IRAQI CP DELEGATION VISIT WITH PCF

[Text] A Communist Party of Iraq [CPI] delegation headed by 'Abd ar-Razzaq as-Safi, member of the Political Bureau, was in Paris from Tuesday, 30 September, through Friday, 3 October, on the invitation of the PCF. The CPI delegation familiarized itself with the PCF's activities. It met with the Central Committee propaganda section and the department leadership of Val-de-Marne. It visited the Marxist Research Institute and L'HUMANITE. It talked with the Val-de-Marne department council as well as with deputies to the National Assembly. All these meetings provided the opportunity for broad and useful exchanges of opinions on all spheres of interest to party members.

The CPI delegation had important policy discussions with a PCF delegation headed by Maxine Gremetz, member of the Politburo.

After the talks the following communique was adopted:

"In the Middle East, imperialism is trying in every way to oppose and retard the peoples' progress. After the terrible loss suffered by American imperialism by virtue of the victory of the Iranian people, who have eliminated the shah's bloody dictatorship and constitute a major support for the cause of the Arab peoples, notably the Palestinian people, imperialism is trying to regain its lost positions. It has reorganized its aggressive system in the region, installing bases in Oman, Kenya, Egypt and Somalia. It has strengthened its grip on Turkey by installing a bloody military dictatorship. It is trying to strengthen the Washington-Cairo-Tel Aviv axis. Finally, the presence of several thousand U.S. Marines ready for all eventualities is the cause of a serious threat hanging over the peoples' independence. The two parties denounce imperialism's aggressive maneuvers and declare themselves, in particular, in favor of eliminating foreign military bases in the region, first and foremost American bases, but also French.

"In the light of this situation the two parties exchanged opinions on the Iraq-Iran war. They expressed serious concern on this score. They stress that the war, which is contrary to the two peoples' interests, constitutes a severe threat to peace in the region. For American imperialism and Arab and regional reactions it provides an opportunity to again unleash their attempts to secure and consolidate their positions in the region.

"The two parties noted the stalemate in the Camp David accords and the failure of attempts to put an end to the struggle of the Palestinian Arab people. The repression in the occupied territories, the constant acts of aggression against Lebanon's sovereignty, the raids against the Palestinian and Lebanese civilian populations and the annexation of Jerusalem confirm the continuity of the Israeli leaders' aggressive policy, supported by the United States.

"The PCF and the CPI reassert their complete solidarity with the Palestinian people and their sole legitimate representative, the PLO, as well as with the Lebanese people and their national movement. They are convinced that there will be no just, lasting peace without the recognition of the Palestinian people's national rights, including the right to their own independent state, and without the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967, including eastern Jerusalem.

"The CPI explained its struggle against the terrible repression it is subjected to by the dictatorial regime, its struggle for the unity of all democratic forces in Iraq, for the release of all political prisoners and the establishment of a democratic regime and real autonomy for Iraqi Kurdistan.

"The PCF assured the CPI of its active solidarity with its struggle.

"In conclusion the two parties noted with satisfaction the relations of friendship and solidarity which exist between them. They reasserted their desire to deepen and develop them still further." Paris, 3 October 1980.

SEMINAR ON SOCIAL DEMOCRACY SEEN AS STEP TOWARD 'EUROLEFT'

[Jean-Marie Colombani report: "Another Step Toward the Euroleft"]

[Text] Organized by the Socialist Studies and Research Institute [ISER] headed by Jean Pronteau, delegate to the PS first secretary, the seminar on social democracy held in Gouvieux (Oise) on Friday to Sunday, 10-12 October, was attended by representatives from European socialist and social democratic parties and by members of the PCI and PCE. The subject chosen--"the European workers movement--social democracy and socialism"--was one which was likely to promote the idea of a unitary European left. There is no doubt that this seminar constituted a new step toward establishing a Euroleft.

At the same time the French socialists were able to emphasize the PCF's isolation within the European left. Francois Mitterrand, who delivered the closing speech at the seminar, made fun of the PCF's "prehistoric" nature before denouncing the "complicity of the two Cro-Magnon men--the rightwinger and the PCF man," who are, he said, "as thick as thieves."

The last ISER seminar had been devoted to Stalinism. It was therefore logical for this one to be centered on social democracy's record and future prospects. Rejecting both capitalism and the East European bureaucratic societies, the Western socialists and social democrats are seeking a plan, a "third path," which would make it possible to establish a socialism of freedom independent of the bloc system.

This search goes hand-in-hand with a critical assessment of their own experiences--at least for those among them who have experience of government--and of possible changes. While it could be noted during the debates that the North European socialists, accustomed to exercising power, suffer perhaps from "lack of theory" and those from Southern Europe suffer more frequently from "lack of pragmatism," the strongest message probably came from Sweden. Forty years of social democracy have not prevented the bourgeoisie from calling into question the very foundations of that experiment, former Swedish Labor Minister Carl Lidbom (Social Democratic Party) explained, thereby adding weight to Mr Mitterrand's remark. Indeed Mitterrand stated: "It must be realized that big capital does not play the game. It merely grants truces." This is true to such an extent that the achievements which seemed most firmly established in France because they emerged from the National Resistance Council program, implemented when France was liberated and approved by the three major political forces, are now being called into question by the right.

However, this tendency to call such achievements into question is a general one. If the FRG, Austria and Denmark are excluded, the European context is one in which the left is being pushed back and in which there is a balance of forces favorable to capital. The various participants highlighted the fact that at a time of exponential growth, there was a convergence of interests and hence possible compromise between the welfare state established by the social democrats and the employers' industrial plan. The present crisis, however--a crisis of capitalism and/or restructuring of this capitalism, the question gave rise to discussion without any conclusion being reached--removes this convergence of interests and leaves the way open for the logic of private accumulation without any possible compromise.

Mr Jacques Delors demonstrated that in addition to this external challenge posed by the world crisis, there is an internal challenge. "Social democracy," the European Assembly economic commission chairman explained, "is the victim of its own successes."

Indeed, the European social democracies are not escaping the inconsistencies of mixed economies--inconsistencies sparked off by the crisis. While everybody agreed with Lionel Jospin [PS national secretary for international affairs] in recognizing that the German and Austrian socialists are able to "attenuate the crisis' harmful consequences," the French stressed that only a "break" with capitalism, which those socialists were not prepared to make, could make it possible for those inconsistencies to be reduced. This break depends on increased collectivization of the means of production. The British Labor Party thinks that this should also be accompanied by selective protectionism.

However, the majority of European socialists, Mr Delors stressed, reject this idea, invoking the advantages of a decentralized society and a market economy. Mr Delors suggested, therefore, that consideration be given to five elements making up a possible way of moving beyond social democracy, namely: seeking a new development model, action on supply by planning, decentralization of the administration of social risks and collective services, extending economic democracy, and combating "the deep-seated causes" of inflation.

Mitterrand: The Complicity Between the Right and the PCF

However, by no means all the obstacles have been removed: They relate essentially to relations between socialists and communists in their own countries, as PSI representative Giuseppe Tamburano stressed. Indeed, the seminar suffered the effects of the Italian Government crisis; this crisis has accentuated PCI-PSI quarrels to such an extent that Mr Pronteau had to abandon plans to invite PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer and hence PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo was "unavoidably prevented" from attending. The ISER colloquium therefore did not have the scope and influence which had been hoped.

In these circumstances Mr Mitterrand noted that "it is easier to find convergences with the PCI when you are in Paris than when you are a socialist in Rome." He added: "However, we must avoid being misled by the prism of local struggles and try to find a middle point."

Referring to Eurocommunism, which, according to him, is at present limited to "acts of courage," Mr Mitterrand did not fail to take advantage of the PCF's isolation within the European left (Note: The Euroleft is strongly ciriticized in Mr Georges Marchais' book Hope for the Present) by expanding on the idea of "objective complicity" between the French right and French Communists. "Even though big capital seems very strong today," he explained, "it is important to realize that it was drowning when a helping hand was extended, when the PCF pulled it out of the water."

TALKS CONTINUE ON FORMATION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

[Text] Rome, 11 Oct (ANSA)--The representatives from the DC, PSI, PSDI and PRI, the four parties apparently converging for a new coalition government for Italy, met this afternoon for two hours with the prime minister designate.

The Socialist secretary, Bettino Craxi, told newsmen at the end of the encounter that the discussion was useful for laying down "platform guidelines" for the new government. According to Craxi, Forlani told the party delegations that "the outline of a series of topics for further development would be ready for Thursday of next week, at the latest".

The DC secretary, Flaminio Piccoli, reported that, "it was indicative that a spirit of solidarity animated the parties in this first meeting" and voiced his "optimism on a solution for the government crisis based on a commitment to work on political initiatives and, on reflection, also on the way to govern." Piccoli went on to call for "a positive outcome" for the bid to enlarge the majority to bring in the Liberals, and called on the tiny right-of-center party to "draw near with an open spirit."

The first round of consultations for laying out a platform will take place Monday, the Socialist Silvano Labriola said, and added, methods of governing and institutional roles will be discussed during these talks. He explained that the timetable will include discussions on economic policy on Tuesday and on foreign policy on Wednesday. The Socialist spokesman predicted that Forlani will present his new cabinet on Saturday, one week from now.

PCR'S RUBBI: NEW GOVERNMENT MUST NOT BACKTRACK ON DETENTE

LD101045 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 8 Oct 80 pp 1, 15

[PCI Foreign Section Chief Antonio Rubbi article: "Italian Foreign Policy: What We Are Asking of a New Government"]

[Text] Deputy Vittorino Colombo has again put forward, in response to [PCI lower house floor leader] Comrade Natta's arguments in favor of a national solidarity government, the discriminatory issue of foreign policy as an element of "substantial diversity" not only in relation to a joint shouldering of responsibility in Italy's Government but even in relation to a constructive dialogue on the next government's approaches and program outlines. With what justification?

We believe that it would be as well to return to some of his arguments, less hastily and casually than the DC deputy secretary did. Let us begin, by all means, with the stance adopted with respect to the missiles issue.

Our stance has been most clear and specific from the outset: To postpone the decision on producing and deploying the Pershing and cruise missiles, simultaneously with a request to the Soviets to halt production and deployment of the SS20's. To accept the offer of opening negotiations which would make it possible to reestablish a balance of forces, within mutual security, at a lower level of armaments. We would like to point out that this stance was adopted not only by ourselves but by 42 percent of Parliament, and therefore also by a section of the majority, and that a similar stance was adopted throughout the country by all the major Catholic organizations. This stance, which enjoyed the support of the majority of the public, coincided in Europe with the stance adopted by major Socialist, Social Democratic and Christian forces and of two of the five governments concerned--the Dutch and the Belgian. The position of the first Cossiga government, however, was to approve the decision to reestablish, as it was claimed, the balance of forces in Europe, and immediately thereafter to take all opportune initiatives for negotiations whose success would make it possible not to implement either some or all of the decisions taken by NATO in Brussels on 12 December last year. This is what was announced by then Defense Minister Deputy Sarti, while the prime minister announced to the Senate that he was willing to go to Moscow to talk with Soviet leaders on this basis. Meanwhile, the United States was publicly requested to finally ratify the SALT II agreement.

What happened to those stances following the formation of the second Cossiga government? If next week prenegotiations on the missiles begin between the United States and the USSR, it will vindicate the stances adopted by the Dutch and Belgian Governments, the steadfast efforts made by the FRG and Chancellor Schmidt, and even the latest hints from the British Government, whose foreign secretary Lord Carrington has outlined the possibility of "a partial if not total relinquishment of the new U.S. missiles," and it will vindicate the consistent efforts made by the political forces, including our own, in Europe and Italy, which have stood firm on their demand for negotiations and taken initiatives aimed at preventing the deployment by both sides of new nuclear weapons on our continent.

In recent months, the Italian Government, however, has not produced any initiatives in this direction, has forgotten the statements and pledges made, and has even found a way to exclude from the communique on the Cossiga-Carter meeting any reference to SALT II and its ratification. As far as we know, the only specific commitment was apparently to seek sites for deploying the new missiles.

We are quite willing to acknowledge that on the missiles issue there has been and still is a "substantial diversity," if not on the objectives then on the policy pursued by the government: but we really do not feel that it has been shown to be a policy truly aimed at imparting a new thrust to detente, to the resumption of East-West negotiations and of arms reduction talks, and to specific disarmament measures. And we believe that this must constitute the new government's first clear policy commitment.

A second issue concerns the attitude to our country's international alliances. As far as we are concerned, we confirm yet again--though it is now entirely unnecessary--that there are absolutely no doubts concerning Italy's membership of these alliances or its observance of the obligations that they involve. But they must not be viewed and implemented too broadly or in such a way as to act in a direction opposite to our country's security and economic interests. What action has been taken in these fields? The security issue has been viewed exclusively in military terms and inspired by the objective, explicitly announced by U.S. President Carter last December, of reintroducing "...a protracted antagonistic relationship with the USSR..." with the aim of "...getting there first in vast areas of the world..." and to this end"...to intervene wherever necessary to fulfill U.S. responsibilities outside NATO...and to protect vital U.S. interests." [paragraph continues]

Our government was the most enthusiastic in supporting this plan; so much so that the U.S. President was able to describe Italy as "the most loyal U.S. ally." In specific terms this meant increasing military spending well beyond acknowledged modernization requirements; making available new bases for new nuclear (and chemical?) weapons; preparing our military structures to perform on NATO's southern flank the functions of its major ally, busy elsewhere; not mentioning the new U.S. strategy of "limited nuclear warfare"; a half-hearted stance on the military coup d'etat in Turkey (what a hullaballoo about human rights and freedoms there would have been had it been a country in another area!); and concluding military accords of unclear significance, such as the one with Iraq.

The defense minister announced very unwisely that the military supplies, including military technology, offered to Iraq were going to a country that "...is freeing itself from the opposed world alignments and could really become an element of balance and tranquillity (!) in the Mediterranean."

If you consider the fact that this statement was made on 20 November last year--that is, after Iraq unilaterally rescinded the 1975 Algiers Agreements with Iran and after the start of the first clashes that paved the way to the war against Iran, of which Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister 'Aziz made no secret during his recent visit to Italy--then you really wonder how much of the defense minister's action is attributable to ineptitude and how much, on the other hand, to calculated design. Be that as it may, it was an act which dangerously exposed our country, which should only intervene in that highly sensitive area of the world with initiatives of peace and cooperation with all.

The only reason given to justify such a policy is that it serves to increase our security and to counterbalance the Soviet Union's growing military strength and its capacity for foreign expansion.

But such a view of security would inevitably lead to a continuous acceleration of the arms race, to an exacerbation of the antagonism between the blocs, to increased tension and conflicts in the most diverse areas of the world and to incalculable dangers to world peace. We had no hesitation in condemning the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan and we have none in condemning any other outside military intervention on anyone's part. And we are making our own contribution to ensure the creation of the conditions for a withdrawal of foreign troops from all countries and to ensure that full sovereignty is restored and guaranteed to those countries.

A real policy of security must now be based on balanced and controlled arms reduction, on the political solution of current conflicts, on respect for the independence and sovereignty of every state, on noninterference and nonintervention from outside for whatever reason, and on measures of mutual confidence and security.

This is another field in Italian foreign policy where the new government must make responsible and substantial changes, both to contribute its own initiatives to resolving the dangerous existing conflicts in the world and to entrust our country's security to real progress in the policy of detente and peaceful coexistence. In particular, we feel that a new government program must forcefully reassert the Atlantic Alliance's defensive and geographically limited character; envisage a policy that will lay new foundations of negotiation for the serious unresolved problems that exist throughout the crisis area, which stretches from the southeast Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf and Afghanistan; and embody a specific section devoted to strict control of weapons sales and trading. In particular, we believe that a formal commitment must be made to present to Parliament and submit to democratic monitoring all the most important acts of our country's foreign and military policy.

Let us examine one last aspect, concerning our country's economic interests. Here too the Cossiga government's conduct has already caused serious damage, which has had repercussions on the national economy, thus aggravating the present crisis. First, the issue of adopting economic sanctions against countries with which Italy has intensive and profitable economic and trading relations. It has been stated that the sanctions were an act of obligatory solidarity with our major ally. But it is also worth asking why they were not regarded as such by Britain or by the FRG, which in the first 6 months of 1980 alone increased its volume of trading with the USSR by 20 percent. All this while the Italian Government considered it compromising, no less, to receive a delegation of Soviet businessmen and postponed the renewal of credit lines with certain socialist countries; while the U.S. Senate itself, under pressure from farmers' protests, was preparing to raise the embargo on grain for the Soviet Union. Could we not have bolstered our economic condition and contained the deficit in our balance of trade, had the government acted with the autonomy and initiative which other countries of the alliance decided they should exercise?

As we can see, the problem is not the long-resolved one of whether or not we should belong to the international alliances of which our country is a member, but, rather, what form this membership should take. And these examples show not the "substantial diversity" of the PCI's foreign policy ideas and stances, but if anything the limits, inertia, preoccupations and contradictions of our foreign policy and the heavy international pressures bearing down on Italy.

Our attitudes to the government have not been prejudiced, as some people insist. Indeed, when it has been a matter of adopting a stance on issues such as the Venice document on the Middle East and the Palestinian question, the UN vote on North-South relations, the law on cooperation with developing countries, the first steps toward direct relations with the PLO, the improvement of relations of cooperation and good-neighborliness with Yugoslavia--our approval and cooperation have not been lacking. The events of recent months show once again that it is possible to belong to alliances while making an individual contribution to resolving the world's serious unresolved problems and developing individual initiative to that end. This membership must go hand-in-hand with dignity, autonomy of assessment and action, and fall within the guarantee of our country's independence and national interests. This is what has been lacking and this is what we are demanding. If the new government's program in this regard is inspired and formulated on this basis, then the more open dialogue and the convergences urged by the Premier-Designate Forlani might become possible and the PCI, irrespective of its position in Parliament, will not withhold its own constructive and responsible contribution.

VISA REGULATIONS REINTRODUCED FOR IRANIANS

[Text] Finland has revoked for the time being the agreement on visa freedom concluded with Iran over 11 years ago. In practice this means that all Iranians wishing to enter Finland need a visa. In the course of autumn Sweden, Norway and Denmark have taken similar decisions. The Aliens' Department in the Ministry of the Interior has announced that it regards revocation of the visa freedom agreement as urgent. In its statement the Aliens' Department refers to a large number of Iranians who recently arrived in Sweden and who were not granted permission to stay in Sweden. They may drift to Finland. The decision by the Council of State today comes into force with immediate effect and will be in force for an indefinite period.

VISITING SOVIET CSCE COMMITTEE CALLS FOR TALKS ON NUCLEAR MISSILES

[Text] The plans to deploy new medium-range missiles in Europe are condemned in the communique published today at the end of the visit of the Soviet CSCE Committee to Helsinki. The communique emphasizes that the talks on the limitation of medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe should be started as soon as possible. It also supports President Urho Kekkonen's proposal for creating a nuclear-free zone in the north. The host of the Soviet CSCE Committee was the Finnish Committee for the Promotion of Security in Europe, the STETE.

FINNISH, NORWEGIAN MINISTERS DISCUSS CSCE, DISARMAMENT

[Text] The security-political situation in the north and Finnish-Norwegian relations were discussed in talks this morning between the countries' foreign ministers, Knut Frydenlund and Paavo Vayrynen. During the meeting, which lasted just over an hour, topical matters concerning European disarmament and the prospects of the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference were also touched upon, said Foreign Minister Vayrynen.

The initiative raised by Norwegian Ambassador Jens Evensen concerning a nuclear-free north was not actually dealt with in the talks, according to Vayrynen. Foreign Minister Frydenlund had reported yesterday to Minister Vayrynen on Evensen's statement.

Frydenlund on Evensen's Statement

[Text] The official Norwegian stance on the idea of a nuclear-free north remains the same as before, in spite of Ambassador Jens Evensen's statement in favor of a nuclear-free north. Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund spoke of the Norwegian attitude in Helsinki today. Norway has always officially opposed the idea of a nuclear-free north. Ossi Kervinen comments:

[Kervinen] Norwegian Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund was clearly annoyed over the statement of Jens Evensen, the former Norwegian minister of the law of the sea, which came as a real surprise during the visit of King Olav and Foreign Minister Frydenlund to Finland. The idea concerning a nuclear-free north put forward by President Kekkonen in the early 1960's had not had any public support in Norway before this. As a NATO country, Norway has wanted to preserve the right to accept nuclear weapons on its territory in case of a crisis situation, owing to the heavy war preparations in the north of the Soviet Union. At today's press conference Frydenlund wanted to explain that Evensen's statement in favor of a nuclear-free north was part of Norway's domestic debate on security policy. At present a heated debate is in progress in Norway on security policy.

The Norwegian Government is prepared to receive U.S. heavy weapons in case of a crisis situation, while the left wing of the Norwegian Labor Party regards the storage of arms as a provocation for a rapid attack into Norway in case a crisis really occurs.

Foreign Minister Frydenlund said that he did not have prior knowledge of Evensen's statement. He did not, however, want to describe the statement as a surprise, but rather as a disappointment. He said that Evensen had numerous opportunities to discuss the matter with him, but he went public. That is why Frydenlund is disappointed.

A debate on security is in progress in Norway, and it is both positive and necessary, Foreign Minister Frydenlund says. This debate should, however, avoid creating sharp differences of opinion concerning security policy, the foreign minister emphasized. In his view unity is necessary, and it can only be achieved by following the government's line. This line combines concern for Norwegian security with work for detente and disarmament. According to Frydenlund, this is a line which he is ready to defend until the very end. The foreign minister said that those who now support only detente must approve the fact that the government is also concerned about Norwegian security, and that those whose only concern is security and military matters must remember that the government also strives to promote detente. Frydenlund stressed at the news conference that the Norwegian security policy also takes the neighboring countries into consideration. Norway tries to combine the security of the home country with a policy which avoids causing problems for the neighboring countries in the north, the foreign minister said. He said at the press conference that Ambassador Evensen's speech on security policy has not actually been discussed in Finland. Frydenlund, however, said that he told the Finnish side about the Norwegian debate.

The Finnish Foreign Ministry also understands that Evensen's statement is part of Norway's domestic debate and notes that the official Norwegian stand remains the same.

CONSERVATIVES COULD SPLIT TO FORM NEW PARTY

[Text] A split in Iceland's largest party, the conservative-oriented Independence Party, could lead to the formation of a new political party. Supporters of Allthing Member Albert Gudmundsson have formed a discussion club, which also includes members of other parties, and this may lead to the formation of a new party.

NORWAY

NEW BARENTS SEA TALKS WITH USSR NOT LIKELY BEFORE SPRING

[Unattributed report: "New Round of Talks on Demarcation Line Not Likely Before Next Spring"]

[Text] The next round in the negotiations between the Soviet Union and Norway on a demarcation line in the Barents Sea will in all probability be postponed until after the planned meeting between Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund and his Soviet counterpart, Andrey Gromyko. This means that it seems probable that Ambassador Jens Evensen--who leads the Norwegian negotiating delegation in the gray zone negotiations--will not meet his Soviet counterpart until next year.

According to reports received by AFTENPOSTEN, Norwegian sources expect the foreign minister to raise the unresolved questions connected with the January 1978 interim gray zone agreement between the two countries. This interim agreement has been extended three times, at present up to 1 July next year.

Norway has tried to reach a final agreement on the demarcation line in the Barents Sea, because this would create clear boundaries between the two countries' zones. During the last round of talks--which took place in Moscow in April this year on the initiative of the Soviet Union--the parties made a little progress and agreed at the time on a new round of talks in Oslo in the fall.

This could be part of the reason why Foreign Minister Frydenlund wanted to meet Gromyko as early as in September. At a Soviet request the timing for Frydenlund's meeting with Gromyko was delayed until December. The final date has still not been set for the minister's talks in Moscow.

According to reports received by AFTENPOSTEN, Norway sees little point in carrying out a round of talks at the civil servant level before the political talks between Gromyko and Frydenlund have taken place. For this reason the next round has been postponed.

Ambassador Jens Evensen has been appointed chief negotiator in these demarcation line negotiations by royal decree.

If Evensen is to be deprived of this mission or is moved to another area of activities in the Foreign Ministry, this would probably have to be done by a new government resolution in the form of a royal decree.

ARBEIDERBLADET COMMENTS ON FRG ELECTION RESULTS

LD101001 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 8 Oct 80 p 4

[Editorial: "Congratulations, West Germany"]

[Text] "I believe that the election result will please our neighbors to the north, south, east and west. West Germany will continue to be a reliable neighbor, and that is what is most important."

This is how West German Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt summed up the result of the weekend's federal election, an election that ended in a clear victory for the sitting government coalition of Social Democrats and Free Democrats. With a majority of 44 seats in the new Bundestag, Helmut Schmidt and his team can seize on a new 4-year period in Bonn.

It goes without saying that Helmut Schmidt is right when he says that the election result pleases West Germany's neighbors. In a time of increased confrontation between the superpowers and poor conditions for the concept of detente, it is comforting to know that this strategically important country in the heart of Europe is being governed by Social Democrats, and not by the ultra-conservative Franz Josef Strauss.

We will not indulge here in endless speculations on what an election victory for Strauss could have led to, but if we are to take the controversial Bavarian politician at his word, he would have given drastic new direction to West Germany's foreign policy course. He would have rejected every "flirtation" with the Soviet Union, given active support to the rebellious Polish workers and strengthened NATO no matter what the cost.

It does not take much imagination to imagine what such policies could have led to in practice. At worst the Ostpolitik that Willy Brandt initiated and which Helmut Schmidt has followed would have broken down completely. West Germany could have become a factor of unrest in Europe and not a factor of peace.

In his period as West German Government head Helmut Schmidt has made his mark as an active and courageous negotiator and mediator in the international arena.

Together with his foreign minister, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, he has made every effort to keep the political channels open in all directions. Even though his efforts have not led to the greatest results, Europe has need of such a bridge-builder between East and West.

The victory for the governing coalition came as no surprise. Opinion polls before the election indicated that the coalition between the SPD and the FDP would be given a new mandate by the voters. However, it must be noted that it came as a surprise that the Free Democrats could assure themselves of over 10 percent of the votes. To the extent that the FDP's success can be interpreted as a declaration of confidence in Genscher's foreign policy, this is also a pleasing sign.

In the next 4 years the governing coalition can rely in all on 270 representatives in the Bundestag, while the conservative union parties have to content themselves with 226. With such a balance of strength in the coalition's favor the conditions ought to be right for a stable political situation in West Germany in the eighties. But this is of course dependent on whether the cooperation between the coalition parties goes without a hitch, and both parties refrain from riding political hobbyhorses.

And what about Franz Josef Strauss and his future in West German politics? Is he finished for good, or will he remain in a position to play the role of the eternal mischiefmaker?

To pass final judgment on Strauss now, barely 3 days after the election, is hardly possible. For his own part he says that he will fight on, and that the union parties CDU and CSU will continue their cooperation. Both are very possible. But let us at least hope that the union parties will realize that the demagogue Strauss is not the right man to speak for their cause. In such circumstances Strauss's candidacy for the post of chancellor will not have been in vain.

SWEDEN

SVENSKA DAGBLADET SEES TIME RUNNING SHORT FOR CARTER CAMPAIGN

LD150901 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 11 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Converted on the Scaffold"]

[Text] Just over 3 weeks before the U.S. Presidential election President Jimmy Carter has apologized and promised not to say anything wicked about his opponent Ronald Reagan in the future.

Not unexpectedly this happened on television, the medium in which politicians appear to be more banal than they are and where political programs and ideas can easily be made shallow to the point of meaninglessness.

So far the U.S. election campaign has been pretty dirty and it should therefore be welcomed by all when the President says that he wants to stick to more honest methods. No matter how honest the President's intention may be in this, it does seem like a conversion on the scaffold.

The opinion polls show that now that the final spurt has come in the long fight to reach the White House the President is in a poor position. Ronald Reagan is still in the lead and, more importantly, he seems to be leading in the states of greatest importance, namely those where the greatest number of electoral votes are.

Reagan has a firm base in the west, while Carter is weakening on his own home ground in the south. The decisive battle could therefore take place in large industrial states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania, where heavy industry is concentrated and where the present economic problems are felt more strongly than in many other places in the United States, and in Michigan, which is the center of the crisis-hit U.S. automobile industry.

The classic example of how a candidate tapped for defeat by almost all turned loss into victory was when President Harry Truman decided to go out and "give them hell."

If Carter has been following the same course then he has failed up to now. After catching Ronald Reagan in the opinion polls he has slipped behind again. The way in which he has tried to make life unpleasant for his rival has been seen as mudslinging and insulting of an opponent.

This is a serious thing for a politician like Jimmy Carter, who reached the White House 4 years ago after promising to introduce more decency into American politics.

We can only wait and see whether the sinner has awakened in time. Three weeks might be a short time for Carter to prove that he is as virtuous as he was once painted by the kingmakers who piloted him from the governorship in little Georgia to the White House in Washington.

Has he not already, through the way in which he allowed racial tensions to be drawn into the election campaign, shown that his decency has been the subject of exaggerated advertising and that he is not only the noble and moral southern state Baptist who teaches Sunday school in Plains but can be just as wicked as ordinary mortals?

Of course, U.S. elections are not decided on the virtues of the candidates, but, in a campaign that has seemed more lacking in substance than for a long time to many voters, the question can carry greater weight than normal.

Especially since the "new left" after a short and fruitless blooming is now dead and has been replaced by the "new right", which has nothing to do with modern conservatism or so-called neoconservatism but which plays on reactionary currents.

These groups, among which we find, for example, the "Moral Majority," present their message in a series of radio and television sermons, where religion is unrestrainedly mixed with politics and moral questions. And these are groups which give their support to Reagan.

This has led Carter to make his own Sunday meditations. But he only has 25 days in which to catch his opponent with the help of such meditations and a more convincing election campaign. Reagan has already managed to make many mistakes, but he holds the trump card that he has no need to feel under pressure like Carter and can therefore afford to be careful.

Carter must give it all he has, and, in addition, he must deal with the third candidate, John Anderson, who, it is true, does not have a chance, but could rob Carter of all too many votes if he does not stand down in time.

DAGENS NYHETER VIEWS WANING POPULARITY OF NORWAY'S NORDLI

LD101319 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 7 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial" "Nordli Sailing Against the Wind"]

[Text] "It's pity these are not voters," Norwegian Prime Minister Odvar Nordli said, when he was met by tens of thousands of cheering people on his state visit to China recently. For at home in Norway things are not going terribly well for Odvar Nordli and his Labor Party.

And just when he had returned home to Oslo, three of the more prominent ministers in his government tendered their resignations--for personal reasons, it was said, officially at least. They were replaced by people with considerably weaker profiles.

After the great "bloodbath" last fall, when half the government had to resign after the Labor Party had received losses as the Conservative Party won great victories in the municipal elections, Nordli needed to show that the country had a stable and unanimous leadership. He has not quite been able to bring this off.

The three ministers' resignations came at a most inopportune time, only 1 year before the next Storting election.

The division of the party leadership between Odvar Nordli as prime minister and Reiulf Steen as party chairman has not been felicitous. It is true that the disagreements with the Norwegian trade union federation have lessened, but what difference does that make when it is the Conservative Party which is attracting the younger voters?

In the opinion polls, most recently in one taken last weekend, the Labor Party has 38 percent as against a little over 42 percent in the 1977 election, when the party together with the tiny Socialist Left Party managed to create a majority of only one seat. In the polls the Conservative Party is supported by 30 percent as against 25 percent in the election. The three nonsocialist parties, which can be expected to build a common election front--if the abortion issue does not put a wrench in the works again--has a stable lead in public opinion.

It will take a lot for the Labor Party to pull itself up in the year that is left, and it is not only the Conservative Party's power of attraction that must be broken if it is to do this. The budget presented yesterday with its significant reductions of direct taxation may perhaps help, but the internal dissensions within the Labor Party must also be overcome.

The greatest political talent among those who resigned last week was the dynamic energy minister, Bjartmar Gjerde, who, for example, was a prime mover behind oil production in the far north too. However, this brought him into constant conflict with the party's environmentalists. The differences will perhaps now be somewhat milder, but not totally removed.

This fall the continuing disagreement on the defense issue has flared up again. A year ago it concerned NATO's deployment of new nuclear arms in Western Europe, to which the Labor Party leadership agreed and in so doing rode roughshod over a majority within the party. Now it is the contingency stockpiling of NATO military materiel in Norway--for the first time directly intended for use by U.S. troops. It is true that a majority of the Norwegian population is in favor of contingency stockpiling, but especially within the Labor Party there is a strong minority that is critical of it. However, the government has already reached agreement with the United States on such stockpiling.

In the last few days Nordli has been appointed his party's prime ministerial candidate in the election. However, this is not enough. Without real leadership, with internal splits and with a modern Conservative Party with the wind in its sails, the odds now look bad for Odvar in Norway.

DAGENS NYHETER: SUPERPOWERS' LIMITED NUCLEAR WAR 'LUNACY'

LD100925 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 8 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "The Directives of Lunacy"]

[Text] In this U.S. election year there is much that has gone wrong in the arms debate. The Soviet Union's violation of Afghanistan has played into the hands of the hawks in the U.S. security establishment. Under pressure also from the simple slogans from the times of the cold war voiced by his rival, Ronald Reagan, President Jimmy Carter has started to follow a militarist line.

At less strained moments during the years following his election victory in 1976, Carter tried to resist the demands from the so-called military-industrial complex. He halted work on the new B-1 strategic bomber, and after a number of remarkable maneuvers he at least postponed a decision on the neutron bomb.

Immediately prior to his inauguration Carter had even raised the notion that the United States should content itself with a deterrent capacity that was limited to a certain minimum of weapon carriers.

The President had promised to lessen the military budget, but nowadays it is growing again. A new emergency military force is being built up. Further, Carter has decided to develop among other things an enormously large and costly project involving mobile strategic missiles, the MX. And towards the end of the summer he allowed information to be leaked that the United States had adopted a new strategy that would make it possible to fight a limited nuclear war.

The ideas are formulated in what is called in U.S. bureaucratic language PD 59 (Presidential Directive.) This so-called Presidential Directive establishes that the U.S. nuclear arsenal will to a greater extent be directed at the Soviet Union's nuclear launch pads and silos, against command centers and selected strategic-economic targets. The doctrine of assured mutual destruction is considered insufficient.

People have persuaded themselves that it would be mad to respond to a Soviet first strike against U.S. nuclear weapons in the sparsely populated midwest with an attack of their own on the Soviet Union's large towns. In the next round the Soviet Union with its surviving arms would be bound to move against the United States' own population centers. Faced with this prospect it has been said that the United States must acquire other alternatives with which to retaliate, alternatives that do not necessarily mean full-scale nuclear war.

Actually this is nothing new. The question of whether one is to aim at one's opponents cities or at his military installations--countercity or counterforce--has been discussed for many years, principally during the seventies. At any rate U.S. nuclear arms are already aimed at targets other than large Soviet cities.

The talk of new doctrines has not been able to convince skeptics in Congress in the past. The Soviet leadership has the habit of reacting vehemently to any change in military dispositions on the NATO side. An illuminating example is the differences of opinion surrounding the NATO decision to acquire medium-range nuclear missiles for Europe. And in the case of the controversial Presidential Directive the Soviet Union claims that the United States is lowering the nuclear threshhold with its new strategy.

The Soviet Union is of course right in pointing out how frighteningly dangerous it is that a superpower is in practice trying to increase its capacity not only to deter from but also really to carry out a nuclear war. The only thing is that the Soviet Union itself has obviously acquired great numbers of new nuclear missiles that are in position trained on U.S. military targets.

"Is it not a good thing that the superpowers should destroy each other's arms rather than each other's cities in a nuclear war, is not a limited nuclear war to be preferred to large wars?" people may wonder. But the question has nothing to do with reality. According to a new UN study, carried out by experts from nonnuclear countries under the leadership of Swedish UN Ambassador Anders Thunborg, it is impossible to limit nuclear wars. There cannot be any winners in a nuclear war.

The trend toward nuclear arms with ever-greater accuracy has led the superpowers deeper and deeper into lunacy. It has quite simply become easier in principle to knock out nuclear arms in their silos, which in its turn has created new temptations and led to reprogrammings.

In ingenious war games both sides try to work out how many warheads could be fired, how many weapons, given certain assumptions, would be able to survive a hostile "first strike" and then be fired in a "second strike" against the enemy.

They, or at least the Americans, try to persuade themselves and the rest of us that it really would be possible to avoid a catastrophic series of developments by indulging in sharpshooting against individual nuclear targets or groups of nuclear targets.

They pretend that not so many people would need to die in these supposedly "surgical" nuclear incisions, despite the fact that Soviet nuclear installations, in particular, often lie in the immediate vicinity of densely populated areas.

This is a mendacious game in which the superpowers are playing upon our anxiety and our hopes of survival. We would like to believe that they realize what is at stake and have the ability to stop to think. But in the present tense year they are not giving us any convincing proof of this.

DEFENSE MINISTER CRITICIZES COMBAT TRAINING SHORTCOMINGS

LD100913 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 7 Oct 80 p 24

[Unattributed report: "Kronmark Wants To Strengthen Defense"]

[Text] "Savings within the armed forces have been made at the expense of realism in exercises--the soldiers see only too rarely what they can achieve with the equipment they actually have."

In a speech at the army, navy and air force film service's diamond jubilee in Stockholm on Monday [6 October] Defense Minister Erik Kronmark said that such large savings should not be made in the defense forces so that the individual's confidence in our defenses is destroyed.

"Refresher exercises in large units are all too rare, and simulators are taking over from actual arms.

"We must not save so much within the armed forces that it destroys the rest of the world's belief in our desire to hold fast to our neutrality policy," Kronmark said.

DAGENS NYHETER ON DEFENSE MATERIEL ADMINISTRATION

LD101127 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 7 Oct 80 p 7

[Sven Svensson report: "Report on the Swedish Defense Materiel Administration Ready"]

[Text] The Swedish Defense Materiel Administration will be given stronger leadership and looser organizational connections with the three branches of the armed forces. Gunnar Petri, former defense ministry undersecretary, makes these proposals in a report that will be presented to the government on 14 October. The number of employees in the administration will be reduced gradually from the present level of 3,700 to around 2,600 in 1990.

Today the materiel administration has an organization with main departments attached to the main services; these departments are based on the previous materiel administrations that existed separately within each branch of the armed forces.

The coordination of different defense systems and general technical development work for each service branch has been gathered in a central department.

This means, for example, that there is a missile section in the department for air force materiel and one in the section for army materiel.

The organization has worked well when one service alone is ordering particular equipment, but not when several services are affected.

Further, this division has meant that the air force has reached a dominating position within the materiel administration, since the ordering of aircraft is by far the most expensive kind of purchase made.

Defense budgets mean that the Defense Materiel Administration's staff will have to be reduced at the same time as the trend toward more integrated defense systems is continuing primarily because of advances in the field of electronics.

Developments in military technology and the situation of the Swedish defense industry make it necessary to increase the coordination and timing of decisions to develop new defense materiel and to order this materiel from the defense industry.

For this to be possible it will be necessary to have expert knowledge forming the basis for decisions at an early stage. This must be the result of cooperation between the general staff, the high commands of the different armed services and the Defense Materiel Administration.

The economic situation allows no wastefulness. Duplication of work, unnecessary price adjustments and vague customer-supplier relations must therefore be avoided, Gunnar Petri thinks.

Work on technical specifications can be transferred to industry and industry ought to be used to a greater extent than in the past as a main supplier of complete technical defense systems.

In the future, activities spanning several service branches will increase, the report says.

The technical development of modern missile, coordination and combat information organization systems requires great competence and is now distributed between the three main departments within the Defense Materiel Administration.

Effective use of resources will require in the future a more integrated organization.

Instead of the organization along the lines of the three branches of the services the commission proposes integrated units for arms, missiles, electronics, purchasing and quality control. Such integrated units already exist for vehicles, the quartermaster's department, vessels, aircraft and materials testing.

There must be special resources for the coordination of complicated materiel systems. In the proposed organization the commission wants to allot these coordinating tasks to the service branch that is the main customer for the materiel involved.

Then there would be a product-oriented organization, where the branches of the armed services would have a collective responsibility for defense systems, the report states.

Such an organization requires strong central leadership with total responsibility for the allocation of resources and so forth. Decisions on all important questions concerning the acquisition of defense materiel should be made by the central leadership and not be delegated to the main departments.

Under a strengthened central leadership the main department for the army would concern itself with arms, missiles and vehicles, for example; the main department for the navy would deal with vessels and electronics; and the main department for the air force with aircraft and tests. In addition, there would be two other main departments for administration and more general questions.

One of the experts on the commission, General Bengt Lehander, has expressed reservations and wants a simpler pattern for cooperation between the Defense Materiel Administration and the head of the air force, since new aircraft constitute by far the most important order.

Lehander considers that the missile section should be transferred from the army department to the air force department. The connection between aircraft platforms [flygplansplattform] and missiles is so strong that total integration is necessary to produce an effective weapon system, he says. Similar views could be expressed about the electronics unit that is placed under the navy. There the connection is not so strong, since the electronic systems that form part of the aircraft system will still be part of the air force department in the future.

CALLAGHAN RESIGNS AS HEAD OF LABOUR PARTY

UK FRIGATE TO JOIN MISSILE DESTROYER IN OMAN GULF

LD151224 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1205 GMT 15 Oct 80

[By Robert Hutchinson]

[Text] Britain has sent the Royal Navy Frigate Alacrity from Singapore to join the guided missile destroyer HMS Coventry patrolling the Gulf of Oman, the Defence Ministry confirmed today.

Alacrity, 3,250 tons, armed with Exocet anti-ship missiles, and a 4.5 inch automatic gun, is due in the area, south of the strategic Straits of Hormuz in a week's time.

The Defence Ministry said the move was to provide "useful flexibility". The two ships would help "British merchant shipping in the area if necessary".

The two British warships plus the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Supply Ship Olwen will be patrolling independently of the strong force of American and French ships in the waters near the war-torn Persian Gulf.

The Gulf of Oman is seaward of the strategically vital Straits of Hormuz through which up to 60 percent of the free world's oil is carried by tankers from the Gulf ports.

Two or three Iranian warships are stationed in the straits, according to Western sources, but they are only interrogating merchant shipping by radio, seeking their destination, and warning them to steer clear of Iranian waters.

UK EXPORTS WITHIN EEC ON THE RISE

LD141215 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 14 Oct 80 p 32

[Report by "Our City Staff": "Britain 'Closing Trade Gap With EEC Countries'"]

[Excerpt] Britain's exports to the rest of the Common Market are rising faster than imports and the trade gap is being narrowed, Mr Nott, trade secretary, said in Athens yesterday.

Exports had risen from 29 percent of Britain's total foreign shipments in 1970 to 43 percent in the first six months this year. West Germany was now Britain's biggest export market, and all the Community states, apart from Luxembourg, are among the top 10 outlets for British goods. Deliveries to West Germany, including North Sea oil, now cover 82 percent of what Britain buys, against 66 percent a year ago. In France the figure is 85 percent compared with 70 percent.

Mr. Nott said that the decline in Britain's share of world trade had been checked since the middle of the 1970's largely with the help of the rapid increase in exports to the Common Market. He made it clear that North Sea oil was not responsible for all the improvement. Britain had "recently enjoyed one of the fastest growing shares of the sophisticated market for manufactured goods."

Mr. Nott, with Labour's new commitment to withdraw from the EEC clearly in mind, added: "Despite assertions to the contrary our membership is working and providing major benefits to leading British exporters and to the nation as a whole."

The trade secretary is in Athens to try and save important contracts for power plant, coal and military business. The Greek administration has been having second thoughts about some of the deals and last month the prime minister used her influence to try and keep the negotiations alive.

I SIMERINI: HOUSE PRESIDENT TO FORM NEW POLITICAL PARTY

NC120833 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 12 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Mikhailidhis, president of the House of Representatives and vice president of the Democratic Party [DIKO], said to I SIMERINI: "The movement that I will lead will be a political party."

This is the first time that Mikhailidhis has stated that he will definitely create a political party; in doing this, he will dissociate his position from that of DIKO and President Kiprianou, who was one of the founders of the party.

Despite all this, as we are informed, Mikhaildhis wishes to cooperate with Kiprianou by remaining in the National Council. According to Mikhailidhis he will attend the National Council as leader of a party and ex officio as president of the House of Representatives.

In reference to the house statement made by the Tasos Papadhopoulos "group" and in order to stress that he does not intend to do anything of this sort [to join the newly formed independent group], Mikhailidhis stated that he will create a party. The announcement of Mikhailidhis' new party is expected to be made, without fail, within the week before the next house session on Thursday.

Meanwhile, some of those who promised to follow Mikhailidhis seem to be hesitant since Kiprianou's return [from Yugoslavia], as Kiprianou has already asked to see some of them. [Nicosia O AGON in Greek on 12 October in a page one report quotes "reliable information" that six unnamed DIKO house deputies as well as other DIKO cadres will join Mikhailidhis in his new party].

On the other hand and according to our information, Kiprianou is preparing his counterattack which, according to circles close to the president, "will be sudden and drastic."

Mikhailidhis Announces New Party

NC141827 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Text] President of the House of Representatives Mikhailidhis in a written statement today announced his withdrawal from the Democratic Party [DIKO] and announced the formation of a new political party to be named the New Democratic Party. [Nicosia Domestic in English and Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English on the morning of 15 October refer to the new party formed by House President Mikhailidhis as the New Democratic Front.]

In his statement, Mr Mikhailidhis said that our domestic front is shaking dangerously and our political situation is very poor. He also said that faulty assessments, inappropriate activities, omissions and deficiencies in many quarters have created terrible deadlocks. Unfortunately, he added, after the death of the great leader Archbishop Makarios, in practice there was no recognition of the necessity for collective decisionmaking, for taking responsibility to make correct assessments of the problems and possibilities and no realization of the great responsibilities connected with the continuation of our struggle, with the result that today there are fewer of us, we are weaker and we are failing in many problems.

Referring to the goals of the New Democratic Party, Mr Mikhailidhis stressed that he will not oppose the president, the government or any other, and that he will not fail to strengthen every government action that he considers positive. Particularly, he stressed, we want to assure that we will be in solidarity with every government effort toward promoting our national cause.

In conclusion, the statement said that the party's principles, philosophy and program will be declared soon at the establishment meeting.

The New Democratic Party in a statement this evening said that the deputies Nikos Vassiliadhis from Paphos, Loizos Karamikhalis from Limassol, Paris Lennas from Nicosia and Takis Nemitzas from Limassol have withdrawn from the Democratic Party and have joined the New Democratic Party.

Kiprianou Calls DIKO Meeting

NC142048 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Text] A Democratic Party [DIKO] statement issued this evening says that the republic president and DIKO chairman, Mr Kiprianou, has called for an extraordinary joint session at 1700 tomorrow afternoon, at the DIKO central offices in Nicosia, of the Political Office, the deputies, the Executive Committee and the district committees of DIKO and NEDIK [Democratic Party Youth] in order to examine the situation that has been created following the statement by Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis and certain deputies to withdraw from DIKO.

Opposition Demands Assembly Dissolution

NEW NICOSIA GREEK-LANGUAGE WEEKLY BEGINS PUBLICATION

NC131530 [Editorial Report] The first issue of a new Nicosia Greek-language Monday weekly ELEVTHEROTIPIA [FREE PRESS] appears on 13 October 1980. The paper's masthead carries only its Nicosia postal address and telephone number and notes that it is published by the "Provlimatismos [Pondering] Publishing Company Ltd."

In a front page column entitled "On the Setting Out," it says that, although in such cases it is customary to outline positions and declare intentions, " we will not do so, because we believe that the reader will realize our positions in time and without having the need for interpretations by third parties, since our positions will be manifested with deeds. We feel, however, that it is necessary to say a few clarifying words: We are nobody's party organ nor are we attached to anyone. We merely aspire to serve our country as much as we can by hunting for the truth and offering information, without any expediency or ulterior motive, so that the people may be briefed and form their own infallible judgement based on all the facts."

The column further observes that we are passing through difficult times and urges responsible and substantiated handling of facts so that disagreements may be located and so that, through a pure dialogue, gaps may be bridged. It concludes by stressing that "ELEVTHEROTIPIA places before its readers only the following two points: a) full information, b) a clear stand toward facts. And it asks to be judged by these two criteria: without adjectives or labels; without ulterior judgements or cerebral analyses."

O AGON INSISTS GOVERNMENT BRIEF PEOPLE ON TALKS PROPOSALS

["My Opinion" column from the Observer: "The People Do Not Endanger the Dialogue; the Government Should Brief Them"]

[Text] At this moment, even the last Turkish Cypriot knows about the Greek Cypriot proposals on the territorial issue. ANATOLIA, which transmitted the proposals, said it took the data from UN circles. The proposals were published in the Turkish press and everybody knows them now.

Everybody knows the proposals now except, of course, the Greek Cypriots; those who are directly concerned know nothing. Why? Because in the name of a faulty secrecy the leadership keeps both press and people in the dark by refusing to give a basic and responsible brief about what is going on in the intercommunal talks.

Therefore, everybody except us knows that in our proposals on the territorial issue we asked for the return of Famagusta, Morphou, Kythrea, Karpas Peninsula and other occupied territories except Kyrenia. According to the leadership, the people of Kyrenia, Morphou and Varosha are the only ones who have no right to know because the so-called dialogue will be endagered by those who are directly concerned, by those whose fate is at stake at the talks, and by all Greek Cypriots in general. We fail to understand the mentality of the government in particular and the responsible leadership in general.

Does the leadership sincerely believe that the dialogue is being endangered by the people? Does it sincerely believe that by briefing the people the talks will be endangered and ultimately fail? Where is its frequently repeated statement that it will brief the people on national issues? We do not believe that the intercommunal talks are endangered by briefing the people. On the contrary, we believe that the people must be kept informed about what is going on because their future is at stake and their fate is being decided.

We accept the fact that difficulties may arise if certain aspects are revealed. We also understand that everything cannot be revealed. But we believe that there is a tremendous difference between this generally acceptable assessment and the total contempt the government shows to the people by keeping quiet.

In addition, the government, by keeping its mouth shut and refusing to enlighten and brief correctly, may bring about confusion among the people, particularly among the refugees, and bring about exactly the opposite results than those it appears to be pursuing. The people cannot be informed by the Turkish Cypriot press and the Turkish news agency about how their future is being planned. At any given time, they may channel misleading information to provoke confusion and a split among the people. The leadership cannot underestimate and ignore this danger.

For all these reasons, we believe that those responsible must proceed immediately and without any further delay to brief the people on what is going on in the intercommunal talks. Continuing the tactic of secrecy will bring no results and possibly provoke confusion and create dangers.

PAPERS COMMENT ON TURKISH CYPRIOT PRESS LEAKS

NC121405 [Editorial Report] All Greek-language dailies of 12 October carry comment or reports on the leaks in the Turkish Cypriot press of the Greek Cypriot proposals on territorial issue of the Cypriot problem.

Most of the papers stress that the initial promise made by UN Special Representative in Cyprus Gobbi and the interlocutors from both sides to ask for the help of the press so that the talks may succeed and cultivate a good climate has been broken.

ELEVTHERI KIPROS says in a commentary that the Turkish press comment on the proposals constitutes Denktas' first reply to the Greek side's proposals. It goes on to say: "The Turkish Cypriot leadership's sly way of fostering the weakness and ultimate failure of the talks is well-known." "The Turkish Cypriot press should not be led astray by Denktas." It concludes by stressing that the Turkish Cypriot press should help in continuing the talks and should be interested in the good intentions of the Turkish Cypriot community.

KHARAVYI in a commentary says that "it is natural for disagreements to occur at the negotiating table" and that "destructive chauvinism does not benefit either side." It concludes by saying: "patience, restraint andprudence should be shown by all to help the talks bear fruit." KHARAVYI also carries a report by "reliable circles" citing Waldheim's 7 August 1980 formula on the talks. It says that: "In his last meeting, the Turkish interlocutor, instead of submitting concrete proposals with a chart showing the areas the Turks want to keep, mentioned the criteria that Denktas had submitted in February 1976." The circles further say that the Greek side has submitted the same proposals as those it submitted in Vienna in March 1977, namely, 20 percent of the Cyrpiot territory to be given to the Turks and the creation of two administrative areas. The circles stress that: "Concrete proposals are imperative for a substative dialogue and for holding sincere and constructive negotiations." The circles conclude by saying that: "The statement that the Turkish Cypriot leadership only accepts readjustment of the borders is not a proposal."

I SIMERINI points out in its commentary that "the complete secrecy surrounding the dialogue does not help it," "the Turkish press' views on the talks should be brought to the negotiating table." It stresses that "this would not have happened had a responsible briefing been given to the press on the course of the dialogue." It urges the United Nations to "immediately lift the veil of secrecy and mystery that covers the talks."

TA NEA in a commentary says that "it was not surprised with the reaction of the Turkish side to the Greek Cypriot side's proposals on the territorial issue." It holds the government responsible for the "furor" and "protest" on the territorial issue and says that it should have made no concessions to the Turkish side. It stresses that "the government tolerates the Turkish side's violation of its obligations, its not submitting proposals, its mockery--such as speaking about so-called criteria--its backing out and its being sarcastic." It maintains that "the Turkish side utilizes our own inactivity in promoting methodical and planned propaganda."

In its commentary O AGON asserts that "we have submitted our proposals on the territorial issue so that they may be negotiated." It goes on to say that "it is impossible to hold negotiations if the Turkish side avoids saying precisely what it wants from the other side and describing our proposals as not negotiable." It concludes by hoping that the Turkish side "will not adopt the wild stand of the Turkish press."

O FILELEVTHEROS quotes a report in the Turkish press on the territorial issue session and says that "the Greek Cypriots won't be responsible if the talks are led to a critical stage." The paper asserts that "the Turkish press tries to create the impression that the Greek Cypriot side is intransigent by submitting 'blown up and irrational' proposals on the territorial issue," and concludes by saying that proposals submitted by the one side is not an ultimatum to the other side.

I MAKHI carries a brief factual report on yesterday's Turkish Cypriot press reports on the territorial issue session of the intercommunal talks.

REPORTAGE ON VISIT OF BRITISH TRADE SECRETARY

I KATHIMERINI Reports Talks' Impasse

AT141255 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 14 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] There were no results from the first Greek-British contact while the talks held yesterday at the Ministry of Coordination with British Secretary of State for Trade John Nott ended without any practical result, since both sides were insistent, immovable, in their original positions.

After the meeting, acting Coordination Minister Palaiokrasas, who directed the talks on behalf of the Greek side, said there was a discussion with Nott on Greek-British economic relations both on the bipartite and on the EEC level. In reference to British proposals for the supply of electric power generating units, coal and so forth, and in reference to participation by British firms in development and other public works projects, Palaiokrasas stated:

In reference to energy projects (two electric power generating units of 300 megawatts each and the supply of coal for their operation for 25 years) the British proposals will be further studied and, when the government is ready, an answer will be given. According to information available to us, DEI, the public power corporation, which is studying the recently, slightly improved British proposals, is clearly negative and opposes the purchase of these units, arguing that their cost is much higher than that on the international market.

In reference to participation by British firms in Greek public works projects, such as the modernization of Greek railways, establishment of three hospitals, the Athens metro system and the new air terminal, it was stated by the Greek side that participation by British firms in international bidding to be proclaimed for these projects would be desirable.

Oil

It was reported that the British connect the supply of North Sea oil with the Greek purchase of electric power generating units--and the coal necessary for their operation--and as a result it must also be considered certain that this supply of oil--which was requested by Greece--is not likely to be accomplished.

According to available reports, improvement of the British offers which were submitted last week and which were considered insufficient by the Greek side, consist of:

A 1.5 billion drachma decrease in the cost of the two thermoelectric units.
An increase of the annual offer of coal from 1.5 million tons to 2 million tons.
An offer of 2 millions tons of oil per year.

Nott

Bipartite Greek-British trade will benefit by Greece's accession to the European communities, stressed the British Secretary for Trade John Nott in his address to the Greek-British Chamber of Commerce. Nott underlined that interest is not confined exclusively to joint investments or to the sale of British products to Greece, but also to a joint undertaking of projects in Third World countries.

Nott Describes UK's Goals

[Text] At 1000 today, Prime Minister Rallis received British Secretary of State for Trade John Nott at the Political Office and discussed matters of mutual interest to the two countries. This morning, Nott visited the Akropolis. During a press conference he held at noon today, Mr Nott referred to the purpose of his visit to Greece. He said his visit is aimed at continuing the talks which Prime Minister Thatcher had during her recent official visit to Greece. He specifically referred to three goals: meetings with ministers, efforts to improve trade between the two countries, and promotion of British exports.

"There are," he said, "12 development and other public projects for which there is British interest, such as, the Athens metro, the air terminal and the modernization of Greek railways. I also discussed defense matters. As stated, the two countries will control 60 percent of the European Community's merchant fleet and for this reason a specialist will come here from Great Britain for discussions. Greek exports to Britain in wines, fruit and other Mediterranean agriculture products will increase after Greece's accession to the Community. Accession will also open up possibilities for joint undertaking of projects in countries of the Third World."

FLORAKIS MEETS WITH RALLIS TO DISCUSS 'CRITICAL SITUATION'

[Text] The KKE [Exterior] Central Committee secretary general, Comrade Kharilaos Florakis, visited Prime Minister Rallis yesterday morning at the Political Office. The meeting took place upon the initiative of the party. Comrade Florakis asked the prime minister to tell him exactly what everyone is talking about: That the country is at a critical stage and is facing a dangerous situation. In the view of the KKE, Comrade Florakis stressed, the situation has reached such a point that the only national patriotic solition is a categorical "No" to the issues of NATO and the U.S. bases. So that the "No" can have real content and so that the difficulties which will emerge from it can be dealt with, the "No" will have to be accompanied by specific changes in the entire orientation of the country, both in foreign policy and in the confrontation of internal economic and social problems.

At this point, Comrade Florakis stressed that substantive increases in the working people's wages and their readjustment on the basis of the cost of living index; establishment of the simple proportional system as the permanent electoral system; recognition of the national resistance [against the Nazis during World War II]; and the right of repatriation for political refugees, are significant factors in rallying the patriotic forces and an indispensable prerequisite for confronting any kind of foreign design, pressure or extortion.

RALLIS SENDS 'WARNING' LETTER TO CARTER ON NATO, BASES

AT101459 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 10 Oct 80 pp 1,13

[By contributor Andonis Kalamaras]

[Text] Through a letter from Rallis to Carter, Athens has warned Washington that the countdown has begun for Greek-U.S. relations of friendship and cooperation, and that there is a complete identity of views between the people and the political leadership in the irrevocable decision to reject any kind of pressure for limitation of Greek rights.

These warnings, which attest to the dramatic tension which Greek-U.S. relations have undergone over the last 15 days, were made by Greek Prime Minister G. Rallis in a personal letter to U.S. President Carter. According to assessments and reports from sources close to the U.S. President, Carter will reply to the Rallis letter by mid-October.

The text of Rallis' letter to the U.S. President--which leader of the official opposition A. Papandreou certainly must have been apprised of during his last meeting with the prime minister--makes it clear that, for Athens, "the cup has overflowed" and that it is already examining ways of defending Greek rights and interests outside the traditional forms. After all, this is what Stratos and Boutos explained in the contacts they had in the U.S. capital with U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher and U.S. Department of State Under Secretary Nimetz--correspondingly--when pertinent questions were put to them.

The prime minister's letter also makes it clear that official Athens even knows from where and who has originated the "uneasiness" that is expressed in Washington "in a friendly manner"--literally, in passing--concerning a "disaster for Greece." Perhaps for this reason, Rallis stresses in his letter to Carter that: "The presence of military bases inside a hostile or inhospitable environment does not, in the long term, serve the true interests of the state represented by the bases...."

In his long letter to Carter, Rallis also expresses the need to stress to the U.S. President--finally deleting the unacceptable argument about the upcoming Greek elections--that he will not find a "cooperative" Greek Government.

"Greece," Rallis writes, "Does not intend to pay, as a price for return to NATO, the creation of a new state of affairs regarding operational control of the Aegean...."

"No Greek Government intends to pay this price because no Greek Government intends to accept a limitation of national rights...." [last two words in English]

Again putting forth the true basis of the Aegean problem, the letter notes that no Greek Government "intends to betray the country's responsibilities in the Aegean area which have been recognized within the NATO framework." The prime minister's letter continues by stressing to the U.S. President that, in interstate relations among democratic countries, people are of greater significance than governments which come and go.

"...Any deviation", Rallis writes. "from this line (this is, protection of national rights) will be unacceptable not only to the current government but to all of the Greek people.... Greek public opinion could tolerate the presence of U.S. bases only within the strict framework of the Atlantic Alliance....

"...My personal responsibility is to express the will of the Greek people whose elected leader I am.... I base my strength solely on the will of the Greek democratic people to whom I shall never lie. I opt to face the possibility of paying any political cost rather than appear inconsistent with the common feeling of the Greek people...."

The long, four-page letter of the prime minister makes two final notes: The first makes it clear that the United States is missing the train of Greek-U.S. friendship and cooperation: "Time," Rallis writes, "is fast running short [preceding five quoted words printed in English] for the solution of the twin issue of return and the bases. My government's position does not aim to serve interests but to protect and guarantee national Greek rights...."

The second note is a recommendation that pressure be exerted on Turkey which is favored by both the United States and NATO:

"Turkey", concludes the letter, "has very many reasons to feel grateful toward the United States and NATO. A unique opportunity presents itself to the current Turkish Government to prove in practical terms its promises concerning loyalty to the alliance...."

Rallis Decries Letter Release

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Y. Rallis has sent a letter to President Carter [saying] that time is running short for the settlement of the NATO and bases issues. Both Y. Rallis and Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis have made statements that have confirmed the relevant report that was published yesterday in ELEVTHEROTIRIA. At the same time, the prime minister cautioned that the desire to inform the public should not exceed the limits of defense of national interests, and indirectly criticized the manner in which the relevant report was published.

The prime minister's statement follows: "I will not bother to confirm or deny everything that was published in a certain evening newspaper concerning my communication with the President of the United States because this report puts forth for discussion a major issue; this is what principally must cause concern among all people in our country's public life, especially journalists.

"The question is: Can the desire to inform the public exceed the clear limits set by the need to defend national interests?

"I myself am asking this critical question because I think it is well known how hard I have struggled for democracy and for freedom of the press and how much I dislike the creation of separations between the government and public opinion.

"Unfortunately, in this instance--the evening newspaper's report--proper care was not taken.

"Consequently I request the press--which has always responded to everything that concerns national interest--to take into consideration my position."

The statement by the foreign minister follows:

"It is true that I delivered a letter to Muskie from the prime ministers. I delivered the letter on the day we met. The ELEVTHEROTIPIA text is partially correct."

MINISTER VISITS IRELAND--Next week, Minister of Agriculture Kanellopoulos will pay a 5-day visit to Ireland at the invitation of his Irish counterpart. The program of Kanellopoulos' visit includes an exchange of views on common agricultural policy and on bilateral issues that concern the agricultural sector. GOVERNMENT REPORTS FURTHER ON TURKISH AIRLINES HIJACKING

[Excerpts] The crew and passengers of the Turkish Airlines Boeing-727 plane, which was hijacked during its Munich-Istanbul-Ankara flight to Diyarbakir by four terrorists, were rescued following a successful operation launched early this morning. The wounded terrorists were captured and seven passengers were wounded by terrorists during the operation.

The Army VII Corps and Diyarbakir, Hakkari, Mardin, Siirt, Irfa and Van Martial Law Command issued a statement concerning the hijacking of the "Diyarbakir" passenger jet plane. The statement is as follows:

The "Diyarbakir" plane, on flight No 890, which left Istanbul for Ankara at 1725 on 13 October 1980 with 149 passengers, was hijacked by Hasan Guneser, Yilmaz Yalciner, Omer Yorulmaz and Medhi Yatsikale, 30 minutes after its takeoff. The pilots, threatened at gunpoint, were told to head for Tehran but the plane landed in Diyarbakir after the pilots informed the terrorists that the Tehran airport was closed due to the war. The command took the necessary security measures after assessing in advance that the plane had been hijacked and could land in Diyarbakir.

Contact was established with the anarchists from the time the plane landed in Diyarbakir at 1930. The anarchists demanded to have the plane refueled and then leave for Tehran after releasing the passengers. This demand was not accepted. They were warned from 1930 until 0530 to terminate their action, and when they refused to comply an operation was launched in which the plane was broken into and the anarchists were captured together with their two guns. Passengers Fatih Ozturk, Sener Arda, Murat Tiryaki, (Mavlin) Kazim, (Shekerton)--a U.S. citizen--and (Katanes Andrea) and hostess Melike Goker were wounded by shots fired by the terrorists during the operation. The condition of the wounded persons is satisfactory. Meanwhile, Coskun Aral who assisted the anarchists during the operation and who was being sought, has also been captured.

The crew and passengers, who were rescued following the successful operation, are being taken from Diyarbakir to Ankara on a plane which took off at 1150. It was reported that some of the passengers who were wounded by the terrorists are also on board the plane, which is expected to land at Esenboga Airport in Ankara at any moment.

TURKMEN LEAVES FOR COUNCIL OF EUROPE MEETINGS IN STRASBOURG

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has departed for Strasbourg to attend the Ministerial Committee meetings of the Council of Europe. In a statement at Esenboga Airport before his departure, Turkmen said Turkey attaches great importance to membership in the Council of Europe and that relations with the Council will be maintained bearing in mind the desire and determination to return to democracy. Noting that he will explain the recent developments in Turkey at the Council of Europe meetings in Strasbourg, Turkmen added that he will also take steps aimed at eliminating the visa requirements imposed by European countries on Turkish citizens. Turkmen recalled that the visa requirement was contrary to the 1957 agreement on freedom of travel and to the Council of Europe Assembly decisions. Turkmen said that these decisions would be the basis of his steps. In reply to a question, Turkmen said that for the time being it was out of the question for Turkey to impose visa requirements on the citizens of countries which imposed visa requirements on Turkish citizens.

Balanced cooperation and development in Europe, preliminary preparations in connection with the Madrid conference on European security and cooperation and the elimination of differences among Council member countries will be discussed at the Ministerial Committee meetings in Strasbourg. The foreign ministers of 21 European countries will be participating at the Ministerial Committee meetings.

ARMY HOLDS EXERCISE IN SOUTHEAST ANATOLIA

Gen Evren Observes Maneuvers

TA141125 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Text] The Gen Fazil Bilge-80 exercise was held in Mardin's Mazidagi District. The commander of the 2d Army, Gen Bedrettin Demirel, said that the exercise aims to improve the units' training and fighting capacity. In his statement, Army VII Corps Commander Lt Gen Kemal Yamak said that certain social service will be rendered to the people in the region during the exercise and that the citizens' confidence in the armed forces will thus be renewed by allowing them to get acquainted with the army.

According to reports by Tevfik Fikret Dincer and Atila Bestecioglu from the Turkish Radio and Television News Center, the exercise began with an attack by symbolic enemy forces. Enemy forces seized certain significant regions and landed forces by air behind friendly forces in order to join with their forces at the front. However, this landing operation was foiled by the attack of friendly forces' armored units. The exercise, in which ranks, vehicles, helicopters and planes participated, ended with the destruction of the symbolic enemy forces following the general attack conducted by the friendly forces.

Head of State Gen Kenan Evren, who observed the exercise, congratulated the commanders.

Evren Remarks in Diyarbakir

[Speech by Head of State Gen Kenan Evren in Diyarbakir on 14 October. Site of speech, occasion not given--recorded]

[Text] Dear friends: We are determined to prevent terror and anarchy in the country. We have courageously approved the death sentences passed by the courts in order to express our determination. We did not make this decision. These decisions were made by independent courts and before the coup. Since we believe in and trust our judges, it is our duty to approve their decisions. We do not enjoy killing people. Yes, we are in uniform and we are soldiers, but we kill only in war. With the exception of evil persons, no one enjoys killing people in time of peace. However, these persons were mercilessly killing innocent people walking the streets and sitting in coffee houses. If we do not hang these evil persons whom are we to hang? They killed innocent people. However, some people expect us not to approve sentences passed by the courts. This is difficult to understand. As I stated earlier, we will not retire from our duty before we defeat anarchy, before we cleanse this heavenly country. If we retire from this duty, this nation will damn us. If all our citizens help us in capturing these individuals and help us during their trials, then our duty will be facilitated and accomplished in a very short time. Otherwise, we will need a long time. Therefore, I ask and expect the entire Turkish people to perform their duties as citizens and to help us in our struggle against a handful of anarchists.

Dear citizens of Diyarbakir: The major aim of these bandits was to frighten the citizens, to force them to ingore the bandits' activities and, thus, continue their activities. Their aim was to tire citizens of this regime, of this republican regime. That was their aim. The citizen would have reached a point at which he would have been forced to say "damn this republican system, let us walk the streets in peace and let us work in peace." Their aim was to make the people say this. Therefore, we should raise our children to live not only for themselves but also for the nation. We should teach them to sacrifice their blood for this nation. The republic should be guarded by loyal citizens. These loyal guards are the Turkish youths to whom Ataturk has entrusted the republic. If the Turkish youth safeguards the republic, no one can destroy the system.

Turkish youth: do not let anyone abuse you. Give the necessary reply to those who hand you arms. Their aim is to use you as tools and to establish a dictatorship--casting you aside once their goal is attained. You should be aware of this fact. You are being provoked under the guise of the republic and freedom. They want to use your brains and youthful energy. Do not be fooled by them.

Further on Evren Remarks

[Excerpts] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren said today that the armed forces will not retire from their duty without having defeated anarchy. General Evren said: If we retire this nation will damn us.

General Evren addressed the people of Diyarbakir after observing the Gen Fazil Bilge-80 exericse. Noting that in his previous addresses he had explained the aim of the 12 September operation, General Evren said: This operation was not carried out as a result of an order given by a five-man delegation from the chief of staff. The decision on the 12 September operation was not made by five persons. This decision was made by the nation. This decision was made by all the colleagues within the Armed Forces Command. We pressed the button only for its execution because our citizens had for a time [words indistinct] and we could no longer face our citizens. There was no other way out. We were forced to launch the 12 September operation in order to prevent the division of the nation, fraternal strife and civil war. General Evren said that before the 12 September operation, peace and tranquility did not exist in the country, citizens were restless, going out at night had become an impossibility and cities and districts were divided. Evren continued: How were we to defend ourselves against foreign attacks when we were divided from within? Whenever a nation becomes weaker and whenever fraternal strife emerges, foreign threats become imminent. Look around and you will understand what I mean.

General Evren recalled that certain persons constantly talk about full independence and added that the concept of full independence did not mean that a country should not join an alliance. Recalling that Ataturk had launched the national struggle with the slogan of full independence, General Evren continued: Ataturk made Turkey fully independent. However, he established the Balkan alliance and the Saadabad alliance. Joining an alliance does not mean selling the country. Therefore, we have joined NATO for our defense and in accordance with our interests. Various ill-intentioned persons are continuously crying out that Turkey has been sold out to NATO. Their aim is different. Their aim is to cause Turkey to withdraw from NATO and to become isolated.

In his address in Diyarbakir, General Evren said that parents should protect their children. Noting that the literacy campaign should again be launched, General Evren said sectarianism should be avoided in religion. Noting that our religion did not permit sectarianism, Evren added: Citizens, embrace and love one another irrespective of the sect to which you belong. This nation belongs to all of you. We are the children of the same religion. Our religion does not permit rancor. We do not begrudge anyone.

We do not speak against anyone. Our religion is forgiving. However, it is forgiving for those who deserve it. Therefore, we do not ask for a settlement of accounts for deeds committed before us [presumably 12 September]. The accounting of these deeds is to be done at the courts. We do not oppose arrests issued by the courts. There is a saying, "a finger cut by justice does not hurt." Then let us [word indistinct] the decisions of the courts.

General Evren then commented on the economic situation in Turkey. Noting that Turkey--together with other countries--was crushed under extensive economic difficulties, Evren said that frugality in all fields was the answer to the economic crisis. Requesting that Turkish products be used and that production and exports be increased, Evren said: A nation cannot develop by having continuous debts.

General Evren then referred to past military interventions in Turkey. Evren said that the 27 May, 1960, operation was launched with good intentions but it appears that it was launched in favor of a certain class. He added that the new constitution did not suit the requirements of the nation. Noting that developments leading to 12 March 1971 were caused by loopholes in the constitution not being closed against the ill-intentioned, Evren said that the same doors and loopholes had been left open on 12 March as well. Noting that if the same mistakes are committed once more, the nation will no longer tolerate such interventions, Evren continued: Therefore, in order not to return to the previous conditions, we say that we will close all doors and then leave in order to prevent future assemblies from following faulty paths. General Evren and the commanders then left Diyarbakir for Ankara.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL AMENDS LAW ON CARRYING WEAPONS

[Text] The National Security Council met today under Head of State Gen Kenan Evren. A bill amending law No 6136 concerning permits for carrying firearms, knives and other instruments was ratified by the Council. According to the new law, all persons--including former legislators--with a license for carrying firearms are required to report to the proper authorities within 30 days to renew their permits. The law stipulates the conditions under which the licenses will be renewed. Persons whose permits are not renewed will turn in their firearms to martial law commands or other civilian or military authorities. The owners of these firearms will be compensated. Those holding sabres and other weapons authorized by the state and inherited by the family will be exempt from this requirement.

The Council also adopted a law regulating the appointment of a trustee for trade unions, federations and confederations that have been banned. These trustees, to be appointed by the local labor courts, will be authorized to make necessary payments like social insurance fees, taxes as well as other payments indicated in the collective wage contracts signed by these trade unions. Another law passed by the Council concerns the ratification of the agreement between Turkey and the United States for the implementation of court sentences. Another bill amending the agreement between Turkey and Belgium on Social Security issues was also ratified during the Council meeting.

KREISKY CLARIFIES HIS POSITION VIS-A-VIS PLO

[Report by "H.N.": "Kreisky and PLO: Gap Bridged"]

[Summary] A meeting between Chancellor Kreisky and PLO chief Yasir 'Arafat's special delegate Sartawy, who had come to Vienna from Paris, quickly eliminated the ill feeling that had developed between the chancellor and the PLO during Kreisky's trip to Jordan. "No, there is no change in Bruno Kreisky's position," Sartawy said. According to him, Bruno Kreisky is again "the pioneer who has made historical contributions toward the recognition of Palestinian rights."

The ill feeling between the PLO and the chancellor had been caused by reports that Kreisky regarded a--temporary--return of the Israeli-occupied territories to Jordan as feasible. "In his talk with Arafat's representative Kreisky reiterated his former position: First, no Middle East peace without the Palestinians: second, only the Palestinians themselves must choose their negotiating delegation."

In his talk with KURIER after the meeting with Kreisky at the chancellory, PLO Emissary Sartawy declared that "the dynamics of his ideas are fascinating." "However, the idea of returning the occupied West Bank some day to Jordan's Husayn rather than to the PLO, Sartawy says, is 'merely an attempt to escape for the Israeli Labor Party, which hopes to incite Palestinians and Jordanians against one another.' But the PLO and King Husayn are 'Siamese twins, destined to organize their life together in the best possible way.'"

PRESIDENT HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE ON ELECTION RESULTS

LD142152 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Text] President Ramalho Eanes held a news conference in Belem Palace today at which he touched on wide-ranging matters of national politics, with the results of the 5 October parliamentary elections being, as expected, the dominant topic.

In his view, he said, the election results could have stabilizing and clarifying effects, but he counseled that the first concern of those in power should be to avoid radicalized attitudes if they expect to rule in peace and security.

He said that the central forces of Portuguese society should attempt to bring about a rapprochement among themselves in a concerted effort to tackle the economic and political crises at both domestic and international levels.

The president said he was not surprised at the outcome of the 5 October elections as the outcome reflected the hopes and expectations being displayed by the Portuguese people. It was precisely for this reason, Eanes stressed, that the strengthened majority meant that the government had greater responsibility and at the same time greater ability toward fulfilling its expectations and meeting the hopes of the (?voters).

On the government's decision not to submit its resignation, General Eanes said that it could be possible that by so doing the government wants to show its lack of political confidence in the president of the republic, but that as far he was concerned it is a curious inversion of the rules and devoid of any useful purpose. According to Ramalho Eanes, in strictly constituional terms the government will not be able to avoid submitting its program to parliament at the appropriate time, since its previous program is valid only to the end of current legislature. [passage indistinct]

Ramalho Eanes reaffirmed the need to bring about a political situation of democratic security, trust, freedom and technical capacity deserving of international support. Toward this end, General Eanes said he did not agree with the political aims of those who want total concentration of powers, thus nullifying the indispensable independence among the various organs of sovereignty.

'NEUTRAL' DIPLOMATS CONFER, VIEW DETENTE, MADRID

[Andreas Unterberger report: "Neutrals: Detente Endangered; Little Hope for Madrid Meeting"]

[Summary] Laxenburg--At the invitation of the Austrian Institute for International Politics, diplomats from Yugoslavia, Sweden, Finland, Switzerland and Austria analyzed detente at a meeting in Laxenburg, near Vienna, which ended on 10 October. They arrived at the conclusion that, as an Austrian participant put it, "detente is in the deep freeze, and it is not certain whether it will ever be consumable again."

All participants agreed that there is little reason for optimism regarding success of the Madrid meeting. "The Finnish participants sharply criticized indications of disintegration among the 'like-minded countries,' that group of industrialized countries--including Austria--which in the past particularly supported the interests of the developing countries. They claimed that in the past 2 years these countries had no longer been able to work out any joint positions."

FOREIGN MINISTERS TO MEET 7 NOV ON NORTH-SOUTH ISSUES

AU141821 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 14 Oct 80 p 5

[AZ report: "Pahr: International Foreign Ministers Meeting in Vienna"]

[Summary] Vienna--At the invitation of Mexican President Lopez Portillo and Chancellor Kreisky, the foreign ministers of 10 countries--Algeria, FRG, France, India, Yugoslavia, Canada, Mexico, Nigeria, Austria and Sweden--will meet in Vienna on 7 November under the chairmanship of Kreisky to prepare the summit meeting of state and government chiefs on North-South problems to be held in Mexico in the first half of 1981. The initiator of this summit meeting, Socialist International President Willy Brandt, head of the "Brandt Commission," will also attend. This was announced by Austrian Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr at a press conference in Vienna on 13 October. On the same occasion, he stated that he would leave by the end of this week for official visits to Japan, Indonesia and Malaysia. In addition to political talks economic negotiations are also envisaged. Pahr will be accompanied by a large economic delegation.

Commenting on the Madrid preparatory conference, Pahr said that it was disappointing and if things went on like this it would be a bad omen for the conference. However, he said, he still intended to attend the general debate of the Madrid conference. He added that he would not go to Madrid only if the impression prevailed that the conference would be unsuccessful.

CABINET DISCUSSES INTER-GERMAN RELATIONS

[Text] Bonn, 15 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government sees the recent demarcation policy on the part of the GDR as a serious setback to inter-German relations but nevertheless intends to continue its efforts toward further normalizing and improving the relationship between the two German states in the interests of the people. According to government circles, this was the outcome of the several hours of talks in the Federal Cabinet today on the drastic increase in the minimum money exchange requirements for visitors to the GDR from the West and on SED leader Erich Honecker's speech on Monday on principles of inter-German policy. The cabinet apparently did not decide on any concrete measures in response to the tougher policy in inter-German relations adopted by the GDR.

Following the cabinet session, chaired by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling said that there is no cause at present for the Federal Government to negotiate with the GDR on the interest-free overdraft credit in trade with the GDR on the major projects proposed by the GDR. These projects include the electrification, wanted by the GDR, of the five railway lines which run through its territory between federal territory and West Berlin.

Boelling reaffirmed the Federal Government's goal that the GDR rescind the increase in the minimum money exchange requirements for visitors to a uniform DM25 per person which went into effect on Monday. Speculation that there would be a flat rate for these exchange requirements, in other words that they would be met as a flat-rate payment by the Federal Government to the GDR, are, according to Boelling, "not topical."

According to Boelling, the cabinet did not expressly discuss Honecker's demands for recognition by Bonn of an individual GDR state citizenship and the conversion of the two German states' permanent missions into embassies. The government spokesman had already rejected these demands yesterday as unacceptable. After the cabinet meeting, he stressed that a modification of the Basic Treaty with the GDR, which would be necessary to meet such demands, would not be considered by the Federal Government.

'Sanctions' Rejected

[Excerpts] Bonn (DPA)--The Federal Government will not respond to the recent GDR demarcation moves with demarcation moves and will not be driven into a "policy of pinpricks." But Bonn will make the proposed negotiations on inter-German trade credits and major transport and energy projects, suggested by the GDR, dependent on the GDR's "correctiong" its present policy. The government rejects sanctions as a political instrument for influencing the GDR.

This is the result of a Bonn cabinet meeting today, lasting several hours, which discussed the hardening in the relations of both German states after the near doubling of the minimum money exchange rates for Western visitors to the GDR and the harsh accusations and demands made by SED chief Erich Honecker in his policy speech on Monday. According to Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who had interrupted a brief holiday at Boppard in the Rhineland to chair the cabinet meeting, told his ministers that the government would infringe the principle of preserving and strengthening the unity of the nation and would be acting against the interests of the people if it were to meet the GDR's policy of demarcation with demarcation.

Boelling told the press that the government would continue "to act, aware of its special responsibility for the pursuit of detente in Europe, and not be pushed into a policy of pinpricks." He affirmed Bonn's objective of getting the GDR to reverse the increase in the money exchange.

For the time being Bonn sees no reason to negotiate with the GDR about the "swing" [interest-free credit margin in inter-German trade] whose continuation is due to be settled at the beginning of 1981, and on major projects. The GDR has proposed the electrification of five railroad lines from the Federal Republic to Berlin with Bonn participation, as well as the construction of a lignite-fired power station in the GDR to supply power to West Berlin. These are multimillion [mark] projects.

In reply to questions about Bonn's terms for the negotiations with the GDR, Boelling intimated that there was an "overall connection" with East Berlin's demarcation policy, specifically the raising of the money exchange rate. He said that the cabinet had not made Bonn's readiness for negotiations directly dependent on a reversal of the GDR step. Boelling said that Bonn expected the GDR to make "corrections" and to return to the underlying political basis of their dealings. The GDR would have to create the preconditions for promising negotiations and Bonn would have to examine in due course whether these conditions existed.

According to Boelling, the cabinet had not mooted the idea of sanctions. As a rule, sanctions were a poor instrument of politics. Bonn's attitude is not a sign of weakness, Boelling said. However, he said Bonn does possess instruments for influencing the GDR and referred to the cabinet's intention to raise East Berlin's "arbitary measures" at the CSCE review conference in Madrid. The cabinet had endorsed the chancellor's view since the GDR move had dealt a heavy blow at detente and put a considerable strain on inter-German relations.

The cabinet had rejected as not objective Honecker's charges that Bonn had interfered in Poland's internal affairs and had emphasized its policy of noninterference and strict restraint. The cabinet had described the SED chief's criticism of the Western alliance as unhelpful to the U.S. talks on arms control with the Soviet Union which are due to open in Geneva.

Egon Franke, minister of inner-German relations, and Gunter Huonker, minister of state in the chancellor's office, briefed the leaders of all three parliamentary parties about the cabinet discussions. The briefing was attended by Philipp Jenninger and Paul Roehner for the CDU/CSU and by Horst Ehmke (SPD) and Hans-Guenter Hoppe (FDP) for the coalition.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON FRG-GDR RELATIONS

Huonker Interview

DW151124 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1210 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Correspondent Gruendler interview with Gunter Huonker, minister of state in the chancellor's office, in Bonn--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] In Gera yesterday Erich Honecker attacked the chancellor personally, calling him a whip for the NATO missile decisions. Have the relations between Chancellor Schmidt and State Council Chairman Honecker thus been severed?

[Answer] It goes without saying that we are taking the remarks by the chairman of the GDR State Council seriously. In part he used harsh phrases, but I would not want to say that relations have thereby been severed. If the analysis is correct that this speech is linked with the policy of delimitation which, in turn, at least to a considerable part is attributable to the developments in Eastern Europe [interviewer interrupts]

[Question] You mean Poland?

[Answer] Yes, then it is necessary to view this speech against that background, and though harsh as some phrases may be, I warn against dramatizing relations between the two German states unnecessarily.

[Question] But Honecker again demanded the recognition of a GDR citizenship by the Federal Government. Only then are alleviations for travel possible, he said. For him to bring up the question again means, doesn't it, that he does not, at least not for the time being, desire any progress in inter-German normalization?

[Answer] I suppose that the GDR state leadership is aware that we have an unequivocal constitutional position from which we just cannot deviate. It is my impression that as far as the GDR is concerned the further development of inter-German relations is only of secondary significance in the face of other things.

[Question] But basically Honecker is calling the whole Basic Treaty between the two German states into question when he raises the demand, as he did in Gera, to convert the permanent missions into embassies. Does he intend to repudiate the Basic Treaty?

[Answer] It is absolutely clear after those long negotiations that the Basic Treaty envisages that no ambassadors will be exchanged between the two German states and that no embassies will be set up. Establishing permanent missions was instead preferred. This is the way it should remain. I assume that the other sides knows that this demand cannot be fulfilled. The fact that the other side has made this demand again so unequivocally along with bringing up the status problem and has linked it with possible future improvements in relations confirms my assumption that this is really a phase during which the GDR will embark on delimitation. I must assume that progress in relations is not very likely in the foreseeable future.

[Question] The Federal Cabinet will meet tomorrow. The federal chancellor will interrupt his vacation and head the cabinet session himself. Will countermeasures be decided on tomorrow? Will countermeasures be discussed?

[Answer] It still must be decided whether the federal chancellor will interrupt his vacation. Without wanting to anticipate the discussions of the Federal Cabinet tomorrow, I cannot imagine that decisions or reprisals will be made tomorrow. One should not react hastily. One must take a most careful analysis of how to react to the increase in the minimum currency exchange amount. We should be careful--and therefore I regret that some people make very hasty and its seems to me thoughtless statements--we should watch out so as not to follow a policy of needling, which would not lead to any progress in matters of the minimum currency exchange amount, and which could possibly hurt the citizens here and over there.

[Question] What else can the Federal Government do?

[Answer] I believe that the right thing to do would be to discuss the swing agreement in the forthcoming negotiations in the coming months. You know that the swing agreement is an agreement on overdrawing credits, an agreement that will expire late next year. I believe that the increase in the minimum exchange amount must be discussed with the other side in the course of forthcoming negotiations within the framework of the entire German policy and the policy toward the East.

Boelling Remarks

DW151213 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1110 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Reporter Kepper interview with State Secretary Klaus Boelling, chief of the Federal Government's press and information office; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Boelling, the GDR State Council chairman is making unacceptable demands--recognition of GDR citizenship, the transformation of permanent missions into embassies--and he knows that these demands are unacceptable. Has Honecker slammed the door?

[Answer] At any rate, Mr Kepper, it cannot be ignored that the most important man in the German Democratic Republic has given a speech, for reasons we may discuss in the course of this interview, a speech that makes some sort of a final point with regard to the GDR's interest in a permanent improvement of relations with the Federal Republic of Germany. You have pointed out already that the many demands he has voiced are unacceptable for us. He knows that. For him to voice them anyway means that he is going on the assumption that it seems to be impossible to achieve appreciable progress in efforts aimed at normalization. We believe that the reasons for this are not to be found in inter-German relations, just as inter-German reasons can hardly be cited to justify the arbitrary measures concerning the mandatory minimum currency exchange amount.

[Question] Honecker is not content with voicing unacceptable demands. For the first time in a long time there was a passage in Honecker's speech that can be only considered a personal attack on the federal chancellor. Honecker speaks of the inventor and whip of the Brussels missile decision--as he literally put it. Isn't the GDR State Council chairman intentionally creating a deep personal antagonism?

[Answer] He will at least have to take into account that we in the Federal Republic will consider him a man who is not in a position to carry out his own statements, such as those recently in Leipzig, carry them out and give them credibility through practical action. At the meeting between the federal chancellor and the State Council chairman in Belgrade on the occasion of the memorial service for Marshal Tito it was clear that it would serve the interests of both German states if each government contributed its share toward stabilizing the positive effects of detente policy following the CSCE conference in Helsinki, and that we--both German states--ought to try to prevent dangerous developments and bring influence to bear on the big powers. That was a positive perspective for all European states, not only for the Germans in the GDR and in the Federal Republic of Germany. It is hard to imagine that this correct analysis by State Council Chairman Honecker as well as the correct consequences he was prepared to draw from it should now be incorrect. So there must be factors outside the GDR that are bringing influence to bear on him.

[Question] Since you have not said so yourself, Mr Boelling, I will add that this change in the GRD's attitude is certainly connected with developments in Poland, which brings me to the following question: Do you see a basic change of course for the GDR, or is it maybe just a temporary matter?

[Answer] I do not want to make a premature judgment, but I do want to remark in connection with your question, Mr Kepper, that some people among the basic opponents of our German policy will express their maliciousness, claiming that it is obvious now that this form of inter-German policy--the policy of small steps, or continuing repeated efforts, of counting on setbacks--that this policy has failed. That is of course absurd. I am therefore not prepared to say that this was a final point, but the horizon for further progress in inter-German policy has been very much narrowed down. But I believe that we cannot stop talking to each other following this speech and its negative effect.

[Answer] I have already told the Bonn press that we, as the English expression puts it, are pursuing business as usual; that is to say, for us to pretend that nothing has happened, as though all this can be viewed calmly in a few days, is out of the question. The chancellor said in Berlin that we cannot tolerate this arbitrary measure by the GDR. What does this mean? It means that we must make it impressively clear to the other side, first, that this arbitrary measure which premarily affects older people must be restricted and that, secondly, the policy of improving relations between the two German states stands but few chances to exist if the other side--just look at the speech by Mr Honecker in Gera--raises demands which any citizen in our country as well as in the GDR in bound to assume are raised for the sole purpose of leading, first of all, to a stagnation in the necessary efforts for improvements for the people.

[Question] Mr Honecker himself has placed inter-German relations into an international framework; he mentioned Poland, and he mentioned the East-West relationship. Do you see a danger that the present hardening between Bonn and East Berlin might entail consequences for the entire East-West policy?

[Answer] The Federal Government, Mr Kepper, will definitely try to prevent such a development. Since 1975, even since the European governments and the United States Government signed the Final Act of Helsinki--an act to which the GDR, too, set its signature--we have achieved quite a lot in the relationship between the two German states. Until that time things were much worse than they have been recently. We must not abandon this lightly. We have always been aware that the fulfillment of the Basic Treaty is comparable to the patient, persistent drilling of a thick board, as a German scholar once wrote in the twenties. For patriotic reasons we cannot feel relieved of the duty to keep drilling in this thick board. We are committed to making every effort to help ensure the measures of human communication, human contacts which we have achieved to date with the GDR, even if this may be very difficult to do for the foreseeable future. So, I advise against any panicky reaction, I advise against any emotional reaction. We must keep a cool head. We are aware that this speech is a bad omen for the near future, we must not succumb to resignation for this reason.

SPD's Wehner Opinion

[Text] Bonn, 15 Oct (DPA)--SPD parliamentary group leader Herbert Wehner has cautioned against forecasting a new ice age or an end to detente in view of the GDR's demarcation policy and the effects of the events in the Eastern camp on East-West relations. "Anyone pursuing a realistic policy of detente must be able to take setbacks in his stride and continue to pursue his own goals, perhaps with gritted teeth but unwaveringly," Wehner wrote in an article for the Munich ABENDZEITUNG and Cologne EXPRESS, prereleased today. Anyone who now reacts with the ideological stridency of the marketplace and with muscle-flexing is unconsciously furthering the cause of the opponents to detente on the other side.

Wehner called the raising of the minimum money exchange requirements for Western visitors to the GDR inhuman and hostile to detente. If the Eastern part of the German fatherland was to be isolated from visitors for fear of free discussion, "this is unacceptable to us." Detente is unthinkable without an easing of conditions for people in real terms and pointless without the opportunity for human contacts. He placed the GDR measure within the greater context of world political tensions and said that the Germans immediately feel the inhuman consequences of worldwide crisis. Political responsibility does not, however, mean persisting in gloomy concern but working resolutely and firmly with the aim of getting the other side to uphold treaties and revoke inhuman measures which are contrary to detente.

The SPD politician, referring to the situation in Poland, drew attention to the East European citizens' growing desire for freedom. He wrote: "Even if these difficulties cause the leaders in the Eastern camp to take steps which are not only inhuman but could also be politically fateful, we should not let ourselves be led astray into equal shortsightedness on our part by backing demarcation, economic war or intensifying the arms drive."

Stobbe Call for Restraint

[Text] Bonn, 15 Oct (DPA)--Berlin's Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe warned the Federal Government against responding to the GDR Government's increase in the minimum money exchange requirement with economic sanctions.

Stobbe said on Deutschlandfunk today that the remarks by SED leader Erich Honecker in Gera had shown that he was accepting financial and economic disadvantages in favor of a policy of toughness towards the GDR population. Stobbe recommended the Federal Government to hold on to what there was and avoid further cracks in mutual relations.

PAPERS VIEW MOTIVES, CONSEQUENCES OF GDR MOVES

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Editorial

[Ernst-Otto Meatzke editorial: "Broken Modus Vivendi"]

[Text] Anybody who has 2 decades stored away in his memory will recall the familiar Western phrase of explanation for the construction of the Berlin Wall in August 1961: Without it the GDR would have "run dry." A similarly summarizing phrase to be sought for the political change now occurring, a change which will not be secondary in significance to the construction of the Wall, namely, the communist power in Europe beyond the Elbe River would otherwise have "crumbled away." This is why the socialist camp is being delimited from the outside--above all its advance post between the Elbe and Oder rivers. The speeches by the GDR party chief of 6 and 14 October [as published] indicate that the throttling of inter-German tourist travel by fiscal means is but an initial "measure", some more will follow, and sham justifications have already been prepared.

Western experts are currently waging a learned dispute on whether the events in Poland, which since the summer have reduced the respect for the Soviet Union in the generally anti-Russian intermediate Europe [zwischeneuropa], are the causes of the change of course or whether this change was envisaged long ago. Perhaps the Polish events merely confirmed its urgency, and possibly in the Soviet leadership institutions the warners of a deterioration of power and a loss of freedom of action as a consequence of relaxations and openings have gained adequate wind for their sails with the argument of the Polish strikes. In any event, the change has come. In the German field in which it was first manifested nothing can be as it was prior to election Sunday in the Federal Republic, which was prudently picked in Moscow as the suitable moment for the break. Obviously it was no longer justifiable to wait another month for the U.S. election day.

Granted, the communist course of action is very careful in approaching confrontation, the old vocabulary of "good neighborliness" and similar words are being used as before. Yet, all this is in the form of the subjunctive and the conditional, as it were. The decision for harsh delimitation is clear, it enjoys priority henceforth. It is obvious that they are willing to accept even serious disadvantages, especially in the economic field. What seems unbearable to Moscow is any further Western influence on its own camp, however small and with whatever means; the influence thus far allowed must be eliminated as completely as possible. The Soviet leadership does in fact have reason for such an assessment. In all the member states of the Warsaw Pact the Western tourist has had a chance to see how the people have grown to care less and less for their communist state power; they were wary of conflicts with this state power, to be sure, yet basically they did as they pleased. This state of affairs allows power and rule to gradually become a formalized matter. This is now supposed to come to an end; and not only the GDR Germans will feel it, but they will be the first.

It turns out in the hour of truth that "Ostpolitik," which in the West was practiced not merely on German territory, has been thrown back into the situation existing prior to the treaties with the East. The "modus vivendi" has broken down--it was always a word that was used only by the West and not by the East.

In order to create discipline in the communist sphere of power and to consolidate it, the Soviet leadership must insist as before vis-a-vis Western Europe that an active policy of the Western alliance is incompatible with coexistence and the policy of detente: Those in the West who want one thing must give up the other. Linking an improvement in travel restrictions in Germany with the recognition of a special GDR citizenship serves particularly to illustrate the principle that the Eastern side no longer wants to accept members of the Western alliance insisting on Western Europe's being different, while simultaneously wanting to cooperate in a factual, friendly and goodneihborly manner with the communist sphere of influence. That "normality" is supposed to come to an end. But that was exactly the basis of the entire detente policy.

The delimitation of the socialist part of Europe--which is beginning now, and not merely of the GDR--vis-a-vis the West, and probably the simultaneous isolation of socialist states from each other is supposed to prevent further erosions of Soviet power. The situation in Poland could be also gradually stabilized in this way. This is why this way must be tried. How easily, quickly and completely the Soviet Union will suceed with such a change of course to stop the deterioration of its power and reputation is a vital question for Western as well as Eastern Europe.

Everybody knows that the first half of the eighties will be a particularly dangerous period, because Soviet armament will gain the preponderance sufficient to exert pressure on the West. But that is only possible with a permanently secure and stable hinterland where law and order prevail, and that is exactly what is missing at the moment. The break with the policy of the seventies is meant to facilitate Moscow's being able to count again on the factor of a "secure hinterland." Later on there will be an opportunity to blackmail Western Europe militarily.

DW1553 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German 0605 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Press review on 13 October speech by GDR State Council Chairman Honecker and on FRG-GDR relations]

[Text] BADISCHE ZEITUNG of Freiburg writes that if more evidence were required, Erich Honecker has now clearly supplied it: The drastic increase in the mandatory currency exchange amount is not a result of economic needs, it much rather signals a change of course with regard to German policy. Honecker has made it unmistakably clear where developments will lead. For him now to play up problems which were intentionally left out by the Basic Treaty means that the GDR wants to establish such high barriers that there will be no progress in inter-German relations.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG notes: The last illusions have evaporated in Bonn. The Federal Government was shocked by the impossible demands voiced by Erich Honecker. Even the foundations of the Basic Treaty seem to be threatened. The explosive problems of state law were left out intentionally. Erich Honecker's making them a prerequisite for further progress raises the suspicion that East Berlin wants to change the entire treaty. One can see how seriously the Federal Government considers the problem by the fact that the federal chancellor will interrupt his vacation in order to head the cabinet session wheere reactions to the East Berlin action will be discussed. The government realizes that this is not merely a part of an aspect of detente, but that the core of it is involved, as Berlin Mayor Stobbe aptly formulated it.

NORDWEST ZEITUNG of Oldenburg stresses: Federal Chancellor Schmidt will have difficulty coming up with phrases to patch up the china that has been broken by the East. It certainly does not mean abandoning the detente policy idea to expect the current and future Schmidt-Genscher government to produce an inter-German policy concept oriented by realities and not by wishful thinking.

WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster notes: SED chief Honecker with his Gera speech has loudly slammed the door through which the people in divided Germany were supposed to come somewhat closer to each other. Federal Chancellor Schmidt was left out in the cold, snubbed and disgraced. Less than a month ago his mouthpieces tried to create the impression that the termination of the Werbellinsee meeting was just an accident and that a new talk with possible substantial results was in the offing after the Bundestag elections. The warning signs that this would not be the case at all were either missed or intentionally ignored. Now there is nothing to be interpreted about the hard facts.

HESSISCHE NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel points out: Government Spokesman Boelling warns against panicky reactions vis-a-vis the GDR. Huonker of the chancellor's office advises against a policy of needling. FDP politician Hoppe even believes he has to warn against a policy of blind rage with Bonn rather than East Berlin being the one addressed. One could discard that as the joke of the day, as utter nonsense, if it did not disclose the shock and helplessness of German policy. Before the Bonn people could react to the arbitrary increase in the mandatory currency exchange amount, Honecker himself added insult to injury. By reading his recent speech accurately, one cannot but find that he has dealt a hard blow to the just confirmed federal chancellor, who almost was his guest. His Bonn aides may keep their cool heads; be that as it may, one can make a virtue of every necessity, says HESSISCHE NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN writes: Bonn, in any event, is discussing the question whether detente policy has come to an end as a result of the GDR's intervention or whether some hope is left for that policy. Within 8 days the inter-German world has totally changed. This agreement [as heard] can be demonstrated most plainly by the announcement in the coalition agreement. It does to show, by the way, how unsuspecting the government coalition must have been as it did not reckon with such a setback, just as it did not reckon with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan some months ago. It is painful for the government to be forced to listen to the accusation that it was not even prepared for such events.

The LEUTKIRCH SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG states: Erich Honecker's Gera speech elicits horror and disbelief, as if a familiar partner had said something bad instead of a communist party boss playing Moscow's part. It would be a great gain for German policy if the responsible people in Bonn realized that, as it turns out, detente really is indivisible, that the Soviet Union fully subjects its detente policy to its power interests and interprets it as an instrument of rule, and that the principle of nonintervention applies solely to the adversaries of the Soviet Union but not to the leadership power of the communist camp. Such a realization would spare the government false expectations and the ensuing disappointments.

With a view to Moscow's policy the KOBLENZ RHEIN ZEITUNG declares: No doubt about it, on Moscow's instruction the GDR is sailing a hard confrontation course which is meant as a signal for the Eastern pact: Polish freedom remains exposed to seizure by Soviet power. The problem of Poland is even worth risking detente in central Europe for the Kremlin, because the symbol of this detente so far has been the improving inter-German relationship which Honecker frankly advocated as late as a few weeks ago.

Essen's NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG advocates a similar view: There is more to the defensive measure of the SED leadership than appears on the surface: The developments in Poland, the liberal-democratic beginnings there, have sounded the red alert in Moscow, Whether Honecker likes it or not, he must do what Moscow tells him to do. The Kremlin has ordered him to revert to the hard course of isolation, it is afraid that the spark of freedom might start a fire.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG also draws attention to basic interrelationships: The false calm of policy on Germany has long proved treacherous in the shadow of Afghanistan. Moscow had been interested in it only for as long as it was necessary to secure the occupation of Afghanistan.

The more the Polish drama occupies the world and disturbs the East bloc empire, the more significance the policy of delimitation which was born out of ideological calamity gains. In such a gloomy situation Honecker's speech at least indicates stagnation, if not retrogression, in inter-German relations.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU notes: If we suppose that the relationship between the two German states is the yardstick for measuring the relationship between East and West at large, we cannot but say that this relationship has tangibly hardened in the past few days and weeks. The idea becomes obvious that the surprising hardening of GDR policy is linked with developments in Poland.

BOELLING: CABINET DISCUSSES CSCE CONFERENCE

LD151530 Hamburg DPA in German 1508 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 15 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today emphasized Bonn's urgent interest in the CSCE review conference due to open in Madrid on 11 November. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling said that Geuscher had made it clear at today's cabinet meeting that the Federal Government wants to do all it can for the meeting to take place. According to Boelling, no doubt was expressed at the cabinet meeting that the review conference would take place.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS U.S., SOVIET STRATEGIES IN MIDDLE EAST

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "The Covert Struggle of the World Powers for Influence in the Middle East"]

[Text] Brussels, 10 October--What is striking is the warlike conflict between Iraq and Iran. What is essential, however, is the overall strategic situation, the covert struggle for influence which the two world powers, the United States and Russia, are waging in the Middle East. The reports spread by Tehran and Baghdad promote the inclination to overrate the regional conflict. The tactical situation in the field is moving the imagination. The divisions' operations and the bombing raids on the oil fields command the center of interest. They seem to be the central political event. Meanwhile, it is two extras who are beating each other up. In reality it is the Soviet Union and the United States which are fully engaged; not in a military-technological but in a political-strategic respect.

The two giants are organizing their forces in the background. Moscow has concluded a friendship treaty with the Syrians. The chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, General Jones, at the same time inspected Masirah. President as-Sadat offered the United States military bases weeks ago. Washington concluded agreements with Kenya, somalia, and the Emirates allowing it to set up depots and bases in these areas. The Soviet Union, meanwhile, courted Syria and also delivered more arms to Iraq.

The U.S. strategic deployment in the Indian Ocean found its parallel in the increasing engagement of the Soviets in the Persian Gulf. The Americans now use AWACS planes for oerational reconnaissance. The Soviets, in contrast, are enlarging their depots in northern Syria and, as the well-informed London service Arab-Asian Affairs (AAA) has learned, have stationed more than 6,000 men in Gezira. Finally, the Kingdom of Jordan has directly taken the side of Iraq, thus being the first Arab state to unmask. Amman received $100 million from Baghdad in July. In return it is now making the port of Aqaba available to Iraq and is prepared to build a solid road to Iraq.

These catchwords stand for complex actions. If we group them around the Iraqi-Iranian war they lend themselves to the interpretation of being elements of an overall strategy conceived by the great powers.

Thus, the Syrian-Libyan union often derided in the West becomes an important phase of Russian Middle East policy if it is viewed against the background of a purposeful Soviet strategy. Granted, the real value of such cooperation is small. Yet the Kremlin can exploit emotionally-motivated political actions to its own advantage.

Al-Qadhdhafi's initiative from the outset had been a political offensive with two targets: By this demonstration he intended to strike out against the Egyptians and at the same time hit the Americans. This means that As-Sadat, as the friend of the United States, was to be discredited in the Arab camp. The world public, however, was to be shown that Libya feels threatened by the presence of U.S. air forces in Egypt. At the same time it was intended to enhance the prestige of Al-Asad, who feels isolated in the Arab community. Since the Soviets had been informed about the establishment of the union in advance, the direction of the strategic-political thrust envisaged by Tripoli and Damascus is quite clear: It was intended to create a visible counterweight to the U.S. advance on the gulf.

While the Kremlin in this particular case remained in the background, its latest initiative, the conclusion of the friendship treaty with Damascus, is a public demonstration against the West. This time several strategic objectives become visible. To begin with, pressure is brought to bear on Turkey. Secondly, Iraq is given the hint that the Kremlin does not depend on Baghdad alone. Thirdly, this friendship treaty is bound to make the Iranians think. It may have a negative or a positive effect on Tehran. Theoretically Damascus might strengthen the "Arab front" against Tehran. But, secretly supported by the Soviet Union, it may well exert pressure on Iraq to discontinue the fighting.

At any rate Moscow has a brakeman now who could, if the Russians deemed it necessary, keep victorious Iraq from occupying Iran's entire oil province. The Soviet Union cannot be interested in a great shifting of weights within OPEC. In doing all this, there is no need for Moscow to break with Iraq. It can act through its agent Syria; the friendship agreement with Baghdad must not suffer from that. In other words, the Iraqi card can be introduced in the game over and over again. In doing this, a partner will be introduced in the communist camp whom the Soviets so far could hardly hope to win over.

King Husayn's change can be considered a balancing act. The ruler of Jordan--similar to Sihanouk in earlier Cambodia--was forced due to American restraint to test new partnerships. Maybe the flexibly operating monarch will correct his decision. With the logistic support of Iraq he is paying back at present the millions of dollars he received in the summer from the dictator Saddam Husayn. If the strategic road connecting Iraq with Jordan should really be built to create faster communication, additional complications would come about: Israel will feel threatened, and it will not leave the Egyptians unconcerned either. The American strategy will feel challenged again in the Near and Middle East and that by an old friend, the Hashemite king.

The relationship between Jordan and Iraq is fragile. The man in Baghdad cannot use all his divisions in a war against the Iranians. The Kurds are restless in northern Iraq; they contend with the government troops for wide areas. An oriental dictator must also protect his capital: At least 6 divisions are tied down by the protection of Baghdad. King Husayn must take precautions with regard to his experiment this time of supporting Iraq. He has 4 divisions. It is said that he has excellent operative units and a good air force, but it is another question whether he can "loan" these troops, offering direct support to Iraq. Husayn must keep his army prepared as civil war troops, particularly since the Iraqi-Soviet-Jordan rapprochement could become a trap for the monarch. Moscow, Baghdad and Damascus already are thinking of the time after Husayn. According to their ideas, Jordan without a king could become the Palestinian state so many people dream of.

How is the United States reacting? The Americans are maintaining striking restraint in their information policy when it comes to details about the war in the Persian Gulf.

They have two information-gathering satellites cruising permanently over the combat area, but they are not telling any findings to their allies. So the Federal Republic depends on so-called war reportage of the fighting parties and on reports of Eastern correspondents.

The American strategic concentration in the Indian Ocean demonstrates how the Americans assess the general situation. The concentration of their fleet is no longer a mere strategic countermove after Afghanistan. America's naval forces are prepared to keep the Strait of Hormuz open. The American offer to give arms to those who want to remain neutral in the Iranian-Iraqi conflict, demonstrates the intention to keep undecided and faltering friends and possible partners from joining the Red camp.

Saudi Arabia plays a special role in the strategic plan of the Americans. The ties between Washington and Riyadh are much closer than generally believed. President as-Sadat has recently pointed out with an intentional indiscretion how intensely the United States cooperates with the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The Egyptian state chief wanted to force the Saudis with his frankness not to just secretly support the Americans by giving them bases, but to do so visibly. It is believed in Cairo that the strategy of the Soviets calls for a demonstrative counterpolicy. Everybody resisting a growing influence exerted by Moscow in the Middle East ought to so demonstrate with acts and words. Unfortunately, however, As-Sadat is rather isolated with regard to this approach, and this holds true not merely in the Middle East. The European West also pretends that the duel of the big powers is just a matter for giants.

GENSCHER ON FDP STANCE ON COALITION, OPPOSITION

DW151330 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 15 Oct 80 p 4

["Excerpts" from undated article by Hans-Dietrich Genscher, foreign minister and FDP chairman, circulated by the FDP press service entitled: "The Mandate of 5 October"]

[Text] The center has been visibly strengthened within the democratic system.

The coalition has been given a greater majority, the FDP having contributed considerably to this end. Now the coalition must have the will and the strength to implement the joint policy to be agreed upon--in no case must it dissipate its majority or even allow it to unravel. He who indulges in the easy excuse that each and every vote in parliament is no longer important will live to see that the government will soon lack more than just individual votes. Strength of leadership is imperative on all sides. The alleged wisdom that what is good for the goose is also good for the gander has already made majorities of different dimensions crumble away. I adhere to my view that fluctuating majorities are self-destructive to a coalition government. In the event that some people want them nevertheless, they must know that this means more to us than just a matter of procedure.

Solid work is demanded in the coalition. A solid budget policy, the lasting safeguarding of the legal pension insurance, housing construction policy will demand a great deal of decision-making power from the government parties--to state just some of the great domestic policy topics.

In all upcoming decisions the FDP will not forget that despite the strengthening of its position it has not won the absolute majority. We are partners who are reliable. The SPD, in turn, knows that it will depend on the FDP also in the future when it is necessary to form majorities. The FDP knows this as well. Certain groups in the SPD must know, however, that we will not be a party to any correction toward the left of the election decision over the heads of the voters.

The CDU was given a chance for renewal, and whether it exploits this chance is important not merely for the CDU. A conservative party must also be able to undergo renewal. The rebuff experienced by Stuttgart Mayor Rommel because of a few carefully expressed ideas cannot make the public particularly hopeful.

When it comes to CDU action in the Bundesrat, the CDU should consider how it came off in the federal laender where it rules. The time has finally come for the CDU to realize the opportunity to has to represent the interests of the laender in the Bundesrat. However, it should not make the additional attempt to correct the Bundestag election result via the Bundesrat.

The Bundestag elections have certainly not deprived the parliamentary majorities of the Union in Schleswig-Holstiein, Lower Saxony, Rhineland-Palatinate and Baden-Wuerttemberg of their legitimacy, but the fact that on 5 October the CDU scored less than 40 percent in Rhineland-Palatinate and Baden-Wuerttemberg should make it ponder its actions in the Bundesrat. The majority of voters in these laender obviously did not agree on a federal level with the Landtag majority.

GAUS 'LIKELY TO BE REPLACED' AS REPRESENTATIVE IN EAST BERLIN

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--State Secretary Guenter Gaus, the Federal Republic's permanent representative in East Berlin, is likely to be replaced at the end of the year after a 5-year term. Bonn government sources confirmed today that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt had informed Gaus to this effect.

Government spokesman Klaus Boelling said that a decision on Gaus' successor is to be made in the course of the formation of the new government in the next few weeks. He gave no particulars. Boelling himself is thought to be a candidate for the succession.

The proposed change is not connected with current problems in inter-German relations, it was emphasized by Bonn government sources. The chancellor had repeatedly expressed himself in favor of changing the permanent representative to the GDR at 5 or 6-year intervals. This term is roughly in line with the tenure of ambassadors in important and difficult capitals. Gaus was Bonn's first permanent representative in East Berlin and went there after the two German states had agreed on setting up their missions.

THREE SUSPECTS DETAINED FOR SPYING FOR EAST

LD131134 Hamburg DPA in German 1047 GMT 13 Oct 80

[Text] Karlsruhe, 13 Oct (DPA)--Three suspected spies were arrested over the weekend in the Federal Republic on suspicion of working as secret service agents for Eastern intelligence services. The federal prosecutor's office stated on Monday that those involved are a Romanian citizen born in 1937 as well as a German couple living in Munich. The investigating judge of the Federal Court of Justice has already issued warrants for the arrest of those concerned.

The Romanian is said to have spied on behalf of his country's intelligence service on emigrants living in the Federal Republic. No further information was given for the time being on the arrested German couple.

BRIEFS

STEEL MILL FOR SAUDI ARABIA--Duisburg, 15 Oct (DPA)--A steel rolling mill worth DM350 million is to be constructed in the Persian Gulf at Al-Jubayl in Saudi Arabia by an international consortium with Mannesmann Demag AG as the main contractor. Mannesmann-Demag AG announced in Duisburg on Wednesday that the works will have an annual capacity altogether of 400,000 tons of light-section steel and wire to be run by the Saudi iron and steel corporation. Also involved in the deal are the German firms Schloemann-Siemag and Siemens. A French firm and a South Korean construction firm are also part of the consortium. LE MONDE CRITICIZES DIPLOMACY FOR LACK OF MORALITY

[Editorial: "Trade and Diplomacy"]

[Text] Three recent affairs have once again emphasized the contradictions which exist between foreign policy, international trade and morality. Of course, this is not a new problem. However, it deserves more than the casual shrug to which we have been accustomed by French leaders always quick to justify what is unjustifiable in the name of economic necessities.

The affair which could be the most serious because of its internal consequences is the one exposed by the daily LIBERATION this Friday, 10 October: Did the French Government or did it not agree, within the context of nuclear cooperation with Iraq, to discrimination among its nationals at the expense of French Jews? It is too early to give a clear answer to that question. A lengthy inquiry will probably be necessary to determine whether the firms involved in this cooperation are indeed indulging in such discrimination or whether they simply promised not to send technicians of Israeli nationality to Iraq.

However, if LIBERATION's assertions are proved correct, the French Government would be seen to be guilty of unworthy behavior. In connection with this affair the government can already be criticized for its imprudent nuclear cooperation with Iraq, whose regional ambitions were known before it attacked Iran. The questions which must now be raised and which must be answered one day are the following: Can we continue to adhere to the myth that civilian nuclear channels have no military value? Can we continue to adhere to the myth that it is possible to build nuclear installations in a country on the point of launching a war without fear of a very serious accident?

In sales of French nuclear power stations to South Korea the government has so far shown greater caution. Having perhaps learned from the unfortunate blunders made in recent years, it refused to give in to Seoul's blackmail--Seoul wants to link the signing of the contract with Jean Francois-Poncet's visit. Before confirming his visit the foreign minister wants to obtain an assurance from the South Korean authorities that Kim Tae-chung, the opposition leader sentenced to death following a particularly iniquitous trial, will not be executed. It is to be hoped that this line will be adhered to. Our country's honor depends upon it.

The last disturbing example is the affair of the French steel plant which is to be built in the USSR. The incident goes back to August when Creusot-Loire obtained fairly easily a contract--the main part of it at least--which a U.S. company had just abandoned owing to the curbs on technology exports to the USSR imposed by President Carter after the invasion of Afghanistan. Despite the embarrassed explanations given by the French Government, it is clear that on this occasion it has failed to keep its promise not to replace the defaulting country. The foreign minister apparently opposed this dubious maneuver but his viewpoint was rejected by Raymond Barre who, it seems, cannot keep any promise when faced with a good business deal. Nonetheless that is a serious miscalculation if only because Paris will now no longer be able to invoke a U.S. failure to indulge in basic consultation in order to try to explain away this multidirectional moneygrubbing.

SECOND ROUND OF INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS OPENS IN NICOSIA

TA151847 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Text] The second round of the intercommunal talks, in which the issue in dispute between the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communites are being discussed, resumed today in Lefkosa [Nicosia]. The Turkish and Greek Cypriot interlocutors met at Ledra Palace Hotel at 1630. Replying to reporters' questions before the meeting, Turkish Cypriot Interlocutor Umit Onan said that the Maras [Varosha] issue will be discussed at today's meeting. Onan said: Today it is our turn to submit proposals on the issue. We will put our proposals at the negotiating table. Noting that efforts are being exerted to find a solution to the problem espite all difficulties, Onan said that the negotiations will be conducted with patience.

Varosha Issue Discussed

[Text] Another session in the current round of the Cyprus intercommunal talks was held this afternoon at the Ledra Palace in Nicosia. Today's session dealt with the (?fifth) item of the agreed agenda, the question of Varosha. The communique issued at the end of the session said the discussion of reaching agreement on the resettlement of Varosha under United Nations auspices which began on September the 16th was continued at today's meeting in the same good atmosphere that has prevailed at previous meetings. The communique also said that the next meeting will take place on Friday, October the 31st. The two sides will discuss at the next meeting initial practical measures to promote goodwill, mutual confidence and a return to normal conditions in accordance with the provisions of point 6 of the 19th May agreement.

[Text] The fifth meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel in Nicosia this afternoon between Mr Ioannidhis and Mr Onan. At today's meeting they continued to discuss the question of reaching an agreement on the resettlement of Varosha under UN auspices, in accordance with the provisions of point 5 of the 19 May 79 agreement. The discussion of this question had begun on 16 September.

According to a brief communique issued by the United Nations, today's meeting was also held in the same good atmosphere that prevailed at the previous meetings. The next meeting will be held on 31 Oct and discussions will then continue on the question of practical measures by both sides to promote good will, mutual confidence and the return to normal conditions, in accordance with point 6 of the 19 May agreement.

In a statement prior to the beginning of the talks, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi, said that today's meeting too lay within the context of the preliminary stage. We are, he added, in a preliminary period of exchanging ideas. I hope that in the near future we will enter a second stage that will allow for a more specific and fruitful dialogue.

Replying to an observation by a correspondent that it was not a preliminary but a substantive meeting that had been expected today, Mr Gobbi said that all the meetings were substantive and repeated that the beginning is always slow. It is a fact, he said, that I have never promised quick results at the talks. And I believe that excessive self-confidence or pessimism are, at the present stage, sentimental reactions rather than a reasonable approach to the problem.

On his arrival at the Ledra Palace Hotel, Mr. Ioannidhis said that at today's meeting they would discuss the question of the resettlement of Varosha, which is the first item on the agenda of the talks. This, he said, is the second round of the talks which will again consist of four meetings at which the items as mentioned in the agenda will be discussed in turn.

In his statement, the representative of the Turkish Cypriot side at the inter-Cypriot talks, Mr Onan, said that his side would today submit proposals on the question of Varosha. Asked whether these would be written proposals, Mr Onan replied: I believe so, but you must allow me not to say more. Mr Onan said that the climate at the talks continues to be good and added that he saw no reason for it not to continue. It is our duty, he stressed, to display persistence and patience. It is a difficult task and we will do all we can to find a solution to the problem.

WFTU WELCOMES RESUMPTION OF INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

[Text] The president of the Federation of Revolutionary Workers Unions, Cyprus, [DEV-IS] Hasan Sarica, has returned to the federated state after attending a general council meeting of the World Federation of Trade Unions [WFTU]. He said the meeting has decided to send a message to the UN General Assembly on Cyprus.

In the message, the WFTU welcomed the resumption of the intercommunal talks and expressed the hope that the talks would lead to a peaceful and just solution of the problem, taking into consideration the interests and rights of the two Cypriot communities. The WFTU called on the United Nations to exert its influence and make every effort for the sustained continuation of the intercommunal talks and for their successful completion.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON INTERCOMMUNAL ISSUES

[From the "Radio Newsreel" program]

[Excerpt] In an interview in this evening's Nicosia television program "Panorama," Foreign Minister Rolandhis referred, among other things, to the Cyprus issue and the intercommunal dialogue as discussed at the 35th UN General Assembly, which he addressed at the beginning of the month, and to the role of the UN today.

In answer to a question regarding the position of the Cyprus issue in the framework of international problems, Mr Rolandhis said:

[Begin recording] Humanity's great problem today is that many new problems have been amassed--unfortunately, without a solution to the current problems. We add new problems every year, and we face them in the UN General Assembly sessions. The Cyprus problem is an important one. In truth, I would say that the Cyprus problem is not considered to be of great significance. However, although Cyprus is a small country, it is strategically located and thus is quite important. If one sees the problem from this dimension, it becomes quite striking. On the other hand, the Cyprus issue reflects principles in which many countries have a practical interest, namely, many countries are interested in avoiding in their own cases what has happened in Cyprus. It is from this, to a great extent, that the support we have internationally has arisen.

[Question] Mr Minister, in New York you had a series of contacts with foreign ministers and other officials who encompass the international spectrum--West, East and nonaligned. In effect, I would like to have your impressions and your judgement on how these countries face the Cyprus issue. This is with regard to your last remark that there are many countries that would not like to see [Sentence interrupted by Rolandhis' reply].

[Answer] It is a fact that I met many ministers--32 ministers--apart from the UN secretary general, and we exchanged detailed views on the Cyprus issue. In particular, there is interest at this moment in the dialogue that has begun. All advise us to proceed with the dialogue with patience and persistence. This is not an easy dialogue. We must be realists. This dialogue will take time. It is not a dialogue that will only take weeks. Perhaps it will take months. We must show the necessary persistence in the proceedings so that one day we may be able to solve--if we ever will be able to solve--the Cyprus issue. They agree with us that the Cyprus issue must remain an international issue, because this guarantees us existence as a world state. Otherwise, all these contacts with the various foreign ministers have had this aim: To preserve international contacts. What I continuously affirm is that the federation solution is becoming acceptable to all countries, and we must, I believe, begin to strengthen this consciousness, this spirit of federation in Cyprus, even more. When the three of us [as heard: presumably including Rolandhis and President Kiprianou] were in Belgrade recently, I was told that in Yugoslavia during Tito's day there was a saying that Yugoslavia was formed of six republics, five nations, four languages, three religions, two alphabets and one Tito. This Tito was the cohesive link; he was the spirit of federation. And it is exactly this consciousness that we also must create in Cyprus if we want to build a true federated republic here one day.

[Question] Mr Minister, I insist: In what you have said about the intercommunal dialogue and in your address at the UN you stressed, or rather said, that with the resumption of the intercommunal dialogue there is a ray of hope. On what facts do you base this assessment of a ray of hope on the basis of just a single month of talks? You have said that the dialogue will be lengthy. Where do we stand today?

[Answer] Undoubtedly the ray exists. The issue is that the ray must become full light, because if the ray does not become full light, we will be unable to solve the problem. The good point is that the talks began this year in an excellent climate. This was not so in the past. The talks continue in this climate. Obviously we are still at the beginning of the talks. The first round has just ended. I believe that the critical rounds will be the second and the third. Then the views of the two sides will begin to be heard in detail. The views of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot sides have now been expressed. At the beginning there were certain reactions, but the essence will begin to show in the second and perhaps more in the third round.

[Interviewer, breaking in] namely, next Wednesday?

[Answer] I would say, if we pass the two rounds that will follow the four meetings of every round, then we must be looking forward to better days. This must be the critical period.

[Question] Personally, I was impressed by President Karamanlis' statement the day before yesterday in Sofia that decisiveness by the UN was as much a prerequisite to successful talks as was Greek and Turkish good will.

[Answer] Yes. I think the UN is showing sufficient decisiveness. We must confess that it is playing a difficlt role, because of the fact that each side's stance is known to all. And when one is negotiating where the differences are great, there are certain to be serious difficulties. I believe that, at this moment, appropriate conditions exist; namely, the UN is trying in every way. I was assured of this by Dr Waldheim when I was in New York recently. The two negotiating parties have contributed considerably to the creation of a favorable climate. We have just begun to enter into the essence of the talks, and when we come to the essence of the second and third round, the hope of success will begin to show.

[Question] You mean you consider a contribution in this effort, this very difficult effort, to be the restraint shown by both sides. We showed restraint in registering the Cyprus issue in the General Assembly by taking certain practical measures. [Another interviewer interrupts, saying that the Cyprus issue has been registered in the General Assembly. This is followed by a indistinct passage caused by several persons speaking at once.] But perhaps even the press and the political leadership would have helped if they cleared the atmosphere of additional elements that are unpleasant and detrimental to the talks.

[Answer] Certainly. We must be rather practical and logical. One cannot have talks with another side and simultaneously show annoyance with it. These two things do not work together in any sector, whether political, economic, technical or any other. Consequently, during the period of substantive dialogue we must undoubtedly refrain from bitterness, and I must tell you that all 32 foreign ministers I have seen and Dr Waldheim advised us to move in this direction. Beyond this, the nonaligned contact group, which I met as a group, had the same opinion. It reitreated its support for and faith in treating the Cyprus issue as an international issue. But it told me that we must not disturb the dialogue during its substantive phase with events which may cause bitterness.

[Question] I must understand that within the same framework, with the same goal, without abandoning the basic principles of presenting the Cyprus problem, we will take action also at the New Delhi and Madrid conferences?

[Answer] The New Delhi conference will be held in February. I do not know whether dialogue will be achieved before then. But, if it has been, it must reflect that there has been progress; and I believe, without a doubt, that we must follow the same princple. Otherwise, our same friends will not support us. As for the Madrid conference, it is now in its preparatory conference stage. Unfortunately, events have not been very promising, and the reports that we get from Madrid speak of disagreements. I hope that the problems will be resolved. The Madrid conference officially opens on 12 November. Due to its problems, it has not yet been decided whether it will open on the ministerial level. But if it does open at that level on 12 November, I believe that we must follow the same patient policy.

[Question] Mr minister, you have referred to the scenario of a more active role by the UN, and you have stressed the good climate that prevails [in the talks]. However, a single favorable climate is not sufficient to create progress towards a solution to a problem. There is another factor in the present phase of the Cyprus issue and in the present negotiations--the change in rule in Turkey. Although it is still early, one month has elaspsed, if I am not mistaken. Are there any indications what Ankara's stand will be?

[Answer] We have no direct indications. I believe that perhaps the creation of the climate in which the talks are being held is some indication of intentions. Beyond this I cannot say much. You realize that I cannot expose the content of the talks, at least at this stage. I believe that time will show what the intentions are. In this stage I do not think we can comment further on the situation in Turkey, because we don't have enough facts. [end recording]

PAPER SAYS TURKISH SIDE LACKS WILL FOR TALKS' SUCCESS

[From "Our Positions" column: "Well-known Tactics"]

[Text] The orchestrated Turkish Cypriot press campaign and the reaction by some parties on the other side leave small doubt that the Turkish Cypriot leaders are methodically working for the failure of the new round of intercommunal talks.

At the beginning of the new round of talks, the Turkish side appeared to be possessed by a desire for serious talks. However, facts have proved that things were different. First, the Turkish side has carefully declined to submit concrete proposals, mainly on the territorial issue, and has confined itself to repeating the well-known principles of viability, productivity, security and so forth. Second, it disclosed the contents of our proposals in order to rouse the--definitely guided--reaction of the Turkish Cypriot public.

Proof of the other side's insincerity is the fact that the paper BIRLIK--the organ of Denktas' party--immediately recalled that the Turkish Cypriots "have no other choice but to declare a state."

The Turkish Cypriots' tactics prove the lack of will for negotiations and substantive talks. The Turkish side should have submitted proposals--just as our side has done--for dicsussion at the negotiating table. The Turkish Cypriot side has failed to do so and now it is embarking on its well-known tactics to "negotiate" and to reject our proposals in public speeches.

We pray to be proved wrong but we suspect that the Turkish side will fail to submit any proposals at the negotiating table with the excuse that it is unable to discuss ours.

TURKISH CYPRIOT RESPONSES TO INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS' ISSUES

Communal Liberation Party Comments

TA121119 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 12 Oct 80

[Text] The Communal Liberation Party Secretariat General issued a press release today stating that the Greek Cypriot territorial proposals are unacceptable. The press release signed by Secretary General Ismail Bozkurt says that it is understood that the Greek Cypriots demand Magosa [Famagusta], Guzelyurt [Morphou], Degirmenlik [Kythrea] and the industrial zone, an important part of Messoria and Karpas from the Magosa Strait to the island's eastern end. The press release says that this attitude cannot be considered one of goodwill aiming at the solution of the Cyprus problem, and that it leads the intercommunal talks to an impasse from the beginning.

The press release says that with this attitude the Greek Cypriots are jeopardizing the hopes for a solution and that if the Kiprianou administration wants a realistic solution to the Cyprus problem it must act seriously and responsibly.

Denktas Statement

TA151430 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Text] President Denktas has said that there are certain principles which cannot be a subject for discussion in the talks for a bicommunal and bizonal federal settlement in Cyprus. He was speaking at an informal meeting held at the medical association in Nicosia last night.

Mr Denktas said there could be no discussion on the cofounder rights and status of the Turkish Cypriot community in the independence and sovereignty of the Cyprus Republic and on the population exchange agreement in 1975. The president said that otherwise the principle of a federal system of government would have no validity and that it would be impossible to provide security for the Turkish Cypriot community. He added that if the Greek Cypriots were sincere on the question of a healthy and lasting Cyprus republic they should not make the guarantees for the security of the Turkish Cypriots a subject for discussion.

Turkish Cypriot Press Reactions

NC151913 [Editorial report] On 10 October 1980, BOZKURT, on page 1, carried these banner headlines: "Greek Cypriot Proposals on the Territorial Question Have Been Defined," "The Greek Cypriots Want To Allocate Only 20 Percent of the Land to the Turkish Cypriot Community," "The Greek Cypriot Proposals Stipulate that the Turkish Cypriots Should Abandon a Large Portion of Fertile Land and that Thousands of Turkish Cypriots Should Change Residence Again."

The paper then says, "According to the information which the ANATOLIA AGENCY [AA] correspondent in Nicosia obtained yesterday from sources close to the United Nations, the Greek Cypriot negotiator brought to the negotiating table at the Ledra Palace the other day a map demanding the return of Morphou, Mesaoria, Rizokarpassos, Kythrea and many other areas to the Greek Cypriot side." BOZKURT then quotes observers in the TFSC as telling the AA correspondent that "by bringing to the negotiating table the old, uncompromising proposals of the Greek Cypriot administration, which envisage large-scale changes in the TFSC frontiers and which, completely disregarding the security of the Turkish Cypriot community, reduces thousands of Turkish Cypriots to the status of refugees again, the Greek Cypriot side is, once again, jeopardizing the holding of 'substantial' and 'constructive' talks for the peaceful settlement of the Cyprus dispute."

The same observers have described the Greek Cypriot proposals as "provocative," and added that under the circumstances "dwelling on the proposals and discussing them seriously is out of the question."

On 10 October 1980, HALKIN SESI, on page 1, carried precisely the same information under the headline: "What Boldness? The Greek Cypriot Side Has Asked for the Return of Morpnou, Famagusta, Rizokarpassos and many other areas."

On the same date, BIRLIK, on page 1, carried these headlines in heavy print: "They Demand Half of our Territory," "At the Intercommunal Talks the Other Day, the Greek Cypriot Side Has Again Submitted the Same Map Which They Presented at the Vienna Conference in 1977," "The Unbending Attitude of the Greek Cypriots Has Created the Danger of an Early Deadlock, Particularly on the Territorial Issue."

On 11 October 1980, BOZKURT, on page 1, carried strong reactions from the Democratic People's Party (DPP) and the Turkish Farmers' Union to the Greek Cypriot proposals concerning their territorial demands. The DPP says: "The Greek Cypriot leadership's proposal of only allowing 20 percent of the territory for the Turkish Cypriot side clearly indicates an inconsistent attitude, which is devoid of seriousness."

BOZKURT further reports that in a communique issued by its Central Committee the DPP states that the "Greek Cypriot proposals are not only contrary to the intention of holding substantial and constructive negotiations, they also totally disregard the security of the Turkish Cypriot community and the principles of economic viability for the Turkish Cypriot sector." The communique goes on to stress the determination of the Turkish Cypriots "not to live under the Greek Cypriot yoke any more."

On 11 October 1980, BIRLIK, on pages 1 and 4, carried an editorial: "The Outcome of the Talks." Among other things, the editorial says: The aim of this 'goodwill map' which the Greek Cypriot side has submitted to us is "to reduce the frontiers in a gradual manner, to strengthen the Greek Cypriot economy by regaining fertile lands and to establish Greek Cypriot hegemony over the entire island as before 1974." "This map envisages the elimination of the concept of bizonality and the implementation of a cantonal system."

"In other words," says the editorial, "the Greek Cypriot proposals are based on the principle of 'majority rule.'" The editorial continues: "The TFSC frontiers cannot be left to the mercy and magnanimity of the Greek Cypriots.

"In determining these frontiers, the concepts of 'defense' and 'economic productivity' have played a vital role. The Greek Cypriot map, which disregards these concepts, condemns the Turkish Cypriot community to live on the rocky Kyrenia Mountains. This can only be characterized as 'nonsensical.'" The editorial then calls on the opposition and the party in power to act in unity.

On 11 October 1980, DEMOKRATIK HALK GAZETESI [Democratic People's Paper], in its second issue, refers to the Greek Cypriot territorial proposals and says, among other things: "Three years ago Makarios proposed that 25 percent of the territory go to the Turkish Cypriots. But now, the Greek Cypriots have reduced this to only 20 percent." The paper then adds: "The intransigent and negative attitude of the Greek Cypriot side will compel the Turkish Cypriot side to stress once again the fact that it will be unable to make concessions on the principles concerning security and economic viability."

On 11 October 1980, HALKIN SESI, on page 3, carried an editorial by Resat Kazim who criticizes the Greek Cypriot map and Greek Cypriot aspirations and added: "The Turkish Cypriot community is not a toy in the hands of the Greek Cypriots. Nor is it their captives or slaves. There are now two regions--two separate zones--where these two communities have been living in for the past 6 years. It is sheer madness to attempt to upset this order. It would be a betrayal of the principles of peace and security in Cyprus and it would also carry the seeds of further conflicts. The Vienna Agreement was signed upon the realization that these two sides cannot coexist as a mixed society."

On 12 October 1980, all papers report that "the Greek Cypriot proposals aim at dividing the island into 5 cantonal areas." On this date, BIRLIK, on pages 1 and 2, carried a report by TAK News Agency which, among other things, says: "In order to realize how ludicrous the Greek Cypriot proposals are, it is sufficient to glance at the resources which the Greek Cypriot map is prepared to allocate to the Turkish Cypriots. These are: About 20 percent of the island's territory; 4.46 percent of the subterranean water resources; 0.20 percent of the surface running water; 14.30 percent of fertile arable land; no mineral resources; 12 percent of the hotel space and 2 percent of the industrial installations."

The editorial then continues: "The frontiers, which coil like a snake, are in the shape of interlines, which are bound to render our internal defense very difficult and expose us to Greek Cypriot attacks similar to those in 1963."

On 13 October 1980, BOZKURT, on page 1, carried a statement by the Communal Liberation Party which calls on Greek Cypriots to act with earnestness and responsiblity.

On the same date, BIRLIK, on page 1, carries an editorial which says: "Our Greek Cypriot neighbors have not yet been able to rid themselves of the complex of looking upon us as 'second class citizens.'" The writer then calls on some of the Turkish Cypriot opposition parties which, by their attitude, tend to encourage Greek Cypriot fanaticism, to reconsider their stand.

On 13 October 1980, HALKIN SESI, on page 3, carries an editorial by Resat Kazim who is highly critical of the Greek Cypriot mentality. The writer says: "The Greek Cypriots are behaving as if they had emerged victorious from the Cyprus conflict and as if they were in a position to impose conditions of surrender on the Turkish Cypriot community.... However, this negative attitude of the Greek Cypriots will only serve to inspire us with the need to be more vigilant."

MIKHAILIDHIS ANNOUNCES FORMATION OF NEW DEMOCRATIC FRONT

NC151240 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 15 Oct 80 p 8

[Statement by House President Mikhailidhis on 14 October announcing the establishment of new political party]

[Text] Following a long period of incessant and painful pondering, I feel obligated to communicate to the Cypriot people my thoughts, appraisals and intentions.

During critical hours like the present, when our people have been living in uncertainty and suffering agony over future developments, it is more than ever necessary to make correct attestations on which to base the responsible charting of our course. The critical nature of circumstances does not allow any Cypriot to adopt a compromising or neutral stand because this would be impermissible apathy toward the national trial, the outcome of which will determine our survival.

It is a commonly known fact that our internal front is being shaken dangerously and that our political situation is seriously sick. Wrong appraisals, inappropriate actions, omissions and inefficiency in many fields have created terrible impasses.

The death of the great leader, Archbishop Makarios, left a people struggling and mobilized at the bastions of a common struggle for freedom and justice. But, unfortunately, these people are gradually being led into languor, uncertainty and lack of confidence. Instead of a solid internal front, we note strong signs of disintegration. The indisputable prestige and trustworthiness of the state created during the responsible leadership of the late Makarios are today showing signs of decline and wavering.

Of course, it was known that Markarios' death left a huge vacuum that could not be filled by anyone because nobody by himself possessed Makarios' personal prestige, dynamism, grandeur or political stature. Unfortunately, there was no practical recognition of the need for a collective repsonsibility to attain a sound appraisal of the problems and possibilities, and a sound establishment of the great responsibilities that resulted from the continuation of the struggle following Makarios' death; and as a result, today we find ourselves dejected, weak and with many problems in front of us.

Institutions that should have been esteemed and respected are shaking. The sense of authority has been dangerously changed with repercussions on its power of persuasion and effectiveness. This weakness of authority definitely fails to inspire militant courage or to consolidate the feeling of security among our people. On the contrary, it promotes a climate of doubt and insecurity that will inevitably affect the course of both our struggle and our economy.

Our achievements in the economic field, amid the ruins from the Turkish invasion and the continuing occupation, have been admirable. But today we have already entered a period of economic crisis, the consequences of which are already being felt--these consequences might even become painful. This economic crisis has its roots in the international crisis and in endogenous factors. But apart from this, I fear that the climate of insecurity and the lack of confidence will be the most basic element that will strike our economy and cause deterioration, thus jeopardizing what our people have achieved through strenuous labor. Unfortunately, the mentality of verbalism, self-praise and comfortability, as well as the lack of facing reality have resulted in an inability to take immediate and effective actions.

The Democratic Party which was established as the political bastion to represent pro-Makarios people outside the leftwing has, unfortunately, been subjected to the unpleasant consequences of the government's unfortunate activities, despite the fact that this party has never been allowed to play any role in making government decisions.

It has suffered blows from all sides in connection with questions that concerned the country's administration, although as a party it was not the one that was governing, and although it did not have the right to defend or protect itself as a party. Persistent efforts by cadres who were concerned over the continuous weakening of the party and who stressed the need for its structure, operation, and relations with the government to be placed on foundations that would save the party, have been ineffective.

Based on these established facts, I have arrived at the conclusion that it is imperative to take immediate and decisive action in order to reorganize the center and the democratic rightwing and to prevent polarization with all its tragic consequences.

Therefore, I believe that, having myself been one of the protagonists for the organization of the party, I have to face the dire and painful need to disassociate my political position and to withdraw from the Democratic Party. Moreover, I have to face the resulting supreme duty to contribute, within the measure of my ability, to resolving the current impasse.

I believe that, in addition to other things, the political organization of the people constitutes a great contribution to the supreme struggle for national survival and vindication because this is the only way that the people will be able to express themselves and participate in the struggle.

With courage and political consistency, we shoulder our responsibilities and announce the establishment of a political party under the name of Nea Dhimokratiki Parataxis [New Democratic Front].

The establishment of the New Democratic Front is imperative. As a self-sufficient political movement, it has the ambition to offer a political roof to all those who are within the wider center and the democratic rightwing which, we believe, is the biggest political arena. Our goal is not to fight the president or the government or anyone, because we do not seek to destroy but to contribute. Thus, we will not fail to support any government action that we consider positive. We particularly wish to give the assurance that we will show solidarity for all government efforts to promote our national cause.

This political expression is urgently needed to establish the political equilibrium and steadiness necessary for the mobilization of the struggle. It is also needed because the current state of political affairs clearly shows signs of political polarization which, if allowed to consolidate and grow, will bring great calamities to the country.

But if this is to be achieved, phraseological formats are not enough. Messages, systematic organization work from within democratic methods and processes are needed.

No one by himself and no political power by itself can save this country. What is needed is a deep sense of a universal duty and a positive facing of the fact that everyone must contribute to resolving the problems.

The ambition of the New Democratic Front is to serve as the political roof that will represent this area. The principles, the philosophy and the platform of the party will be announced shortly during the founding congress.

We call on all those who are pondering and who are concerned about the future of the country and of our people, and who belong to this area, to work for the creation of this political force, which will depend on collective responsibility and contributions. The gates of the New Democratic Front will be wide open to all those who believe in its principles and goals. We extend our hands to work collectively and secure in our country political equilibrium and the necessary power to find a lasting, fair and viable Cyprus solution in the interest of all the people of Cyprus, irrespective of religion or ethnic extraction.

MILITARY TRIBUNAL ARRESTS NSP LEADER ERBAKAN, ASSOCIATES

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan, former Konya Deputy Sener Battal and former Konya Senator Ahmet Semsi Hatip have been arrested by the Ankara Martial Law Command Second Military Tribunal. According to information obtained by Turkish Radio and TV Administration [TRT] correspondent, the tribunal also issued arrest warrants in absentia for 18 NSP members.

The arrest warrant from the Public Prosecutor's Office for Necmettin Erbakan and his 20 colleagues, who were being investigated in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 163 of the Turkish penal code, was refused by the First Military Tribunal. The Public Prosecutor's Office then appealed to the Second Military Tribunal, which reached a decision on the issue today. The tribunal issued arrest warrants for Erbakan, General Administrative Council members Sevket Kazan, Oguzhan Asilturk, Ali Guneri, Fehim Adak, Ahmet Remzi Hatip, Suleyman Arif Emre, Fehmi Cumalioglu, Recai Kutan, Abdurrahim Bezci, Mazhar (Gul Canbayatli), Lutfi Dogan, Korkut Ozal, Ali Oguz, Yasim Hatipoglu, Abdullah Tomba, Kadir Misirlioglu Mustafa Yazgan, Ali Riza Ozturk and Mehmet Okur, National Assembly group spokesman Sener Battal and the leader of the NSP youth branches, Ahmet Oguz. Erbakan, Battal and Hatip were taken to prison. The arrest warrants for the other members were sent to the pertinent authorities.

Regional Command on Arrests

[Text of 15 October statement issued by the Army IV Corps, Ankara, Cankiri and Kastamonu Martial Law Command Press and Public Relations Bureau]

[Text] NSP Leader Necmettin Erbakan and the General Administrative Council members of the aforementioned party, who were being investigated by the Ankara Martial Law Military Prosecutor's Office for violating Article 163 of the Turkish penal code by engaging in activities aimed at transforming the Turkish Republic into a state based on religious principles, were arrested by the Ankara Martial Law Second Military Tribunal. The military prosecutor's request to arrest Erbakan and his colleagues was rejected by the judge of the Ankara Martial Law First Military Tribunal on 11 October 1980. The Military Prosecutor's Office objected to the decision within the authorized time. The authorized judge of the Martial Law Second Military Tribunal, who examined the file, deemed the objection appropriate and decided to issue arrest warrants in absentia on Erbakan, Administrative Council members Sevket Kazan, Aguzhan Asilturk, Sener Battal, Ali Guneri, Fehim Adak, Ahmet Remzi Hatip, Suleyman Arif Emre, Fehmi Culalioglu, Recai Kutan, Abdurrahim Bezci, Mazhar Gurcan Bayatli, Lutfi Dogan, Korkut Ozal, Yasim Hatipoglu, Abdullah Tomba, Kadir Misirlioglu, Mustafa Yazgan, Ali Riza Ozturk, Mehmet Okur and Ahmet Oguz.

In addition, the Second Army and Konya Martial Law Military Tribunal issued arrest warrants on 14 October 1980 to Erbakan, Sener Battal, Tahir Buyukkorukcu, Ahmet Remzi Hatip and Ahmet Oguz for violating Article 163 of the Turkish penal code during the open air rally held by the NSP in Konya on 6 September 1980. Erbakan, Battal and Hatip were sent to prison today. The public is hereby informed.

COUNCIL SETS DEADLINE FOR RELINQUISHING FIREARMS

[Text] Law No 2,305, which was passed on 25 September 1980, stipulated that weapons without permits must be relinquished to the relevant authorities by the end of the working day of 13 October 1980.

Through information reaching the National Security Council, it was observed with satisfaction that numerous weapons were handed over as a result of our citizens' trust and belief in our state, through their sincere support and in an effort to be of assistance.

In view of the difficulties entailed in bringing the weapons from long distances and the time lost due to the general census, the deadline envisaged by the above law has been extended until the end of the working day of 17 October 1980 through National Security Council Communique No 29.

PRIME MINISTER, LABOR LEADERS DISCUSS ISSUES

[Text] Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu received the Executive Council members of the Turkish Confederation of Labor [Turk-Is] at the prime ministry at 1400 and conferred with them for some time. Social Security Minister Sadik Side was also present at the meeting.

In a statement to reporters after the meeting, Turk-Is leader Ibrahim Denizcier said that views on labor life and social security bills were exchanged during the meeting. He added that Ulusu gave assurances that various bills favorable to workers will be ratified. He noted that the prime minister told him that directives will be sent to those concerned ordering the payment of workers bonuses on 14 October.

U.S. DELEGATION TO ARRIVE FOR DEFENSE PROJECTS TALKS

[Text] Meetings on joint defense projects cited in the Turkish-American defense and economic cooperation agreement will be held in Ankara on 16 and 17 October. According to information received from the Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General, a U.S. delegation headed by Vitalij Garber, deputy under secretary of defense, will arrive in Ankara on Wednesday. The Turkish delegation at the talks will be headed by Lt Gen Ragip Ulubay, the National Defense Ministry deputy under secretary and chief of supplies and technology.

The meetings will be held in accordance with the complementary agreement--which is the second addition to the Turkish-American defense and economic cooperation agreement--on defense industry cooperation. The delegations will discuss the production of anti-tank weapons, propellant charges [sevk barutu] and various types of missiles, the modernization of tanks and aircraft, the expansion of existing installations and the construction and repair of modern warships.

The communique says:

1. During searches and other operations carried out in the martial law area between 28 September and 10 October, A) 120 persons who were being sought on charges of carrying firearms without a license, writing ideological graffiti on walls, hanging posters, distributing pamphlets, violating the martial law bans and of involvement in various incidents were caught. B) Twelve pistols, one rifle, 168 rounds of ammunition of various caliber, 24 shotgun shells, two knives, one bomb, two Molotov cocktails, 5 meters of dynamite fuse, 2 kg of pellets and a large number of banned publications were confiscated.

2. A total of 377 persons were apprehended between 12 September 1980 and 10 October 1980. Of these, 140 persons were detained and 40 were arrested. The preliminary investigation of 173 persons continues. The rest, 124 persons, have been released. [all numbers as heard]

3. The receptivity displayed by our citizens for the success of these operations and in connection with the turning in of unlicensed firearms as well as their obeyance of the martial law bans and officials exceed any appreciation we might express. I am convinced that our citizens will continue to display the same receptiveness.

[Signed] Lt Gen Tevfik Alpaslan, 1st Tactical Air Force and Eskisehir, Afyon and Kutahya Martial Law commander.

Army VII Corps Report

TA121813 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Oct 80

[Statement issued by the Army VII Corps and Diyarbakir, Urfa, Mardin, Siirt, Hakkari and Van Martial Law Command Press and Public Relations Bureau]

[Text] An operation was carried out in the Gulyazi Village of Hakkari's Uludere District on 10 October 1980 following information received that Nazif Durmaz Oncu, one of the arms smugglers who clashed with security forces in the Tanin Mountains on 21 and 22 August 1980, was recruiting fugitives fleeing from the security forces after the 12 September 1980 operation, and that he was preparing for various incidents. An armed clash erupted when the terrorists fired at the security forces at the entrance of the village. Five terrorist militants were killed and seven were captured wounded. A Kalashnikov automatic rifle, 40 rounds of ammunition, a pistol and 100 Iraqi dinars were found at the scene of the incident. The public is hereby informed.

Murderers of American Sentenced

[Summary] "Kadir Tandogan and Ahmet Taner, murderers of two persons, one of them an American, in Etiler, Istanbul, last April were sentenced to death today. Kadir Tandogan, Ahmet Taner and Hakki Kolgu killed (Alberto San Novello), an American, and Sabri Bayraktar in Etiler on 16 April. While fleeing from the scene of the incident, they engaged in an armed clash with the security forces and were caught in Emirgan. Hakki Kolgu, who was wounded in the clash, died in a hospital."

Tandogan and Taner were tried at the 3d Military Tribunal of the Istanbul Martial Law Command. They received death sentences for violating the constitutional article on the unity of the state, for being active members of an illegal organization that aims at replacing the free democratic and constitutional system in Turkey by a Marxist-Leninist order through an armed struggle, and for committing the crime of forcibly trying to abolish the Constitution and the Turkish Grand National Assembly.

"Meanwhile, the Military Court of Appeals today approved the death sentence of terrorist Serdar Soyergin who was one of the murderers of Capt Bulent Angin in Adana on 14 September. The court also approved the 11-year prison sentence of Ayhan Cansin, the other terrorist who participated in the attack."

Istanbul Police Antiterrorist Actions

[Text] Teams of the Istanbul Security Directorate have shot and killed terrorist Recep Yildiz. Yildiz was suspected of committing eight murders, including those of three security officers, and a large number of robberies. The security forces also apprehended three other terrorists who were involved in the same incidents.

Our correspondent has learned from Istanbul Security Directorate officials that the police teams received information from three persons they interrogated after arresting them in Ferikoy 2 nights ago. Acting on the information, the police teams raided a house in Ferikoy. Recep Yildiz who was in the house fired at the police. He was shot and killed. Four guns, 37 rounds of ammunition and a large number of ammunition clips were found on the three suspects and on Yildiz. Following ballistic tests, it was determined that these weapons were used in the murder of policemen Rustem Altinyurt and Faruk Selcioglu and night watchman Kamil Aslan in Istanbul. It was also understood that the same weapons were used in the murder of Umit Tokac in 1978, of Haydar Aydin, Hasan Donmez, Cavit Ozel and Mehmet Erdem this year and in the wounding of Osman Gulsoy and Sabit Benahettin Kavatas.

Security Directorate officials also said that the suspects were involved in a large number of armed robberies.

Army VIII Corps Report

TA141953 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 14 Oct 80

[Army VIII Corps, Elazig, Malatya, Tunceli, Bingol, Mus and Bitlis Martial Law Command Press and Public Relations Bureau Statement]

[Text] 1. Armed terrorists tried to rob a bus on its way from Tunceli to Erzincan on 6 October at about 2300. An armed clash erupted between the terrorists and security forces which intervened immediately. One terrorist was captured and the remainder escaped failing to rob the bus.

2. Security forces launched an operation in Guzelpinar Village in Tunceli's Nazimi District on 13 October. The operation was launched following tips by citizens and an investigation conducted after the incident.

3. Five terrorists, who were the perpetrators of the above-mentioned incident and who were involved in various illegal activities in Tunceli, such as firing at security forces, robbery and illegal possession of goods, were captured as a result of this operation. They are members of a divisive organization. They were captured together with an automatic Kalashnikov rifle, a 9-mm pistol, two 7.65-mm pistols, a hunting rifle, many illegal publications, 19,000 Turkish liras, a watch and various written robbery plans.

During these operations, 561 pistols of various types, 18 automatic pistols, 24 rifles, 45 shotguns, 18 handgrenades, and some 11,135 rounds of ammunition of various kinds, numerous explosive devices, magazines and a wireless set were confiscated. The public is hereby informed.

VOTCP APPLAUDS ARREST OF TURKES, NAP LEADERS

[Station commentary: "The Reaction of the People's Forces Is Squeezing the Junta"]

[Summary] "The fascist Turkes and the NAP administrators have been arrested. It was announced that some of the biggest arms smugglers were also detained around the same time." The fact that Turkes and his colleagues were arrested and charged with responsibility for massacres confirms the warnings by progressive and democratic forces that NAP and its affiliated organizations constitute the main source of anarchy. "This nest of terror was collaborating with international arms smugglers in order to transform the country into a sea of blood and thus seize power." The fascist NAP members were placed in key positions in the country and had penetrated the army. The clearest proof of this is the fact that Turkes was hiding in the 28th Division.

The Turkish Communist Party had called on all progressive and democratic persons to unite against this main source of terrorism. Our people's reaction to fascist terrorism is very pronounced. "The fact that the junta arrested Turkes, the NAP administrators and some arms smugglers is a consequence of this inevitable reaction. However, through this action, the junta does not aim to eliminate terrorism. It merely wishes to validate the claim that it is opposed to rightist terrorism as well and, on this basis, to continue its attacks against progressive and patriotic forces." The generals of the junta are dependent on NATO and imperialists, and it is U.S. imperialists and NATO who have unleashed the fascist NAP on our people. Moreover, the generals are protecting the interests of monopolistic bosses, who were supporting the NAP. The junta is also continuing to oppress antifascist and patriotic forces and increasing the pressure on the Kurdish people.

"Patriots within the army who are opposed to fascist terrorism should support the struggle of our people and the democratic forces." All innocent patriots should be released immediately and tortures should be stopped.

PRESIDENT EANES DENIES LINKS WITH COMMUNISTS

[Report on question-answer portion of press conference held by Portuguese President Ramalho Eanes at Belem Palace on 14 October--passages within quotation marks recorded voice of Eanes]

[Excerpts] Questioned in connection with his advocacy of the formation of a central political bloc, Gen. Ramalho Eanes replied: "In effect I have been advocating the establishment of a central bloc. Why? Because I believe that such a central bloc could enable us to consolidate democracy, could provide a better answer to our development needs and expectations and also because it might make possible the mobilization and organization of the ablest among us to tackle the approaching crisis.

"I have, however, maintained that this whole process should not be the result of a permanent (?initiative) or action conducted by the president of the republic but should rather come about through the recognition of such a need by the political parties."

During this question-and-answer period General Ramalho Eanes took various opportunities very clearly to dissociate himself from the Portuguese Communist Party and even to reject charges that he somehow intends to negotiate with the Communists for their support. He also rejected charges that he has taken up the role of leader of the opposition or leader of the left, and linked this rejection with the topic he had raised before: "For one thing, it is obvious that there is no place in this central bloc for the Communist Party as a component. There is no place because this central bloc must necessarily advocate Portugal's membership in the EEC and Portugal's continued membership in NATO as a fully-fledged member; it must uphold private enterprise and the right to compensation for nationalizations. All this adds up to a development model and a social blueprint that are not in keeping with the model and social blueprint advocated by the Communist Party.

"The Communist Party will therefore have no place in this central force although, obviously, it must continue to exist as a political force of some significance represented in parliament. That is as far as the relationship between the Communist Party and the central bloc is concerned. As for the relation between the Communist Party and the president of the republic, it seems to me that the matter should by now be sufficiently clear. I have always maintained that I have nothing in common with the concepts, methods and goals of the Communist Party, nothing in common at all. I have never concealed the fact that my outlook on society has nothing in common with the Communist Party's outlook. I have never concealed this and have stated it repeatedly. Moreover, through my own actions I have shown that this stand stems from a very deep-rooted resolve and consistency. In this regard I would remind you of the events of 25 November 1975. There is therefore absolutely nothing between the Communist Party and myself. I support models, projects and goals that are antagonistic to those of the Communist Party."

Stating very clearly that he has never been a member of the Communist Party and that he does not--and never will--work to further its causes, the president challenged those who accuse him of having allowed Communists into governments formed in the past by presidential initiative to name such Communists and prove their allegations.

Eanes next replied to a question on the relations between the president of the republic and the majority government.

"Are there any irrevocable differences between the president of the republic and the majority on matters of principle? My answer is that there are not. There are no such differences because our political concepts and the models of society we advocate are very similiar; I would indeed say that they are identical.

"If no differences exist, why, then, this real or apparent conflict? Possibly because we have different views on the methods and instruments to be used in the context of a democratic regime.

"I cannot agree, for example, to an electoral law drafted by the forces in power to enable them to remain in power indefinitely [words indistinct] which would disregard the basic principle of alternation in power--basic for a democratic regime, basic in order to overcome deadlocks and crisis situations. Obviously I cannot accept this sort of thing.

"Secondly, I cannot accept that in a democracy power should be concentrated in such a way that the regime stays democratic only on the surface, on the facade. I think it indispensable that power be distributed in a balanced manner. I cannot accept people neglecting the creation of conditions for alternation in power.

"It is in these area that, I think, our differences lay. If these differences should disappear the problems would be extraordinarily simplified. And I ask: Am I or am I not right?"

REPORT ON PROCEEDINGS AT CSCE PREPARATORY SESSION

LD151554 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1411 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Correspondent Jose Manuel Salgado report from Madrid's Palace of Congresses and Exhibitions on preparations for Madrid CSCE session--live or recorded]

[Text] This morning's session of the CSCE preparatory session was marked by the absence of any change in the positions of recent days. The Western delegations once again expressed themselves in agreement with the Spanish proposal, while those of the East backed the proposal from Hungary, Czechoslovakia and the GDR.

As he left the meeting, Soviet Ambassador Dubinin was pessimistic, saying that his country would like to see progress so that some serious work could be done. Kampelman, head of the U.S. delegation, for his part, in the course of the session made a long address speaking of the absolute need to reach agreement so that the conference which begins 11 November might get under way without lacking a timetable and agenda, a state of affairs which many observers and even some delegates now fear. The situation is clear-cut. One side wants to trim the work of the conference and leave the two phases clearly separate, while the other side wants the work to continue longer and for provisions to be made for any point to be raised at any time. Whatever the case, Spanish Delegate Javier Ruperez is apparently lunching privately with Dubinin and Kampelman. Perhaps this might signify the beginning of a more effective phase of the negotiations.

FOREIGN MINISTER BACK FROM MOROCCO, OFF TO STRASBOURG

[Excerpt] Spanish Foreign Minister Perez Llorca is just back from Morocco and is already due to go off again on a trip to Strasbourg on official diplomatic business. He travels there in his capacity as chairman of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe. This afternoon Perez Llorca is due to hold an informal meeting with the foreign ministers of the Twenty-One and also with his Swiss counterpart, Mr Aubert.

Tomorrow Perez Llorca is to chair a meeting of the Committee of Ministers of the Council, which will hear a report on the Madrid CSCE meeting, analyze relevant points with a view to reducing social and economic imbalances among member countries, and examine the situation in Turkey.

At the request of France, the ministers will exchange views on the reappearance of fascist movements and the implications of this for racial matters, and, according to well-informed sources, on the basis of a Spanish proposal, will study a system of cooperation to combat terrorism.

BOELLING REPORTS ON CABINET MEETING ON RELATIONS WITH GDR

DW160858 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1215 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Correspondent Elsner interview with State Secretary Klaus Boelling, head of the Press and Information Office of the Federal Government, in Bonn--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] The Federal Cabinet met in Bonn this morning to draw conclusions from the drastic increase in the minimum conversion rates for visitors from West Berlin and the Federal Republic instituted by the GDR, and from the latest demands on the Federal Republic raised by SED chief Erich Honecker. Now, I have said they intended to draw conclusions; did they?

[Answer] As always at the opening of such a cabinet meeting, an analysis was made, a very thorough discussion on the basis of a lecture by Federal Minister Franke. At the end of this discussion the cabinet approved the statement by the chancellor which he had made in Berlin Sunday, namely, that detente policy has suffered a serious setback and that the GDR leadership must be aware that a measure such as the arbitrary increase of the minimum conversion rate considerably burdens the relationship between the two German states. The cabinet also discussed the Gera speech by the chairman of the GDR State Council, declaring that at the moment we do not intend to do anything, in fact we must not do anything, that would be bound to cause additional trouble to the citizens in the two German states and the people in Berlin.

In concluding the cabinet meeting the chancellor emphasized two aspects, namely: We here in the Federal Republic of Germany would be violating the principles that the cohesion of the nation must be preserved and strengthened if we were to counteract a policy of delimitation wanted by the GDR with a policy of delimitation of our own, or if we were to respond that way. In the Federal Cabinet's assessment this is a policy against the interests of the people affected. Being aware of its special responsibility for the continuation of detente policy in Europe the Federal Government in the future, too, will act accordingly, refusing to be urged to pursue a policy of pinpricks.

It is and will remain the objective of the Federal Government to work toward the retraction of the increase in the minimum conversion rate. For the time being, however, and this is an important point, the Federal Government does not see any call for negotiating on the so-called swing, that is, on the interest-free credit overdraft granted to the GDR, and on important projects discussed in the past such as in connection with traffic matters, improvement in railroad transport, and energy issues.

[Question] If I understood you correctly, what matters first of all is to achieve a retraction of the increased conversion rate. This, hence, is the first, obvious step?

[Answer] This is what we keep endeavoring. I was asked a while ago whether the cabinet discussed the question concerning a remuneration or a lump sum payment. No, such considerations were not topical as far as the cabinet was concerned.

[Question] In conclusion, let me ask you this for the sake of clarification, perhaps: The recognition of a separate GDR citizenship and the conversion of the permanent missions of the two German states into embassies are out of the question as far as Bonn is concerned?

[Answer] Yes. The Federal Cabinet did not even discuss these questions, nor was it necessary, for in this respect the other side, the GDR leadership, ought to know that this is out of the question for us, that as far as we are concerned there will not be any revision to the Basic Treaty.

OFFICIALS ASSESSES STATE OF INTER-GERMAN RELATIONS

Franke Interview

DW171003 Bonn DIE WELT in German 17 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

[Peter Philipps interview with Egon Franke, federal minister for inter-German relations; place and date of interview not given]

[Text] WELT: Not negotiating on certain measures for the time being: Is that all? Is this the broad variety of instruments which Government Spokesman Boelling mentioned as a reply to East Berlin's measures of delimitation?

Franke: We carefully analyzed the whole thing and arrived at the unanimous view that we do not want to counteract this recognizable policy of delimitation efforts by the GDR with the same method. This means that we will not be pushed into any situation of distress and that we will try to treat everything constructively which might contribute toward continuing detente. We have been aware from the very outset that in so doing we will also run up against partners who will not particularly bend over backwards in their zeal to outdo us.

WELT: Do you agree with the impression that Honecker's current behavior has been initiated, or at least promoted, by Moscow for the sake of making the alliance in the East more immune to Western influence after the events in Poland?

Franke: We must assume that these people live in an alliance--as we do--and that there is a common platform, of course, in the event of such developments. But the speech which Mr Honecker gave in Gera primarily served the year of party indoctrination, or whatever it is called, stressing well-known matters. The old demands of being treated as an independent state are being raised again.

In many fields we have made headway in our efforts to serve mutual interests, without satisfactory answers having been provided from the GDR's viewpoint. Now it is necessary to find out how starting points might emerge; after all, we have the CSCE followup conference, and there will be other international forums.

Furthermore, there are arrangements with the other sphere which have been settled and which are not affected; we have many meetings in mixed commissions which sporadically convene for the purpose of carrying out the concluded agreements, seeking ways of promoting developments.

WELT: This means that wherever it is possible you plan to continue as before, and simply set everything else aside?

Franke: Yes.

WELT: Formerly, when situations turned problematic, telephone contacts existed between Mr Honecker and the chancellor. Did this work this time?

Franke: No.

WELT: Why not?

Franke: The whole thing developed without any move similar to consultations, and we consider this a highly striking violation of the business basis on which many things have developed jointly. We stick to the principle that arrangements must contribute to mutual benefit.

WELT: The opposition has put forward an offer now on ensuring a broad, common basis in the policy toward East Berlin. Will the Federal Government respond to these offers?

Franke: You could see for yourself: The Federal Government directly after the meeting at which it discussed the subject informed all the Bundestag groups, and they all dispatched their legitimate representatives.

Should anything change, this course will be followed again immediately so as to inform the others. Hence, the degree of information required does exist, but options for any actions out of this situation cannot be enhanced even by new institutions.

WELT: Are you afraid that more negative announcements will be forthcoming from East Berlin in the next few days?

Franke: I fail to see why, and the other side has also tried to explain in the official explanations that what is involved is solely the problem of the currencies. It is not new that some voices also are advocating a hard course of delimitation. To these people--in conformity with others--additional options have arisen as a result of a certain development in Eastern Europe.

WELT: The charge has been passed on via the official "GDR" news agency ADN that espionage was committed during an opinion poll among East Germans made from West Berlin by telephone. Doesn't this indicate Honecker's next step, namely, cutting off telephone contacts?

Franke: I would regret it very, very much if these options were further developed at all, if this argument were used to curtail a communication facility which has been successful. But I think this also makes it clear to the people living over here that they must not unnecessarily descend to the level of trouble inciters. I would deem this regrettable.

After all, everybody now realizes how successful this detente policy really was, otherwise any lamentation in the face of the forthcoming restriction would prove superfluous.

WELT: It is undeniable that a pause has emerged in detente. What are the prospects, when will we emerge again from the inter-German glacial period?

Franke: I cannot assess anything at all in terms of time periods.

WELT: And what about countermeasures?

Franke: The suggestion has been made that the payments be cut. We have clearly stated that we will not reply to a change in the business basis with violations of agreements, and everything in the way of payments to the GDR has been contractually stipulated on our part.

What we must watch, however, is the projects which we have agreed on with the other side for reasons of stabilization: Take the road fees, which have been settled on a long-term basis with a view to a further normal development of road traffic. It will be necessary to watch this closely in order to bring this up in talks, if necessary.

WELT: East Berlin also disseminated word via the news agency ADN that they withheld the mandatory currency conversion until after the Bundestag elections. What meaning, or ulterior motive do you see in this hint?

Franke: This statement in itself is a contradiction. For what good does it do if they say now suddenly in the context of all these measures which we strictly reject: This has been held back so far out of a certain deportment of complicity. After all, this suggests a certain friendly relationship. But quite to the contrary we feel hit very hard by what has happened, and we are reacting accordingly.

Gaus Speech in GDR

LD161644 Hamburg DPA in German 1507 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] Dresden (DPA)--In his speech in Dresden this evening at the opening of the FRG's first film week in the GDR, the head of the Federal Republic's permanent mission in East Berlin, Guenter Gaus, made a clear reference to the present strains in inter-German relations. However, the Federal Government is determined to continue to develop communications between the two German states "despite all difficulties and obstacles." It was for this reason that the considerations as to whether the opening of the film week was right and proper in the present circumstances had not led to a cancellation.

Speaking in the Prager Strasse film theater, Gaus stressed that cultural relations demand agreement with one another and understanding of one another, as well as trust and hope for peaceful coexistence despite differing political and social systems. This applies in particular when "the barometer tends to point to refusal and partition." Gaus said the Federal Government would welcome a regular and faster pace of cultural events arranged between the two states. He pointed out that the film week was only the second cultural event which the Federal Government has helped to organize in the GDR, the other being a photographic exhibition in East Berlin in the spring of 1977.

Gaus said the Federal Government has always known that in view of all the circumstances it would be an arduous, difficult and lengthy task to establish as great a degree of normality as possible. "Today we benefit less from it than we did some time ago," he added. However, this would not prevent the Federal Government from making efforts to achieve more for the people in the two German states, and for more security for peace in Europe and the world. Neither of the German states should make the other out to be a bogeyman. Improvements would have to be striven for without illusions, despite the setbacks which would continue to occur for a long time to come.

PRESS COMMENTS ON BONN REACTIONS TO GDR MOVES, RELATED ISSUES

DW161040 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Press review on the Bonn cabinet meeting in reaction to the latest GDR actions]

[Text] BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG writes: As was to be expected the Federal Cabinet at its Wednesday meeting decided as Bonn's response to Honecker's new course what only could be decided in this situation, namely, nothing. There are several reasons for this: In principle it has always been difficult for any Federal Government to fend off East Berlin harassments because the communist regime does in fact still hold 17 million Germans hostage, paying no heed to their wishes and feelings. Besides, the GDR has not violated any existing treaty because the compulsory conversion had not been contractually stipulated whereas all concessions of Bonn to East Berlin have been settled by valid agreements. So, what remained realistically was the hint that for the time being there will not be any negotiations on those projects in which Honecker is interested because they yield him advantages, including the swing, but the SED chief probably had included that in his reckoning.

The Kassel HESSISCHE NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE notes: The sword stays in the sheath. After the drastic increase in the minimum conversion rates the Federal Government will not take any sanctions against the GDR even though the disappointment about East Berlin's course of action is profound. This is ample reason for the opponents to detente policy to call for a harder Bonn course in inter-German relations. Meanwhile, the instruments with which the regime on the other side of the Wall could be hit are narrowly limited.

The demand to curtail the flow of money to bring pressure to bear on the rulers chronically ailing from lack of foreign exchange surely would be a tempting variant, yet considering the close economic intermeshing of the two German states such an action may well turn out to be a boomerang.

HANNOVERSCHE PRESSE stresses this point: The decision of the Federal Government to continue seeking normalization despite the serious setback in policy on Germany and to renounce sanctions is a reasonable and courageous course of action, if alone because it is unpopular. As matters stand there was not much else to do unless one wished to write off as abortive the endeavors for detente, global and partial. It is not surprising that the hawks in the Union exploited their chance. They always knew better, but what did they do, or what could they have done, at the time of the construction of the Wall except to show energetic outbursts of rhetoric?

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU advocates the following view: To many Germans on this side and beyond the Elbe River the decision of the Federal Government is disappointing, especially when people are involved who are directly affected, that is, pensioners and people with relatives in the other part of Germany. The Federal Government, however, can only take this disappointment and embitterment into account if it wishes to act responsibly, for it was clear to all cabinet members even prior to the crisis meeting that Bonn does not have any instruments of power which could be employed immediately to force the GDR to reverse its course. Sanctions on the simple pattern of beer-hall strategists--if they lock out our people we will cut off the desirable Deutsche mark for the communists--are neither possible nor expedient.

SCHWARZWALDER BOTE wonders: What is the reason for this reserve on the part of Bonn? The paper continues: The Federal Government is helpless, it does not have any instrument for exerting direct influence on the GDR. All Bonn payments to East Berlin, such as the road fee, for example, have been contractually stipulated. Violations of treaties are inconceivable as they would hit Berlin and the people living there. There is yet another reason: the developments in Warsaw and potential Moscow reactions to them. Bonn must not allow Honecker to provoke it into doing anything that might serve as a welcome cause for the other side to take violent action against Poland.

The Dortmund WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU, too, discusses the dilemma in which the Federal Government currently finds itself. The paper says: Economic sanctions contrary to agreements concluded are out of the question. In private business, too, a serious contract partner usually does not retaliate in kind when agreements are violated. At best he will go to court, and in international relations this is, first of all, the international public. By increasing the minimum conversion rates the GDR clearly and premeditatively violated the easing of visiting restrictions agreed upon in the CSCE Final Act of Helsinki. Hence it is veritably obvious that this violation of law be brought up as a complaint at the CSCE followup conference in Madrid in the near future.

Reactions to Gaus Replacement

DW161051 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Press review on the replacement of State Secretary Gaus, head of the FRG's permanent mission in East Berlin]

[Text] FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE states: State Secretary Gaus has held this difficult position for 6 years, and he has grown in it. For quite some time he has been one of those who really have an idea about the extremely complicated inter-German conditions. Sending him now to a perhaps remote ambassadorial post would mean the loss of inter-German expertise in this Federal Government which would be hard to repair and basically unnecessary. After all, the Federal Government does not have much of this expert competence. Inevitably the ill feeling crops up that his recall from East Berlin will cause a dangerous gap to emerge particularly in critical times.

And do the people in Bonn, by the way, know for sure whether a new permanent representative would be accredited there at all as Gaus' successor? What Honecker wants through any means is to exchange ambassadors with the Federal Republic. He said so Monday. The replacement of Gaus possibly is more than just a problem for the Bonn coalition negotiations. Thus far FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG says: As the end of Gaus' term as the permanent representative of the Federal Republic in East Berlin draws near, the inter-German political landscape looks worse than ever before. The state secretary cannot be held responsible for that. For more than 6 years Gaus endeavored to relax the inter-German relationship in the human sphere and to make it more clear in political affairs. Gaus' greatest desire, namely arranging a meeting between Chancellor Schmidt and SED chief Honecker, did not materialize. His intensive groundwork was spoiled by political developments shortly before its conclusion, developments on which he, however, could not exert any influence. The abortive Schmidt visit to the GDR probably is the greatest disappointment to Gaus up to now in his entire diplomatic career.

PAPERS VIEW CARTER POLICY IN MIDEAST

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Commentary

DW171025 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 17 Oct 80 p 12

[Commentary signed VCK.: "Carter's Failure"]

[Text] It is a good old practice to desist from burdening the last phase of an election campaign with important foreign policy negotiations. Nevertheless, President Carter has insisted that before the end of the month preceding the presidential elections talks be held in Washington between Egypt and Israel, under U.S. mediation, on the future of the Palestinian Arabs. To avoid irritating the powerful American friend the Egyptians as well as the Israelis have complied with this Carter demand. Israeli Prime Minister Begin even credibly gave the impression that Israel is now prepared to make greater concessions than before with respect to the form of a future autonomy for the Palestinians. And yet, the Egyptian-Israeli talks in Washington failed lamentably. What was achieved was merely vague agreements on future negotiating schedules. Instead of scoring a foreign policy success for the election campaign at the last minute Carter must now tolerate being told that in his Middle East policy, too, he is nearly at the end of his tether.

17 Oct Press Review

DW170848 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Press review on U.S. policy toward the Middle East]

[Text] Discussing the crisis in the Middle East against the background of the U.S. President's most recent statements, NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG writes: U.S. President Carter yesterday termed the Iraqis the aggressors and intruders in the war in the Gulf. At the same time he made it unequivocally clear that Washington will not tolerate any partitions of Iran. A change in course in the White House now, after weeks of strictly observed neutrality? It seems as though Washington hardly has any other choice. Despite the taking of hostages and despite Khomeyni: As far as the United States is concerned Iran ranks over Iraq.

The daily DIE WELT sums up its arguments as follows: U.S. President Carter refers to the territorial integrity of Iran and sharply rejects aggression as an instrument for solving disputes between national states.

Such phrases hint to the mullahs in Tehran that the United States just cannot stay neutral, contrary to what Washington officially says. What the United States primarily has in mind is the hostages, and on a medium-term basis the danger that Iran might mine the Strait of Hormuz. On a long-term basis Washington is thinking of Moscow, which it would not like to see come out the beneficiary of a disintegrating Iran.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN makes the following comment: The conflict on the Gulf opened the gates to Washington of a double-tracked policy. On the one hand the Carter administration wants to see the justified border wishes of Iraq on the Shatt al-Arab benevolently fulfilled through negotiations while maintaining the territorial integrity of Iran, on the other. It is the declared objective of this maneuver to decelerate the Soviet advance into the political vacuum of the region. It is a different question whether this is not a project which goes beyond the means of the Carter administration.

The OLDENBURGER NORD-WEST ZEITUNG argues as follows: What is discernible is the intention of U.S. policy to block the present vacuum in the Gulf region to a point where the Soviet Union cannot derive any political and territorial advantage from the conflict.

This objective is attainable, too, because the Soviet Union cannot take Iraq's side under any circumstances because of the treaty on assistance and friendship it has concluded with Syria. But on the other hand,no rapprochement between Moscow and Tehran is visible, either.

UK LABOR PARTY'S CALLAGHAN RESIGNATION VIEWED

DW161038 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Press review on the resignation announcement by Labor's Callaghan]

[Text] The chairman of the opposition British Labor Party, Callaghan, announced yesterday that he intends to resign from his post. STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN states on the topic: James Callaghan is disembarking, not from a state ship, as did his predecessor Harold Wilson, but from the steamship of the Labor Party on which the different factions of the crew have been fighting each other at knife point for weeks. Whoever still believed that he would stay in order to leave a united party by the time he would withdraw to retirement now finds himself disappointed.

Callaghan has chucked it, having been worn down by the fraternal strife which is not at all new, and being disappointed in his trade union friends who denied him their loyalty when he needed it most. This is not particularly surprising, however, for his real trade union friends retired even before him--a change of generations has taken place which Callaghan only failed to notice. It is also Callaghan's fault that he leaves chaos, and thus aggravated the danger that the Labor Party is all the more likely to split up.

NUERNBERGER NACHRICHTEN makes the following comment: James Callaghan, the old crafty strategist, is leaving the stage. He has drawn the conclusion from two developments of which only one was his responsibility directly: From the very outset he took the responsibility for the devastating defeat in the election against Margaret Thatcher in May of last year which was tantamount to a landslide in the political landscape of Great Britain. In the preceding winter of strikes he failed to achieve a consensus with the rebellious trade unions despite an effort at reconciliation. Callaghan's strict adherence to his five-percent wage guideline ultimately tripped him.

SPD, ADMINISTRATION RESHUFFLES PREVIEWED

DW151530 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 15 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Bonn correspondent Volkmar Hoffmann: "The Chancellor Does Not Want a Crown Prince"]

[Text] Once started rotating it may reach top speed even if nobody really wants it to, namely, the personnel carousel in politics. It may be that the chancellor has his foot on the brake in order to think about his future team at the Klostergut Jakobsbert spa hotel--founded by Emperor Barbarossa in 1157--high above the Rhine valley near Boppard. What suddenly rotates cannot be halted so easily, and sometimes it cannot be stopped at all.

Alfons Pawelczyk, Hamburg Bundestag deputy and defense expert, is an almost classic example of the momentum possessed by political personnel decisions. On 5 October the 47-year-old former major gained more than 1,000 additional first list votes [individuals' list] in his Hamburg voting district no 16 (Wandsbek) and thus won the seat outright. The name of the recognized member of parliament, who has been the chairman of the Bundestag subcommittee for disarmament and arms control questions since 1976, had been noted by the chancellor. In the event the incumbent parliamentary state secretary in the Federal Defense Ministry, Andreas von Buelow, is kicked upstairs to a ministerial post, which is deemed highly probable in Bonn, the chancellor had Pawelczyk in mind as the former's successor. This consideration fits in perfectly with the ideas of Defense Minister Hans Apel.

But this solution does not particularly please the SPD Bundestag group. Because the social democrats won all seven electoral districts in Hamburg, Eugen Glombig, SPD social affairs expert, lost his parliamentary seat since he had only been put on the land [party] list. Glombig is the ace on questions of social and labor law for the SPD group, and Herbert Wehner does not want to have to do without him.

To get out of this dilemma some people are looking around for an appropriate substitute for Pawelczyk. So if in the near future a group of representatives of the SPD group of the Hamburg house of deputies, the SPD land executive board and Hamburg's Lord Mayor Hans-Ulrich Klose deal with the question of who is to be the future senator for the interior of this Hanseatic city and replace Werner Staak, the name of Pawelczyk will probably be mentioned. Formerly Pawelczyk only hesitatingly brushed off such speculations. "The 'uncle' (Wehner is meant by this--FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU) will probably exert gentle pressure concerning Pawelczyk's honor in order to bring Glombig back into the Bundestag," said one of the leading people of the Bonn SPD group.

A large-scale cabinet reshuffle is not to be expected. So far it has only been the SPD executive boards of the party and Bundestag group which have come out on personnel decisions. Wehner's renewed nomination as floorleader did not come as a surprise to anyone in Bonn. Nobody wanted to unhitch him who, as he himself put it, "pulls the cart as long as he is wanted," right at the beginning of the ninth legislative period. What merely exists to date is the proposal advanced to the Bundestag group by Willy Brandt that following the inauguration of the new Schmidt/Genscher cabinet on 6 November, SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski be elected Wehner's deputy. Then we would probably be the number one among the five deputies. The Brandt proposal, made in a sort of euphoria in the presence of journalists and immediately accepted by "Ben Wisch," is considered as the hint that Wischnewski will probably take charge of the Bundestag group's affairs in late 1981. The end of the Wehner era has been rung in.

Electing "Ben Wisch" deputy chairman should be easy for the SPD Bundestag group, since former Federal Ministers Walter Arendt and Friedrich Schaefer did not run in the Bundestag elections two places have become vacant. Horst Ehmke, Karl Liedtke and Helmut Rohde will be in place again aside from the "newcomer" Wischnewski. The fifth position is still open.

Only top politicians of the Social Democrats like Kurt Schumacher, Erich Ollenhauer, Herbert Wehner and Helmut Schmidt attained the dual position after the war which Wischnewski is supposed to assume now. The politician, who comes from Allenstein (East Prussia) and who reached peak popularity with the liberation of the 86 hostages from the hijacked Lufthansa plane "Landshut" in Mogadishu in 1977, has gained experience in many positions. He was development aid minister, proved his worth as SPD federal manager from 1968 to 1972, and resigned voluntarily because the party congress at the time refused to grant him responsibilities despite the victory just scored in the election battle.

His further career stages were parliamentary state secretary in the Foreign Ministry, minister of state in the Genscher ministry, subsequently minister of state in the chancellor's office. "Ben Wisch" has been mentioned as a candidate for the post of governing mayor of Berlin and of foreign affairs commissioner of the European Community.

The SPD news on personnel matters concerning the forthcoming resignation of Federal Manager Egon Bahr is of a different quality. The "news" is nearly 20 months old to the day. Everybody had a chance to read about it in February 1979 as a REUTER report in the newspapers. At the time Bahr had announced in the weekly DIE ZEIT that he would "no longer be federal manager" but "only Bundestag deputy" after the 1980 Bundestag elections.

The criticism of Egon Bahr, voiced after 5 October, charging that the "election campaign was intellectual and alien to the people" was considered even by the chancellor's office as "not very decent." Bahr did not volunteer to take over when Holger Boerner went to Wiesbaden right after the 1976 elections. He was pressed to succeed Boerner. Everybody knew at that time that Bahr was not a cement mixer nor a practicioner in organizational matters.

After the announced withdrawal, speculation continues in Bonn over a successor. Will it be Peter Glotz, senator for research and science in Berlin, or Friedhelm Farthmann, labor minister in North-Rhine Westphalia? The SPD chairman has "two or three names in mind," but he cannot simply give commands. "We do not make any central personnel policy," says Willy Brandt. "We are and always were strongly characterized by an independent personnel policy on the part of SPD land organizations." Yet the public wants to know about Brandt's favorite.

There is also such impatience vis-a-vis the chancellor. It is known in Bonn that there are not many ministries available. It is considered certain that Kurt Gscheidle--although not a Bundestag deputy any more--should at least remain as postal minister. Hardly any doubts exist regarding his qualifications for that department. The former chairman of the Postal Trade Union is respected by the DGB; he has made the post office a financially strong federal enterprise.

The trade unions are not very strongly represented in the cabinet. Next to Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer (Metal Workers Union) and Labor Minister Herbert Ehrenberg (Construction Workers Union), Gscheidle is supposed to remain as a third pillar at the government table--even without a parliamentary mandate.

A great cabinet reform has not been planned by the federal chancellor and his FDP deputy, Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Helmut Schmidt has in mind giving the transport department to Volker Hauff, a department which is at present in Gscheidle's hands together with the post office. The SPD land organization in Baden-Wuerttemberg could complicate matters for the chancellor if Volker Hauff should still replace Erhard Eppler in Stuttgart.

Andreas von Buelow has been mentioned as a potential successor for the research and technology department. So far he has been a parliamentary state secretary in the Defense Ministry. Some faction comrades dislike such considerations. They do not detect a trace of the same "stable smell" on the part of the Dresden-born man.

Much more is not expected to come from the forthcoming government reshuffle. One problem exists in Genscher's department, the Foreign Ministry. The FDP did not request more ministers despite its election victory. Next to Genscher as vice chancellor, the liberals are content with their current crew of ministers: Gerhart Baum (Interior), Josef Ertl (Agriculture and Food) and Graf Lambsdorff (Economy).

The Free Democrats must settle one personnel problem among themselves. A third minister of state is supposed to be established in the future in the Foreign Ministry at their request. The Social Democrats do not object to that. Next to Klaus von Dohnanyi (SPD) and Hildegard Hamm-Buecher (FDP), FDP Deputy Juergen W. Moellemann claims the post of third minister of state for himself. He is said to have the approval of Genscher.

It seems, however, that the new FDP parliamentary member, Guido Brunner, is toying with that position also; he was elected on 5 October on the sixth position of the FDP land list of Baden-Wuerttemberg. The former European Community commissioner for energy, research and science is certainly more at home in the diplomatic business than Moellemann.

Several things are cooking in Bonn's kitchen of personnel rumors. The statement appears, for example, that the chancellor's health is not the very best. He was hospitalized a few times in past years. He was battered by the 1980 election campaign. Who will take over if he should leave? People around him say that Helmut Schmidt does not want to have a crown prince for the office of chancellor.

Rumors seem to be not unfounded that Defense Minister Apel has lost pleasure in his job after the quarrel in connection with the military oath and decorations. Yet Apel will stay. Giving up his office would probably have catapulted Apel out of the top leadership ranks of the government and party for a long time to come.

Helmut Schmidt, who is at present vacationing at Rheinhoehe, can calmly follow the speculations and combinations in the press. Nothing will happen anyway prior to the coalition negotiations between the SPD and the FDP on 27 October. The chancellor is not under time pressure, and the agreement of the FDP not to make any more claims will make it easier for him to decide.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON 'BRUTAL ABOUT-FACE' IN GDR POLICY

[Editorial: "Uninhibited"]

[Text] What is happening in East Berlin? After the economic (but in fact highly political) measures restricting traffic between the two Germanies last week, the speech delivered by Mr Honecker in Saxony on 13 October begs this question. In two crucial spheres--relations between the two Germanies and events in Poland--the GDR has just taken blunt and startling--although not equally new--measures. If made 2 weeks ago such remarks might well have changed the course of the elections in the FRG.

Indeed, as far as inter-German relations are concerned, the about-face is brutal. Of course, it is not that the demands made by Mr Honecker in the name of "realism"--exchange of ambassadors, recognition of East German nationality, cessation of all aid from Bonn to East German fugitives, border rectification--are really unprecedented. However, East Berlin had abandoned its attempt to make them the precondition for establishing good relations with the FRG.

Until the recent postponement of Chancellor Schmidt's visit, East Germany was trying to become a privileged partner of the FRG in the East-West dialogue and seemed to be on the point of succeeding. Of course, since inter-German relations were revived with the December 1972 Basic Treaty the main aim of relations has been trade and the construction of a number of joint infrastructures (notably roads). However, the political significance of such exchanges was obvious, not to mention the agreements between the two states and the large amounts of money paid by the FRG to buy the freedom of East German political prisoners. East Berlin's decisions jeopardize years of patient efforts which tended to make the GDR an honorable partner, at least on the same footing as any other socialist camp country.

Mr Honecker's statements on Poland are, however, not so new: Czechoslovakia had, so to speak, already enjoyed the solicitude with which East Berlin, behind the Soviet "big brother," intends to ensure the "maintenance of socialism" wherever a liberal evolution seems to threaten it. However, the cynical clarity of the threats proffered by the East German head of state against the Polish people was surprising.

It is rather indecent, to say the least, for a German leader, whoever he may be, even--indeed especially--if he claims to follow socialism, to aspire to dictate Poland's conduct, even if it is on behalf of the member countries of a pact which a bitter irony of history has named the "Warsaw" Pact. Mr Honecker's remarks awaken the worst memories: Can he have forgotten, he who was once one of the first anti-Nazis, in what circumstances Berlin decided Poland's fate more than 40 years ago? What would have been said in the GDR or Moscow about the "Bonn revanchists" if the FRG leaders had made one-fourth of the comments which Mr Honecker has made on the Polish affair? As for the East German Communist Party chief's expressions of indignation at foreign interference by the West in Poland's internal affairs, they would prompt irony if they did not strike so many people in Warsaw and elsewhere as tragic. Meanwhile Mr Honecker's warnings are certainly futile: The democracies now feel even less like dying for Danzig than they did 40 years ago.

PAPER BLAMES AL-QADHDHAFI FOR SYNAGOGUE BOMBING

NC151220 Paris AFP in English 1142 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Text] Strasbourg, eastern France, 15 Oct (AFP)--The French secret services believe that Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi set up the bombing of a Paris synagogue early this month, the French Jewish community's weekly magazine said today. JEWISH TRIBUNE reported that French intelligence was "certain" that Libya had organized the attack to embarrass France. Relations between the two countries have been strained for some months with Tripoli accusing France of meddling in African affairs and France supporting Tunisian allegations that Libya was behind an attack on the mining town of Qafsa this spring. JEWISH TRIBUNE said that the attack was directed more against France than the Jews themselves and was intended as retaliation for an alleged French intelligence plan to set up a Libyan government in exile.

PCF LEADER MARCHAIS INTERVIEWED ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

AU090935 Sofia BTA in English 0823 GMT 9 Oct 80

[Text] Sofia, 9 Oct (BTA)--"The Madrid meeting must become an important stage in the strengthening of political detente and in charting out the way to military relaxation of tension", said Mr Georges Marchais, secretary general of the French Communist Party, in an interview to the RABOTNICHESKO DELO correspondent in Paris, Mrs Stefana Bildireva. The secretary general of the French Communist Party emphasized that at its latest congress the party attached great importance to the question of disarmament. "This task is acquiring even greater urgency and importance considering the fact that imperialism is making every effort to resume and to provoke tension in our continent" noted Mr Marchais. He also stated that the French Communist Party has prepared jointly with the other political and social forces in France important initiatives to oppose the decision of deploying new American missiles in Europe and of the production of a neutron bomb by France.

"We have already formulated France's request to undertake the initiative for calling an European conference on arms and disarmament. We called on the French people for a wide-front unification in order to make our country the initiator of bold actions and proposals", said Mr Marchais. Mr Marchais, interviewed immediately after his return from Bulgaria this summer, said: "I saw that Bulgaria is a country without the economic crisis familiar to us in the capitalist world, a country without unemployment. To put it short, a country in full progress, seeking a better labour efficiency and better meeting both the material and the intellectual needs of its people".

PARIS COMMUNISTS PROTEST MARCHAIS PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION

[Text] Five Paris Communist concilors --Francoise Durand, Michel Ferignac, Henri Fiszbin, Jean Gajer and Jean-Jacques Rosat--issued the following statement on Thursday. 16 October, following the PCF national conference which on 12 October appointed Georges Marchais as presidential candidate: "As Paris concilors and Communists we consider it our duty, after the party's national conference, to make our position clear. Like all Communists we have been presented with a fait accompli: The definition of the political content of the presidential election campaign was not democratically drawn up by the grassroots, and party members have been unable to express their opinions. At its own initiative the leadership has adopted a new line contradicting the strategy defined by the 22d and 23d party congresses, and contradicting the policy on the basis of which the workers placed their trust in Communist-elected representatives in 1977 and 1978. We cannot accept the current line which we do not support and which has been decided in violation of the principles of democratic centralism.

"The party secretary general has just stated that democracy requires that, once decisions have been made, everybody should work to implement them with the same will and enthusiasm. Yes, but provided the decision itself has been made democratically. However, that is not the case and, like all Communists, we have been deprived of the democratic rights which membership confers on everybody. In these circumstances we are determined to assume our collective responsibility as party members, and while we will not hinder the campaign of the party and its candidate, we consider ourselves released from the duty to be personally involved in the presidential election battle. We consider that, in present circumstances, this attitude is the only way of facing our responsibilities and asserting our attachment to the fundamental choice, made by the party, of a democratic path to socialism."

GOVERNMENT CRISIS CONSIDERED NEAR SOLUTION

[Text] Rome, 16 Oct (ANSA)--In the minds of most political observers the government crisis opened in Italy September 27 is swiftly nearing a conclusion. The four parties ready to forge the new government of Arnaldo Forlani--the Christian Democrats (DC), the Socialists (PSI), the Social Democrats (PSDI) and the Republicans (PRI)--hammered out the basis of their program, including foreign policy matters, in a joint meeting yesterday. Now that the program is set, the focus of attention has shifted to the structure of the new government. It was thought that this was the center of separate talks Forlani had yesterday with the secretaries of the four prospective government parties: Bettino Craxi (PSI), Pietro Longo (PSDI), Flaminio Piccoli (DC) and Giovanni Spadolini (PRI).

A new wrinkle has cropped up in the problem of assigning cabinet seats, however. The Socialist Party's leftwing faction headed by Claudio Signorile and Riccardo Lombardi released a document yesterday stating that it did not intend to shirk its responsibilities with regard to the party and toward the strengthening of leftwing tendencies in the overall political framework. This was interpreted to mean that the Socialist left wanted two seats in the new cabinet, while the PSI leadership was willing to give them only one seat to leave room for other internal minorities. The leftwing demand could create problems for Craxi, not only inside the party but also vis-a-vis the DC, according to political observers here. The DC might welcome two representatives from the PSI left in the government as this would constitute a "guarantee" against eventual maneuvers from the Socialist minority against the government.

FOREIGN MINISTER, UK'S CARRINGTON DISCUSS IRAQ-IRAN WAR

[Excerpt] Rome, 16 Oct (ANSA)--Italy and Great Britain are following the Iraqi-Iranian war with keen concern and hope that the hostilities do not spread. Meeting for over two hours at the Farnesina here yesterday, Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Britain's Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington stressed the need to keep navigation open in the Persian Gulf and voiced the hope that Jordan would stay out of the conflict. Carrington, who is in Rome as a member of Queen Elizabeth's entourage, agreed with his Italian counterpart that any Jordanian intervention in the hostilities would worsen the Arab-Israel crisis.

The Italian and British Governments fear an entrenchment of positions which would compromise peace initiatives already underway. The two ministers confirmed European determination to pursue the Nine's Mideast policy as forged at the European Council meeting in Venice. This policy has been implemented to some extent already with the Mideast visit of EEC Duty Chairman Gaston Thorn. Mideast policy will be further discussed among the Nine at the European Council meeting to be held in Brussels on December 2 and 3. The outcome of U.S. Presidential elections was also seen as bound to have an important influence on the situation in the Mideast, according to the two foreign ministers.

Carrington and Colombo also discussed Community matters during their Farnesina encounter. The Britisher revewed his government's appreciation of Italian diplomatic moves during negotiations on the British contribution to Community expenditures.

MARIO SOARES VIEWS ELECTION RESULTS, COUNTRY'S NEEDS

LD161327 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 9 Oct 80 p 4

[Nicole Guardiola undated Lisbon interview with Portuguese Socialist Party Secretary Mario Soares: "Referendum Proposed by Democratic Alliance Would Be a Coup d'Etat"]

[Excerpt] Question: For someone who followed the election campaign mounted by your party and the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] the 5 October defeat seems somewhat surprising. What happened?

Answer: We suffered a defeat which we accept, inasmuch as we failed to achieve our main objective, which was to overthrow the Democratic Alliance's parliamentary majority. But it was a relative defeat, inasmuch as we did achieve other important objectives that will be decisive in the medium term. We managed to halt the "Italianization" of democratic socialism. The Democratic Alliance's bid for bipolarization suffered a setback, which will grow deeper in the future. The FRS confirmed itself as the only democratic alternative to the rightwing policy that the Democratic Alliance will now have to implement.

Question: But the Democratic Alliance did increase its majority, despite your forecasts.

Answer: For the past 9 months the government has not governed but used its power to mount a permenent election campaign. It has taken measures aimed at artificially creating certain benefits for the Portuguese people with regard to increased incomes and restraining inflation. It has made many promises and attained only certain specific achievements, which the government has used in the media for its own ends, silencing the opposition's voice. When this was not enough, it did not hesitate to employ even more drastic methods--purges, threats and pressure of all kinds. It is no coincidence that journalists had to hold a symbolic strike on the very day of the elections to condemn the pressures to which they were being subjected. But the majority of the Portuguese people are not yet sufficiently aware of this situation because the Democratic Alliance government has managed to maintain a pretense of democracy. This pretense will now explode as a result of the twofold effects of the crisis--domestic and international--and the bill that the Democratic Alliance will have to pay. The government will now have to implement the Democratic Alliance's real policy, which implies the reestablishment of the major economic and financial groups and the reestablishment of the old ruling class' privileges.

Question: In practice the creation of the FRS coalition brought the Socialists no extra votes. Will you now be revising your policy of alliances?

Answer: We did not secure an overall advance but in some areas our progress is significant, although we are still losing in the rural areas. In general, there was a considerable transfer of votes from the left to the FRS, while we did not make as much progress as we had hoped at the center. In my opinion a more important consideration than the immediate results is the dynamism that the FRS has managed to create and which its adversaries have acknowledged. This dynamism will be strengthened. We will now undertake a "desert crossing" with confidence in ourselves, with the conviction that we represent one-third of the Portuguese electorate.

Question: The Communist Party regressed to its 1976 electoral position and this failure is reflected in a weakening of the left...

Answer:...which still has more votes overall than the right, however. But the PCP's regression is a fact--and in my opinion a positive fact, since the PCP is a factor of stagnation in Portuguese society. The events in Afghanistan and Poland certainly had an influence on the better informed and more politically aware voters, but the decisive fact is that the PCP has created an unfavorable image of itself through its rigidity, its splittism and its antiquated nature.

The workers and young people cannot fail to react to the fact that the Portuguese Communists still cling to the solution of the thirties.

Question: By not rejecting the idea of an agreement on the system with the Socialists, Prime Minister Sa Carneiro is offering the PS a chance to support the constitutional revision proposed by the Democratic Alliance.

Answer: We will continue to advocate the need for dialogue. We believe there are areas for agreement that deserve to be highlighted and not hidden. We agree with the people who say that there must be an end to the Revolutionary Council, that the civilian character of the system must be accentuated and that the system of relations among the state bodies must be improved. We are therefore willing to reach agreements with the forces, whoever they may be, that want to improve the institutions. As for the economic and social system implicit in the constitution, we still advocate a model of competitive coexistence between the public and private sectors. We do not agree with stifling and dismantling the public sector, which we regard as an essential tool in times of crisis such as the one being experienced by Portugal and the entire world. But we also agree with imparting a stimulus to private enterprise, whether individual or cooperative. There should be a broad and detailed dialogue on all these points. It seems to us that the most salutory attitude for the majority would be to seek consensus and not to pose the issue in all-or-nothing terms.

PCP, SOCIAL DEMOCRATS COMMENT ON EANES REMARKS ON ELECTIONS

[Text] The Portuguese Communist Party has said that President Ramalho Eanes's news conference statements were not consonant with the real gravity and serious threat which the Democratic Alliance's strengthened position in parliament and in the government represented for democracy. The party said, in a press release, that Eanes's utterances on Tuesday only went to confirm the notorious and already known differences of opinion and divergences between his and the PCP's stances.

For its part, the Social Democratic Center Party said that by holding the news conference General Eanes had made use of his official position as head of state to relaunch his candidacy for the presidency of the republic. In the eyes of the Portuguese people, the centrists said in a statement, it was clear that during the election campaign for the 5 October parliamentary elections General Eanes did not dissociate himself from the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS], having, in fact, to the very end of the campaign acquiesced in his person and program being identified with and welcoming all the backing from the FRS.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY DESCRIBES MIKHAILIDHIS AS 'DEFECTOR'

NC161027 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 16 Oct 80 pp 1, 10

[15 October Democratic Party statement on House President Mikhailidhis' decision to establish the New Democratic Front]

[Text] An emergency meeting was held today by the Democratic Party Political Bureau, its Executive Committee, its house members, the district committees of the Democratic Party and of the Democratic Party youth organization. The meeting was chaired by Mr Spiros Kiprianou, president of the republic and chairman of the Democratic Party. After a careful study of the party's internal situation following the defection by former Vice Chairman Mikhailidhis and some of his fellow defectors and house members, the following was noted:

Perhaps the political action by Mr Mikhailidhis and some of his associates to withdraw from the party did not surprise many quarters. Their defection and abandonment of the banner, under which they were elected, is not only an unacceptable action from all respects but also a blow to the country's political customs. This apostasy by Mr Mikhailidhis and his fellow apostates during the most critical moments for the party chairman and the party itself, at a time when the president of the republic and his party are under attack from all sides--for reasons that cannot be mentioned now--constitutes a most contemptible act which is tantamount to a stab in the back of the president of the republic and chairman of the Democratic Party.

Mr Mikhailidhis' move has been in the making for a long time now and in fact has been the basic reason for the Democratic Party's deficiency in many fields.

Four years ago, when the Democratic Party embraced the novice politicians--it did so with all goodwill and elevated them to high political levels and positions--it never imagined that 4 years later, these same persons would make efforts to "capture" it or destroy it.

No matter how careful Mr Mikhailidhis was in his statement yesterday, both his action and some of the things he said, are clearly to undermine both the president of the republic and Democratic Party chairman, Mr Spiros Kiprianou, and the party itself.

He spoke about inappropriate actions, omissions, inefficiency, languor of the people, lack of confidence, weaknesses on the part of the authority that--according to Mr Mikhailidhis--had not inspired militant courage and had failed to consolidate a feeling of security among the people; on the contrary [these factors] have promoted a climate of uncertainty and insecurity. He spoke about a mentality of verbalism, self-praise and comfortability as well as about the absence of being in touch with reality.

He said many things which, directly or indirectly, are aimed at the president of the republic and his associates and, therefore, in this context he does not lag behind others who have been trying--for reasons unrelated to reality--to strike at the president of the state and his party. In this context, Mr Mikhailidhis identifies himself with other quarters, at a time of general polemic against the president; something which definitely has another aim and is not solely directed against the president of the republic.

In his effort to undermine and slander the president, who was his [party] president until yesterday, he did not confine his attacks to vague arguments or to totally unfounded allegations, unworthy of a reply; he did not fail to do what many others have also been doing--to invoke and exploit Ethnarch Makarios' name in order to mar his memory and to hide behind it for whatever ambitions or intentions they may have. It is high time that all of them stop exploiting Makarios' sacred name.

Mr Mikhailidhis tries to obscure things by means of "high level" criticism, and he resorts to the usual plausibility that has no connection with truth.

It is indeed regrettable to see that statesmen with 3 to 4 years [of political activity], but having been dizzied by their sudden political ascent, attempt today to disrupt the center and the democratic rightwing. Since we are on the eve of elections, this substantively increases possibilities for creating conditions of polarization. But the worst of all is that they hasten to lightheartedly abandon the president of the republic and Democratic Party chairman during crucial moments.

Many more things can be said but the Democratic Party believes that this is enough for the present. For the Democratic Party, Mr Mikhailidhis and his associates now belong to the past, despite the damage they caused. By this fresh start, declared at today's broad gathering by Democratic Party Chairman Spiros Kiprianou, the leadership, the organs and the cadres of the Democratic Party are determined to continue their course and to completely fill the vacuum in the center and the progressive rightwing, to neutralize any undermining plans--irrespective of origin--and to carry on, in a more organized way, by appropriately furthering the necessary rejuvenation of the party, in order to achieve their goal unselfishly, which is serving the people's interests and primarily our national cause.

After listening to a detailed address by the Democratic Party chairman, today's Democratic Party gathering declared its confidence in the party goals and aims and resolved to give unlimited support to party Chairman Kiprianou calling on him to continue his course, irrespective of obstacles or underminings, in the certainty that the overwhelming majority of the Democratic world would stand by his side so that he can successfully conclude his historical task.

NEW DEMOCRATIC FRONT REACTS TO DEMOCRATIC PARTY STATEMENT

NC161120 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 16 Oct 80 p 10

[15 October New Democratic Front statement]

[Text] The reaction of the Democratic Party gathering, held under Mr Kiprianou's chairmanship, to the statement on the establishment of the New Democratic Front was no surprise. Their answer to our objective attestations and arguments consists of personal attacks and the usual remarks of undermining and so forth. Irrespective of forms of speech, the internal front's situation is most serious, and a solution to their problems cannot be achieved merely by vague statements.

We shall not adopt the [Democratic Party's]--language or tactics because no useful purpose would be served. As for the political attestations, we wish to repeat that political impasses are resolved through a recourse to the people.

Names Parliamentary Spokesman

NC17082 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 17 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Independent Deputy Stavros Ambizas [formerly Kiprianou's Democratic Party spokesman]--made a statement in the House of Representatives yesterday announcing that he was no longer independent but had joined the New Democratic Front [NEDIPA] under the leadership of House President Alekos Mikhailidhis.

At a later stage during the house meeting, NEDIPA Deputy Karamikhalis announced that Ambizas will be the Front's parliamentary spokesman.

Ambizas' appointment as NEDIPA parliamentary spokesman was made yesterday at a meeting of the group of deputies, which was chaired by Mikhailidhis and attended by Deputies St. Ambizas, T. Nemitsas, L. Karamikhalis, P. Lenas and N. Vasiliadhis.

HOUSE CALLS FOR EARLY PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS

NC161548 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] At its session today, the House of Representatives supported the holding of parliamentary elections as soon as possible after certain practical difficulties concerning the amendment of the electoral law have been examined and overcome and after the Interior Ministry has completed the procedure on electoral lists and the election cards. [Present term of office expires in September 1981]

The House has also authorized the Internal Affairs Parliamentary Committee to study the gaps that may be included in the electoral law and follow the work being done at the Interior Ministry with regard to speeding up the completion of the electoral list and election cards.

It was announced during the House session that the Internal Affairs Parliamentary Committee will convene next Saturday to study the electoral law. Additionally, deputies who would like to submit proposals and amendments were called upon to attend the meeting. The House announced that it will also invite the interior minister, or the Interior Ministry official competent for the elections issue, to attend the meeting and brief the House members on the existing difficulties concerning the completion of procedures for holding elections.

POLITICAL CIRCLES DECRY WESTERN INTERFERENCE IN NATIONAL ISSUE

[Text] Reliable political circles, who are well aware of Western intentions toward Cyprus, have stated to O AGON that "any active interference by the West in the Cyprus issue at this time is ruled out."

The same circles stressed that the United States and the West in general do not consider this to be an opportune time for them to interfere in the Cyprus issue because:

First: The new military regime in Turkey is preoccupied with consolidating its position and resolving the country's domestic problems.

Second: They are waiting for the internal political situation in Greece and Cyprus to clear up. These two countries are actually in a preelection period and it is clearly understood that their leaders cannot make the proper political decisions at this time.

According to the same circles:

The Western quarters want the intercommunal dialogue to continue, even if there is currently no hope for its success, in order to keep a channel alive through which, at an opportune time, they could convey their suggestions and proposals for a solution to the problem. At the same time, the continuation of the talks for the sake of talking appears to be also favored by the parties concerned, obviously for domestic reasons.

In the meantime, a British interparliamentary delegation will be visiting Cyprus next December to have an on-the-spot study of the situation with regard to the Cyprus issue.

The British delegation will also visit Greece and Turkey and on its return to Britain will submit a report to the country's government and parliament. The report will suggest concrete proposals for a Cyprus solution.

PRESIDENT KARAMANLIS RETURNS FROM VISIT TO BULGARIA

AT151646 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1600 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Excerpt] President of the Republic Karamanlis returned to Athens at noon after his 3-day official visit to Bulgaria and talks with his Bulgarian counterpart, Zhivkov. The president of the republic was welcomed at Ellinikon Airport by Prime Minister Rallis.

The talks of the Greek president with his Bulgarian counterpart were held in a warm and friendly atmosphere; there was a similarity of view on many bilateral and international issues. In a joint communique that has been published, the two countries stressed their desire to further develop their relations and encourage the development of good-neighborly relations and cooperation among Balkan countries.

Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, who accompanied the president of the republic, returned to Athens with him.

Interview in Sofia

AT161729 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1600 GMT 15 Oct 80

[Text of unidentified Bulgarian television reporter's interview with Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis in Sofia--date not given; recorded]

[Text] [Reporter] [Words indistinct] from your visit to Bulgaria?

[Karamanlis] First of all I should like to say that I have been deeply moved by the reception that was accorded me by President Zhivkov and the Bulgarian people. Furthermore, during my visit we exchanged useful thoughts on both the great problems that currently occupy the world and on the development of relations between our two countries. We determined with satisfaction that these relations are constantly improving. We decided [word indistinct] to seek new ways for maintaining this cooperation in the interest not only of our two peoples but, more generally, in the interest of the Balkans.

[Question] Mr President, what are your impressions of Bulgaria at present?

[Answer] I came to Bulgaria for the first time 5 years ago. During this current visit I have ascertained that during these last 5 years in your country great progress has taken place. This program of course is due to the industriousness and willingness of the Bulgarian people. However, it is also due to your president and my friend, Zhivkov, who has laid stable foundations for Bulgaria's development. You have an excellent president who loves his people and struggles for their prosperity.

[Question] Our last question: How do you view the future of Greek-Bulgarian relations?

[Answer] I view it as bright. This is so because these relations have been consolidated on secure foundations. The warm, friendly feelings manifested by the Bulgarian people during my stay in your country confirm this truth and prove that the efforts we have made--President Zhivkov and myself--to develop Greek-Bulgarian relations have been met with an emotional response from our two peoples. This also confirms the fact that we have turned a new page in the history of our relations. We have achieved something that is difficult in the present world: Transformation of an ancient enmity into a (?strong), fruitful friendship. Under these circumstances one cannot but be optimistic about the future of our relations. Thank you.

[Reporter] Thank you, too.

GOVERNMENT INVITES CZECHOSLOVAK PREMIER FOR TALKS

PAPANDREOU ATTACKS GOVERNMENT POLICIES ON NATO, ECONOMY

AT161730 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 16 Oct 80 p 7

[Text of speech by Andreas Papandreou, PASOK chairman, at Patrai mass rally on 15 October]

[Excerpts] People of Patrai, people of Akhaia: This evening's unprecedented gathering is for me a source of deep human emotion because many years ago I started my struggle in the country's political arena from this place.

People of Akhaia, this evening the sea of people in the Ayios Yeoryios Square is sending a militant message to every corner of Greek soil. In the next elections the right will be completely defeated. In the next elections the forces of change will win; PASOK will win. It will win in order to finally abolish the monopoly of power by the right; it will win in order to lay the strong foundations for a new course, a course that will be nationally proud and socially just.

The common conscience of our people has realized that the continued stay in power of the right will increase national, social and economic dangers. The common conscience of our people has realized that every day the right remains in power the national and economic deadlock into which the contradictory, inconsistent and antipopular policies of the New Democracy governments have led us will intensify.

Monopolist capitalism is passing through a deep, lengthy economic and social crisis on an international scale--a crisis which is not only not limited to its metropolitan areas but which strongly extends to peripheral areas. The recession of detente and of peaceful coexistence between the two superpowers is closely linked to this crisis. We are quickly returning to a period of a frenzied arms race between the two camps--not for the achievement of balance but for the achievement of superiority in arms. The seeds of clashes and danger are quickly growing and, with regard to our country directly, Cyprus remains under the occupation of Attila while the threat to the Aegean by neighboring Turkey and the Atlantic alliance is increasing.

It is clear that now, more than ever before, responsibility and consistency in actions and declarations by the country's political leaders are necessary. However, the prerequisite for exercising a responsible policy--whether with regard to the government or the opposition--is the formulation of a steady national strategy that will effectively confront any national dangers and the crisis that is plaguing our economy.

From the changes in the regime to date, New Democracy has given us examples--and has failed on all fronts. It has not followed a "multidimensional" and consistent foreign policy but a contradictory and teetering Atlantic foreign policy--a policy that has led to the current national deadlock. It has dealt with the repercussions of capitalism's international crisis on our national economy without a trace of a plan. We are still awaiting the notorious 5-year plan promised in 1975 by the country's prime minister at the time. The only consistency in the government's economic policy has been service to the interests of the wealthy oligarchy at the expense of the country's working people. It is precisely this policy of one-sided austerity that allowed contradictory, spasmodic government measures to lead into the economic impasse which has acquired dangerous dimensions. [paragraph continues]

In the last 6 years New Democracy has succeeded in elevating favoritism and party dealings to become the supreme rule in governmental behavior. In the last 6 years the government has undermined the citizens' trust in state organs and has encouraged the expansion of the bureaucratic confrontation of the country's and people's problems in every sector and every level of public administration. Within the framework of unbridled centralization it has tried to enslave local administration and transform it into an extension of the Ministry of Interior. In the last 6 years the government has dealt with the struggle regarding claims by the working Greeks--workers, farmers, salaried people, professionals, artisans, pensioners, students--with antipopular, antiliberal, institutional measures, and with riot control police and riot control police cars.

The common conscience of our people has realized that there is no government today, that there are only ministers, followers and conflicting groups which make impossible the charting of any consistent policy for confronting the country's acute problems. At this critical hour for our nation and people, it is imperative for the people to elect a new government, a government that will want and be able to formulate and consistently follow a responsible national strategy.

For this reason, a change is not merely something that is greatly expected by the Greek people. At present, change is a means of survival for our country and people. PASOK both wants and is able to put the country on a course that will guarantee a victory of national independence, consolidation of territorial integrity, completion of democracy, and social liberation for underprivileged Greeks.

PASOK, the acknowledged movement of change, not only wants to but can also make the vision of change a tangible reality. I can do so because the people can. It can do so because with "PASOK in the government" it will mean "the people are in the government." It can do so because the quintessence of change is active public participation in all decisions which concern them.

This evening's magnificent political gathering in Patrai is the starting point for PASOK's march toward the people, a march that will escalate as the elections approach. Our main goal will be to directly inform the people about the positions and strategy of a PASOK government which will be elected by the people.

Elections will not be far off. The many divisions within the ranks of New Democracy and the obvious incoherence of the government in exercising power dictate the immediate dissolution of the chamber and a resort to popular verdict.

It is difficult for one to believe that the president of the republic has not ascertained what almost all Greek people have ascertained: that the current chamber is in "obvious disharmony with popular feeling." (Article 41, paragraph 1.). However, the prime minister is to blame. According to Article 41, paragraph 2 of the constitution, the prime minister can propose to the president of the republic the dissolution of the chamber and the renewal of the public mandate "so that a national issue of exceptional significance can be dealt with." Does the prime minister not recognize that both the return to the military structure of the Atlantic alliance and the signing of an agreement on the bases constitute "a national issue of exceptional significance"? And is it not his duty to ask the president of the republic for the dissolution of the chamber?

Yet the government not only is not asking for the dissolution of the chamber but is publicly declaring--in fact, addressing itself to the United States--that the national issues, return to NATO and the bases, should "be closed" before the country is led to elections. Does such a statement serve the interests of the people and the nation? Does this not mean that the government foresees that the next elections will bring PASOK into the national government? But if it does foresee this, then does or does not its effort to "close" the national issues before the elections constitute disrespect for the people, an essential violation of the principle of popular sovereignty?

Unfortunately the course of our national issues has vindicated both the forecasts and positions of PASOK. Our Atlantic "allies" arm Turkey so that it can play a decisive role in the Middle East and replace the shah of Iran in the area. At the same time they undisguisedly adopt Turkey's claims in the Aegean and exert "unbearable pressure" on the Greek Government to concede our national sovereign rights in the Aegean in exchange for the country's "much desired" return to the NATO military wing. Our Atlantic "allies" are also pressing for the intercommunal dialogue in Cyprus with the obvious aim of acceptance and legalization of the Attila "faits accomplis."

We have publicly stated that the country's official opposition will support every resistance, every government "no" to the pressures and extortions of the United States and NATO. At the same time we have stated that the government itself, through its incomprehensible insistence on returning the country to the NATO military structure, is providing the opportunity for blackmail against our country.

This evening, from Patrai, we once again call on the government to withdraw the application for return which will only burden our country with dangers and problems. We must stress something especially significant: When the application is revoked, every negotiation connected with the division of operational control of the Aegean will end.

Of course, revocation of the application should--this time--be truly final and irrevocable. It should be a contract of honor between the government and people--not merely a temporary move on the political chessboard--because the people have not forgotten that the withdrawal from NATO in 1974 was--according to the words of the prime minister at the time--"final and irrevocable." That was something that did not prevent the government, after the 1974 elections, from forgetting the "finality" and "irrevocability" of the decision or from stubbornly seeking a return to NATO--despite the fact that Attila was still occupying 40 percent of Cyprus. It should be clear to the government that there are no longer national margins for these kinds of inconsistencies in the exercise of national foreign and defense policies. Such inconsistencies not only deceive the people but also reduce the government's credibility in exercising foreign policy.

We again wish to remind the government that both a return to NATO and the conclusion of a bilateral defense agreement with the United States on the bases are not the responsibility of the executive power. On the contrary, they are the exclusive responsibility of the chamber which should be kept informed of all relevant developments.

The recent hardening of the government's stance toward the pressures and extortions of NATO and the United States should not conceal for a moment the fixed and persistent goal of the right--to complete our country's defense dependence by returning to NATO and achieving permanence for U.S. bases on our soil. For the right, our country's integration with the NATO cold war bloc has become a way of life and this despite the fact that the "alliance" has brought so many evils to our country.

Because of their many and bitter experiences--the 7-year dictatorship, Cyprus, the Aegean--our people know that the only way which corresponds to the genuine, long-term interests of the country is to formulate an independent Greek foreign policy that will be linked with a national defense policy. The prerequisites for such a policy are:

1. Final withdrawal from NATO in order to make possible the formulation of a national defense policy.
2. Removal of the foreign bases from our country's soil, bases which expose us to nuclear calamity and involve us in adventures that are irrelevant to our national interests.
3. Creation of alternative sources of arms for our armed forces.
4. Quick development of a modern war industry.

However, in addition to these prerequisites the people's feelings of brotherliness toward their drafted children, toward the country's armed forces which shoulder the main defense burden and the independence and integrity of our country, is of catalytic significance.

PASOK intends to follow this policy when it soon assumes the reins of power.

However, I again wish to stress that both the victory of national independence and our country's defense demand strong efforts by all of our people. They require patience, persistence and consistency.

Despite its youth, PASOK has been acknowledged both in the Mediterranean arena and in the European arena as a dynamic, popular movement which is on the threshold of power. This reflects PASOK's broad popular acceptance in our country as it also reflects its international activity. Currently PASOK is a bridge between the progressive, national liberation forces of the Mediterranean and para-Mediterranean areas, and the progressive, socialist forces of southern Europe. PASOK already is actively contributing to the strengthening of the South in the North-South dialogue, in Europe, and in the Mediterranean. At the same time it is contributing to detente, disarmament and peace. Thus PASOK has laid strong foundations for a Balkan, Mediterranean and European policy--the policy it will exercise when the people entrust it with the national government.

The PASOK position has always been that our country's accession to the EC is a great mistake, that our industry will suffer irreparably, that the countryside--agrarian Greece--will become deserted, that it will be very difficult, if not impossible, to plan an independent development for the country.

Instead of accession we propose a special agreement, an agreement that will allow us to control our foreign trade and movement of capital. It has always been PASOK's position that the people should be asked to judge--within the framework of a genuine plebiscite--between accession and a special agreement. And it has always been the PASOK position that, as long as we remain in the EC, we must participate in all the Community organs. We must wage a fight for Greece's interests, minimize the damage, defend the interests of the working people in our country, and coordinate our activities with the southern Europeans.

PASOK will inherit a ruined national economy. The 6-year New Democracy government has brought the country to the threshold of true economic bankruptcy. The basic characteristics of the current economic crisis are a high inflation rate, a huge deficit in the balance of payments which has increased the country's foreign debt, and the declining tendency of productive investments which is creating the danger of long-term stagnation or even backwardness in the Greek economy.

Under these circumstances the first imperative duty of the PASOK government will be to stop this downward trend and guarantee the prerequisites for implementation of the movement's long-term program, a program that aims for a steady national course toward higher forms of social organization and creation.

Briefly, the principal axes of PASOK's policy for immediately confronting the crisis and advancing economic development are the following: First, a radical purge of the state budget and, more generally, of financial management so that the public sector can cease being the source of inflation and social injustice--on the contrary, it should become the lever for development of the national economy; second, guarantee of the productive utilization of the national savings resources and suppression of their profiteering exploitation by the wealthy oligarchy. [paragraph continues]

Third, strengthening of the rate of productive investments in the public, cooperative and private (nonmonopolistic) sectors; fourth, limitation of the deficit in the balance of payments through an effective policy of import control; and fifth, guarantee of the prerequisites for control of prices and profits together with the simultaneous protection and improvement of the true income of the popular masses.

PASOK is determined to protect its national program for the country's social and economic development from the undermining of local and foreign economic oligarchies. For this reason it will proceed to the gradual socialization of our economy's basic strategic sector such as: Banks and insurance companies, mass transportation and communications, energy, public utilities, large businesses for the exploitation of mineral wealth, shipbuilding, steel, cement and fertilizer industries, and businesses which concern national defense and medicine. These measures have an antimonopoly character. Their aim is to pass control of the levers of strategic sectors over to the social aggregate and its agents. Within this framework private enterprise will operate unencumbered with the public interest as its yardstick as expressed in the goals of the national program for economic and social development.

So that power can be passed to the people, so that the party cannot be identified with the state, so that the usurpation of power by any party bureaucracy will be impossible, the state must be quickly democratized, democracy must be completed. As we have stressed many times, there are three foundations of democracy: parliament, trade unionism and local government. Because through its party composition it expresses the positions and interests of social classes and layers, parliament is a necessity but an unsatisfactory condition for the state's democratic structure.

We are passing through one of the most critical turns in our history. Our country is facing a national and economic deadlock; the governments of the right have led us to these deadlocks. Their blind faith in Atlanticism, their stubborn effort to integrate our country with the Atlantic camp and to complete our country's dependence on foreign metropolitan centers, the unprecedented lack of strategy and direction, their contradictory and inconsistent foreign policy have endangered not only our national independence but our country's territorial integrity. They have shouldered immense responsibilities on the nation and the people--responsibilities which our people will apportion to them when they will soon ask for the renewal of our people's trust.

Their policy of one-sided austerity, of austerity for the many and of luxury for the few, the total lack of economic planning, their monumental inability to deal with the problems of our country's economy have led us to the brink of bankruptcy.

The hour when they will face the fury and contempt of the Greek people is approaching. In the coming elections the people--with an overwhelming majority--will condemn the right for the evils and dangers it has piled upon the country. In the coming elections the people will decide to assume power themselves and lead the country to a future that will correspond to the vision of so many generations.

In the coming elections PASOK will win, will become the agent of change, a change that has now become a condition for the nation's survival.

PASOK will win in order to open wide the avenue which leads to a Greece that will be governed by its own people, to a Greece that will belong to the Greeks.

Government Response to Papandreou

AT161856 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 16 Oct 80 p 7

[Text] Late last night, in referring to PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou's speech, a government spokesman made the following statement:

(1) PASOK's march toward the people began with a gathering of people from throughout Greece which took place in Patrai. The honest effort which was made through the transport [of people] from all corners of the country did not produce the expected results.

(2) Regarding foreign policy, the PASOK chairman reiterated his well-known position "out of everything" without putting forth a responsible position that will guarantee the defense and integrity of the country.

(3) Regarding economics, Papandreou made a spectacular announcement of measures without indicating the economic resources which will allow the implementation of these measures unless he intends to increase the tax burden of the Greeks in contrast to the government which is quietly but methodically trying, to the extent possible, to create better economic conditions for Greek working people and taxpayers.

(4) The PASOK chairman downgraded the Chamber in his speech because he described it as "necessary but an unsatisfactory condition for the democratic structure of the state." In promising to organize all working people in the towns or the countryside, factories or offices into politicized associations or unions, he clearly leans towards the imposition of a unionized state which means a basic change in the state's democratic structure which is defined and protected by the Constitution. This is where our ideological difference lies. We believe in democratic liberalism. We believe that the Chamber is the basis of a democratic parliamentary regime because its authority originates in the will and ballots of all the people.

(5) Regarding elections, Papandreou should be patient. They will be held at the end of the 4-year term and Greece will continue to belong to the Greeks, not to PASOK.

NEWSPAPERS DEBATE ISSUES OF NATO, U.S. RELATIONS

TO VIMA 12 Oct

AT121452 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 12 Oct 80 p 6

[By correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Text] Washington, 11 October--Responsible U.S. officials, including Pentagon officials, now express obvious pessimism regarding a quick return by Greece to the NATO military wing, but always preclude as "inconceivable" and "calamitous for all of us" both the revocation of the pertinent application for return by the Greek Government and the end of U.S. base operations in Greece.

The same officials do not hesitate to criticize--and, to some extent, accuse--the Greek Government because, as they claim, it attaches greater significance to the political aspects of the issue of return than to the military aspects; at least indirectly they suggest that Athens should manifest "realism" in dealing with the issue. Although they do not show that they hope for some change in the stance of Athens or Ankara, in talks the same officials do not preclude some sudden change of scenery--in fact at any moment--that could lead the issue of return to solution.

In Washington--where Greece's return to NATO certainly is not an issue that seriously occupies the responsible centers of policy--both military and political personalities in government who deal with the issue because of their positions seem especially disappointed with the results of the conferences and talks of General Jones in Athens early last week. They make it appear that, contrary to what was officially claimed, they had attached to his official visit both significance and serious hopes for his talks, given the fact that General Jones' visit had taken place, after all, upon an invitation--although ceremonial--by General Gratsios.

General Jones, who has already returned to Washington, has submitted a concise report on his talks in Athens to Pentagon officials. The report's main points were conveyed yesterday to General Rogers in Brussels. Apparently the report has not created optimism, at least concerning Greece's quick return to NATO; but it is believed that it will have some repercussions on the plan of ideas and proposals which General Rogers is expected to submit to Athens in the coming days.

Both General Jones and other Pentagon officials even recently were insisting that Greece's return to NATO was merely an issue concerning the "settlement" of details and phraseology of rather secondary significance, and foresaw the "satisfactory solution of the issue for all concerned" in the weeks immediately following.

AKROPOLIS 12 Oct Report

AT121514 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 12 Oct 80 p 20

[By Contributor P. Kamvisis]

[Text] Yesterday, Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis discussed with U.S. Ambassador Robert McCloskey bilateral issues which, of course, included the bases.

Reports from good sources note that the U.S. side reiterated--in a different manner--that Washington always attaches a sense of urgency to the issue of agreement on U.S. bases in Greece.

At this point--the same reports add--everything that the U.S. side has proposed in the plan it delivered a month ago to the Greek Government does not differ from what is currently in force.

(The U.S. side) first stated that agreement on the bases foresees the grant of economic, and so forth, aid to Greece; second, it was made clear that the intention of the U.S. side is to maintain the balance of 7:10 in the granting of U.S. defense aid to Greece and Turkey. Of course--it is noted--this is the intention of the U.S. Government which cannot easily undertake a long-term commitment toward any side because only Congress can determine this policy.

Within the framework of discussions on the bases, the Greek side reiterated that this issue should always be examined in conjunction with the problem of Greece's return to the NATO military wing.

It should be stressed that the Greek side is not "giving ultimatums". It is not pressuring anyone--as it also does not tolerate pressure. Even more, if the development of these problems creates a coolness in the traditionally good relations between Greece and the United States, this is something for which the Greek side should not be blamed because it sincerely does not want this kind of development.

Others who submit to pressure from Ankara should be blamed for this. The extent of their responsibility can be seen from a very simple thought: for what reason is Ankara requesting participation in the operational control of the Aegean? Why is Ankara forming an "Aegean" army? Is Greece the possible NATO adversary in the area? [paragraph continues]

Did the West form NATO in order to defend itself against Greece? Toward what direction should the NATO allies aim their attention and their forces?

Furthermore, is Ankara afraid that Greece will invade Asia Minor and for this reason has formed an Aegean army?

I VRADHINI 13 Oct Report

AT131355 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 13 Oct 80 pp 1, 14

[Excerpts] Brussels, Monday (special dispatch)--The Supreme Commander NATO Forces Europe, U.S. General Bernard Rogers, has concluded the cycle of his informative contacts with Greece and Turkey and is expected to submit his new plan for Greece's return to the military wing of the alliance in the next few days.

It is not improbable--on the contrary it is very likely--that this plan will be submitted personally by the U.S. general to the governments of Athens and Ankara when he visits the two countries within the next few days.

The fact that General Rogers decided to present his new plan--the general lines of which are already known to the interested countries as well as to the United States--personally to the two capitals, is interpreted by diplomatic observers in Brussels as a proof that he has reached this decision for the purpose of providing more "explanations" and "clarifications." This proves that he has failed to "convince" the Turkish side to reaccept the conditions which were in force up to August 1974 when, for the well-known reasons, Greece resolved to withdraw from the military wing of the alliance.

If this is the true state of things and General Rogers brings his plan to Athens--a plan which will reject Greek positions but will adopt the Turkish positions--then it must be expected that Athens will certainly reject this plan. This is well known to NATO's command and is the reason why the Rogers visit is being attempted in order to ask the Greek side to demonstrate understanding. This understanding, according to authoritative allied sources, consists of an immediate Greek return to the alliance and a subsequent discussion with Turkey of any criticial issues of operational control (by sea and in the air.)

As is well known, the Greek Government has absolutely tied the presence of U.S. bases to our country's return to NATO because the operation of these bases is permissible and justified only under Greek participation within the alliance. This interconnection of the two issues was also accepted by the U.S. side through the statements of U.S. Secretary of State Muskie in Ankara as well as through the statement of a State Department spokesman approximately 10 days ago.

MESIMVRINI 13 Oct Article

AT131230 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 13 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] During his half-hour visit Saturday with Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis, U.S. Ambassador R. McCloskey requested the immediate commencement of negotiations for signing the new Greek-U.S. agreement. The seriousness of this meeting was also demonstrated by the fact that immediately afterwards, Mitsotakis was received by President of the Republic Karamanlis whom he briefed on his talks with McCloskey.

Reports reaching MESIMVRINI from authoritative circles stated that the U.S. ambassador's visit with the foreign minister was the culmination of "a week of pressures" by the Americans both in Athens and--primarily--in Washington.

According to the same reports, Washington's line of thinking consists of:

Insistence that the question of Greece's return to NATO is a "purely military-technical" question with General Rogers as the only appropriate (read responsible) personality, thus withdrawing any involvement--and responsibility--by the United States in the issue.

Separation of the question of NATO from the question of bases and--under the pressing shadow of the latest international developments--pressure upon the Greek side to begin "immediate and independent" negotiations on the status which will control operation of U.S. bases in Greece.

The impression that the issue has reached an impasse is also strengthened by reports from both Washington and Brussels that the last contact between General Rogers and General Evren was "disappointing."

At the same time, there is no confirmation of certain reports that the new Rogers plan will probably be submitted to Athens within this week (in all probability by the general himself).

ELEVTHEROTIPIA 14 Oct Article

AT141425 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 14 Oct 80 p 4

[From the "Views" column: "There Is no Faliron"]

[Text] The U.S. 6th Fleet admiral and his "Puget Sound" chose the wrong port for their "unofficial visit" at such times. It is farther to the east, much farther to the east, that they will find the friendly waters that will suit them.

This is where, thanks to American concurrence and with American arms, the Turkish mercenaries shed the blood of the peoples of Asia Minor; where they hang Turks; execute the Kurds; torture the Armenians and terrorize the Greeks--any that have been left after their cannibalistic acts.

This visit is nothing but a provocation against the tolerance of the Greek nation at the time when all the Greeks expect nothing more from the Greek Government than to terminate, at long last, this "dialogue" with the Americans and NATO; when they expect it to announce withdrawal of its request for its notorious "return;" when they await the joyous news that at long last the U.S. death bases in Greece are to be closed.

This government consent for the visit of a U.S. warship to Faliron Bay is a demonstration of polished manners which is very difficult to understand. If the government wanted to express the feelings of the people, it ought to have shown to the U.S. admiral that he is not welcome in these waters. It ought to tell him in his own friendly language so that he might understand: There is no Faliron.

RIZOSPASTIS 14 Oct Editorial

[Editorial: "The Only National Solution"]

[Text] Submission of the new Rogers plan on the return [to NATO] is a matter of days. After a lengthy incubation period, after repeated comings and goings to Athens and Ankara, after incessant meetings, secret consultations and bargaining, NATO's new "formula" has taken on its final form.

It is true that this time the "bridge" toward the aggressive alliance was erected with much greater care and skill. An attempt was made to improve its outward appearance. At the same time, however, there was a full utilization of the "traditional" ways "to convince" employed by the imperialists--asphyxiating pressures, unprecedented extortion, cunning plots and threats against Greece. We have also had dramatic appeals for solidarity by the Atlantic partners toward U.S. policy now, "when the Persian Gulf is in flames."

The case of our reenslavement has now reached its utmost limit. It is very obvious that its evolution will decisively affect the sum total of national problems, domestic life and the country's development.

The "New Democracy" government exhausts the dimensions and the seriousness of the matter in coping with the specific conditions for return. Not that these conditions do not have their own significance. The crux of the matter does not lie here, however.

Common logic is enough to convince one--and the Greek people see it very clearly--that:

There cannot be "good" and "nationally beneficial" conditions in the enforcement of a nationally calamitous and extremely dangerous course in the country's progress. Return, particularly under today's difficult international conditions, unavoidably means extremely heavy obligations for our country. Is this not what Prime Minister Rallis hinted at, even if for completely different reasons, when he underlined that "no Greek Government can accept" the price?

The situation has reached such a state of affairs that there is "no room" for hesitation, doubts or middle-of-the-road positions. Today, more imperatively than ever before, the emphatic "No" to the questions of NATO and the bases appears as the only national and patriotic solution. Above all else, what is needed is a pure, firm and decisive opposition to imperialist pressure. This must be expressed with specific changes in the entire orientation of our country, in its domestic and foreign policies.

The rich but bitter experience of the country, modern national needs, and the intentions of our people clearly point to the course which Greece must follow.

KKE (EXTERIOR) URGES STRUGGLE AGAINST TURKS, EC

AT121409 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 12 Oct 80 p 1

[Statement by the Presidium of the KKE (Exterior) Central Committee plenum]

[Text] The KKE Central Committee convened and studied the militarist coup in Turkey and its effect on the regional situation and on our country, taking into consideration the results of the recent meeting of delegations from the KKE Central Committee and the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee and general international developments.

The Central Committee calls on all communists, all Greek democrats, to intensify their struggle against persecution and terrorism and for democracy in Turkey. This struggle is inseparably linked with the Greek people's struggle for the defense of their democratic freedoms, national independence and protection of peace.

The Central Committee ratified, in principle, an earlier resolution for the participation of KKE representatives in [European] Community organs so that this participation can be utilized in the struggle to defend the interests of the working people, confront the results of accession to the EC, disengage ourselves from it, and implement a different kind of policy in our country.

ZIGDHIS ACCUSES TURKEY OF TRYING TO OVERTHROW TREATIES

AT131415 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 13 Oct 80 p 14

[Excerpt] Turkey is attempting to alter its frontier with Greece as it was laid down under the treaties of Lausanne (1923) and of Paris (1948) at the time when under the Final Act of Helsinki all European countries have accepted its frontiers as inviolable. This was argued by EDIK, Democratic Center Union, leader I. Zigdhis in a speech on the U.S. bases delivered in Athens the other day. Zigdhis said Turkey's expansionist intentions gain substance thanks to U.S. support. He disagreed with the decision taken in 1974 for withdrawal from NATO and reiterated the only effective step at that time consisted of closing the U.S. bases.

Explaining the geopolitical importance of U.S. bases in Greece, Zigdhis mentioned the following:

A--Without the bases in Greece the U.S. Sixth Fleet could not remain in the Mediterranean for more than 24 hours.
B--Without these bases, Turkey will be cut off from the rest of NATO.
C--Today U.S. bases in Greece offer the only possibility of dealing with a Soviet intervention against Yugoslavia.
D--The bases in Greece are an irreplaceable support for the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf.

Bases in Turkey, on the other hand, are only surveillance posts for what is happening in the Soviet Union, while bases in Greece are not only surveillance posts but also attack bases for operations.

In conclusion Zigdhis demanded formation of a National Unity government which would cope with the situation.

I KATHIMERINI LAUDS INTER-BALKAN COEXISTENCE, COOPERATION

AT141355 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 14 Oct 80 p 5

[Editorial: "Balkan Peace"]

[Text] If ever there was a need for an area of peace in this world of incessant--at least since 1945--clashes, then such an area has become imperative today. This is the case of the Balkan [area] which has become an example of peaceful coexistence and cooperation. This Balkan example gains particular importance and a vast significance at times like these when wars, local or civil wars, succeed each other in a natural sequence created by violence and willingness in the greatest portion of the world, while extremely severe problems, social as well as economic, dominate humanity's daily life, creating omens which are not at alloptimistic.

The visit, these days, of the Greek president to the capital of Bulgaria and his talks with the president of the neighboring country is a firm reaffirmation of the climate of detente which dominates our area and also confirms the optimistic viewpoint that the spirit of Helsinki is not a utopia and that there truly is an area of the world--unfortunately only one--where this spirit of coexistence and peace is being truly implemented in an exemplary manner. This applies to countries which have nothing in common either in political, social or economic systems or even in their foreign policy trends. History will recognize the contributions of the Greek side and to the Greek president personally toward implementing and preserving the spirit of Helsinki in our area. Simultaneously, it will correctly evaluate the significance and consequences which the implementation of this spirit has had on the diplomatic and other solutions of the multiple problems which surround us.

Enough burdens have already been added to the already overburdened geographic stage, both close and distant, since the time of the previous meeting of the Greek and Bulgarian presidents and their present meeting. Tito's death; Afghanistan; acts and disputes in our own very area; undiminished tension in the Near East; the military coup in Turkey and the Iraq-Iran clash which is full of so many question marks, are only a few of the more obvious aspects of a truly complex spectrum of problems and questions marks under which well-known definitions lost their structure, words lost their accepted meanings and everything appears to obey its own logic, morals and expediency.

Only the servants of absurdity or of madness would dare to propose at this very moment a policy different to the one which leads us to peace and coexistence with neighboring nations, particularly at a time when the geography of the absurd and madness together with its invisible planners appear to respect the boundaries of logic as much as children respect their plastic toys.

So far, our cooperation with the Balkan countries has moved on a bipartite level. It is under this spirit that Karamanlis visited Bucharest and now visits Sofia, to be followed by his next visit to Belgrade. It will be to the interest of peace, both in our own area and on a wider scale, if this cooperation expands to a broader and multilateral basis as already discussed.

It is quite likely that along with the servants of absurdity, we will also give the appearance of servility in that we will attempt to provide our own interpretations to this policy of peace, adding our own expanded meanings. Such interpretations and meanings would be inane. Things are and always will remain in their lucid and immovable foundation as redefined by the two presidents the other day; coexistence of political realism, goodwill and constructive policy so that countries with different social, political and economic systems can coexist, as Zhivkov stated; or an example of peaceful coexistence and cooperation within a world shaken by violence and peremptoriness, as stated by Karamanlis; who added that promotion of inter-Balkan cooperation and specifically in economic-technical sectors will also prove useful to Europe and will neutralize any possible existing bipartite differences.

Things can be very simple when they are truly logical.

I AVYI URGES DEVELOPMENT OF INTER-BALKAN COOPERATION

AT151514 Athens I AVYI in Greek 15 Oct 80 p 6

[From the I AVYI column: "The Talks in Sofia"]

[Text] The exceptionally cordial and friendly atmosphere which dominated the Sofia reception, hospitality and talks of President of the Republic Karamanlis with Chairman of the People's Republic of Bulgaria Todor Zhivkov characterizes quite clearly the current level of Greek-Bulgarian relations. No serious observer had expected blatant and sensational results from the president's visit to Sofia. Naturally this starting point, which reflects the true situation, must be the basis for judging the things that were agreed upon betweenthe presidents of the two countries.

The general and vital problem of developing inter-Balkan cooperation was the framework for all the specific problems that were discussed--the development of economic relations and economic cooperation, the procedure for finally solving the issues of the Nestos River waters, and so forth. Essentially, this method of making constant approaches among the Balkan countries--confirmed by the results of Karamanlis' visits to Bucharest and Sofia--is in itself a factor that promotes the fertile idea of inter-Balkan cooperation--an idea with great potential. [paragraph continues]

This idea, however, has its own independent dimensions and is linked with a specific plan that will help form a Balkan zone of peace without nuclear weapons and foreign bases, and with relationships which will serve as an example of advanced cooperation among small neighboring countries with different social systems.

Such an effort is vitally necessary for our country, and the pressure that is currently being exerted by the U.S. and NATO makes the "opening" towards the Balkans an urgent goal of our country's foreign policy in its effort to find necessary international supports for the defense of our interests.

Nobody should doubt that the government's success in the area of its Balkan policy is directly related to the resistance it exerts toward U.S.-NATO pressure. Seen from this viewpoint, the demand to finalize the withdrawal from military NATO and the abolition of the U.S. bases acquires a new dimension. Such a policy by our country would not merely increase its credibility among the other Balakan countries but would generally strengthen the tendency toward a more independent policy, which exists in all Balkan countries, and which is a prerequisite for the decisive promotion of the idea of inter-Balkan cooperation.

BRIEFS

[Text] The National Security Council ratified an amendment to the Supreme Military Council law. According to the amendment, the head of state, chief of staff and National Security Council president will also assume the leadership of the Supreme Military Council. The Council will be composed of the members of the National Security Council, the prime minister, the national defense minister, the navy commander and all full admirals and generals serving in the ranks of the armed forces.

GOVERNMENT ARRESTS NSP OFFICIALS

TA171019 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Seven more members of the NSP Administrative Council have been arrested today. The 2d Military Tribunal of the Ankara Martial Law Command had earlier issued arrest warrants for NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan as well as 20 of his colleagues. Erbakan and two members of the NSP Administrative Council have already been arrested.

A Turkish Radio and Television correspondent reports that Recai Kutan, Ali Guneri, Fehmi Cumalioglu, Suleyman Arif Emre, Lutfi Dogan, Sevket Kazan and Oguzkan Asilturk--all members of the NSP Administrative Council--were arrested today by the 2d Military Tribunal in Ankara. Thus 10 out of the 21 NSP members for whom an arrest warrant exists have been detained.

SECURITY COUNCIL CITES PLANS FOR POLITICAL, LEGAL REFORMS

[Text] Ankara (special)--It has been learned that party leaders will not be banned from political activity provided they have not perpetrated an offense against the state. According to information obtained from circles close to the National Secuirty Council, when political activities are eventually permitted, political party leaders and former parliamentarians will be able to resume political activities if they wish to do so. However, political party leaders and former parliamentarians who have been convicted for an offense against the state shall not have the right to participate in political activities. It has been also learned that the freed political party leaders and former parliamentarians have been asked not to make any statements which could lead to polemics.

It has further been learned that work on a new constitution and a new electoral law is continuing uninterruptedly. According to those reports, the new electoral law will carry measures which will prevent the formation of coalition governments. The new constitution, on the other hand, will be drafted wholly in accordance with "the principles of Ataturkism," and will extend wide powers to the National Assembly.

FOREIGN MINISTER TURKMEN ADDRESSES COUNCIL OF EUROPE

TA161831 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the visa requirement imposed on Turkish citizens by the FRG and France is clearly opposed to the goals of the Council of Europe and is discriminatory. In a speech delivered at the ministerial council meeting in Strasbourg today, Turkmen said the visa requirement imposed by the FRG and France is not compatible with the European agreement about free movement among member countries. Announcing that talks with countries applying the visa requirement will be continued, Turkmen noted that such decisions will no longer be necessary after the Turkish Government takes certain measures to resolve the issue.

In his statement, Turkmen drew attention to the sensitivity of the Turkish public on the issue of visa requirements and said that this requirement provoked great reaction and disappointment in the country. Turkmen also noted that the Turkish Government welcomed the decision made by the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly 2 weeks ago regarding the cancellation of visa requirements. In the last part of his speech, the foreign minister referred to the European Security and Cooperation Conference and international detente. Turkmen expressed the conviction that the European Security and Cooperation Conference to be held in Madrid on 11 November will render all countries more resolute toward detente. The 67th round meeting of the Council of Europe Ministerial Council will end this evening.

Stresses Government's Democratic Orientation

[Text] The 67th round of the Council of Europe Ministerial Council, held in Strasbourg, France, has ended. In a speech he delivered at the meeting, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen briefed the ministers of the member countries on the situation in Turkey. In his speech, Turkmen said the Turkish Government was determined to return to parliamentary democracy as soon as possible and that during the transition period it would remain loyal to the principles of law and respect for human rights and basic liberties.

Turkmen stressed in his address the importance attached by Turkey to coordination with the Council of Europe in all fields. A correspondent for the Turkish Radio and Television reports that ministers attending the meeting pointed out in their addresses the significance they attribute to parliamentary democracy, respect for law and the right for everyone to benefit from basic liberties. The issues of the Madrid Conference on European Cooperation and Security to be held on 11 November and of terrorism were also taken up during the meeting. Turkmen will return to Turkey on Sunday, 19 October.

EVREN, OTHER LEADERS REVIEW MARTIAL LAW IMPLEMENTATION

[Text] The implementation of martial law throughout the country was reviewed during a 9-hour martial law coordination meeting held in Ankara today.

Head of state Gen Kenan Evren chaired the meeting, which was held at the General Staff Headquarters. National Security Council members, Ground Forces Commander Gen Nurettin Ersin, Air Force Commander Gen Tahsin Sahinkaya, Navy Commander Adm Nejat Tumer and Gendarmerie General Commander Gen Sedat Celasun attended the meeting. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, Interior Minister Selahattin Cetiner, all the martial law commanders and the martial law military services coordination director from the General Staff's Office were also present at the meeting. It was announced that the implementation of martial law was discussed during the meeting, which lasted from 0900 until 1800.

REGIONAL MARTIAL LAW COMMAND ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON DETENTIONS

TA161813 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Army IX Corps, Erzurum, Agri, Artvin and Kars Martial Law Command Communique No 16]

[Text] As a result of operations conducted between 12 September and 14 October: 1. It has been determined that some 357 members of the illegal Revolutionary Road organization [Dev Yol] have been residing in the province of Artvin. Of these, 190 have been captured.

Of those captured, 144 have been sent to the military prosecutor's office, 42 have been released and 4 have been detained. The remaining 167 suspects are being sought.

2. These suspects have been engaged in activities such as murder, firing at police vehicles, bombing police stations and governors' offices, establishing people's courts and punishing persons with opposing views, instigating teachers and students to boycott, issuing communiques, hanging posters, forcing Hopa port workers to make donations with the aim of purchasing arms for the organization, extorting money from the people, vandalizing shops, and establishing people's houses in districts and villages. The suspects have been grouped according to their professions as follows: 59 teachers, 52 unemployed, 15 workers, 16 civil servants, 27 who are self-employed, 2 engineers, 1 doctor, 3 union officials, 5 housewives, 2 dentists, 2 lawyers, 1 pharmacist, 10 students and 162 who held undetermined jobs.

3. Of the 26 Dev Yol members determined to be residing in Kars, 3 have been captured. They are accused of wounding a policeman, killing a student, an Is Bank director, a JP provincial leader Andh Eateizen, robbing at gunpoint an official from the Social Security Association relating to tradesmen, artisans and independent workers [Bag-Kur] carrying money belonging to the association, securing explosives for the organization.

4. Three members of the Revolutionary Liberation Organization accused of bombing various work places and a member of the illegal Turkish People's Liberation Party have been captured and taken into custody.

5. As a result of these operations, 1,005 persons have been detained. Of these, 392 are currently under detention. During the same period, 44 rifles, 3 G-3 automatic rifles, 3 Kalashnikovs, 1 A-2 automatic rifle, 152 pistols of various types and numerous rounds of ammunition have been confiscated. ANTALYA CRIMINAL COURT SENTENCES MURDERER TO DEATH

[Text] Imam Yilmazer, who was being tried for murdering two persons in Antalya some time ago, has been sentenced to death by the Antalya First High Criminal Court. Yilmazer shot and killed Zeki Bakir, the director of the 13th region of the General Directorate of Highways, and Sevket Celikkanat, the 1st secretary of the General Directorate of Highways, on 5 December, 1979.

TERCUMAN CLAIMS ARMENIAN CHURCH BEHIND BOMBINGS IN U.S.

NC170908 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 16 Oct 80 pp 1, 9

[Text] It is being maintained that the Armenian Church is behind the bomb attacks on Turkish institutions in the United States. Well-informed sources say that the Armenian churches in the United States are collecting contributions to aid the Armenian terrorists. Armenian associations, which owe their existence to their hostility for Turkey, are participating in efforts to collect funds.

On the other hand, speaking on television after the bomb explosions at the Turkish House, which includes the premises of the Turkish permanent delegation in New York, and at the office of a Turkish businessman in Los Angeles, an Armenian clergyman said: "I believe that these attacks are only the beginning." This statement by a clergyman who openly supports the attackers has caused strong repercussions.

Meanwhile, FBI agents are continuing their investigations of these bomb incidents. FBI sources have disclosed that they are examining the possibility of some Greeks collaborating with the Armenian terrorists. It has been learned that these investigations are being carried out in cooperation with the CIA, Interpol and the British police.

TALKS WITH U.S. ON DEFENSE PROJECTS BEGIN IN ANKARA

TA161038 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] The meetings on joint defense projects cited in the Turkish-U.S. defense and economic cooperation agreement have begun in Ankara. At the meetings being held at the Foreign Ministry, the United States is represented by a delegation headed by U.S. Deputy Under Secretary of Defense Vitalij Garber. The Turkish delegation at the talks is headed by Lt Gen Lt Ragip Ulugbay, the National Defense Ministry deputy under secretary and chief of supplies and technology. In addition to Defense Ministry officials, the delegation is composed of officials from the Industry and Technology Ministry, the Foreign Ministry, the directorate general of the machine and chemical industry establishment and the state planning organization. The meetings are being held in accordance with the complementary agreement--which is the second addition to the Turkish-U.S. defense and economic cooperation agreement--on defense industry cooperation. The production of antitank ammunition, propellant charges [sevk barutu] and explosives and various types of missiles, the modernizaztion of tanks and aircraft, the expansion of existing installations and the construction and repair of modern warships are being discussed at the talks.

VOTCP CALLS PLANE HIJACKING 'PLOT AGAINST NSP'

TA160904 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] The Turkish Airlines plane that was hijacked to Diyarbakir was brought back to Ankara with its 12-man crew and 148 passengers. Reports emanating from Diyarbakir and Ankara point out that the hijacking incident was a plot devised by the internal and foreign--particularly the U.S. and NATO--intelligence services against the NSP as well as the anti-imperialist and religious masses. As will be recalled, even during the period when the Demirel government was in power--especially during the days that preceded the military coup--the collaborationist and monopolist press was engaged in a campaign of slander aimed at weakening and exhausting the NSP administration as well as the anti-imperialist and religious circles. Since the military coup this campaign has been resumed and intensified. It is being pointed out that the detention of Necmettin Erbakan, the NSP leader, and certain NSP legislators proves this point.

FINANCE MINISTER DEVALUES LIRA AGAINST FOREIGN CURRENCIES

[Text] The finance minister raised the purchase price of a U.S. dollar from 80 Turkish liras to 82.70 liras in the wake of the changes in the international money markets. This means that the Turkish lira was devalued by 3.37 percent against the U.S. dollar.

As a result of this devaluation, the Turkish Central Bank readjusted the values of other foreign currencies against the Turkish lira. A Deutsche mark that could be purchased for 44.74 Turkish liras by the Central Bank will now cost 45.85 liras, a French franc that was 19.24 liras will now be 19.76 liras, a Swiss franc that was 48.19 will now be 50.35 liras. The purchase price of a pound sterling was raised from 191 liras to 198.36, that of the Australian dollar from 91.76 liras to 96.27 liras, a Canadian dollar from 69.08 liras to 71 liras and a Kuwaiti dinar from 297.94 to 309.60 liras.

The new purchase price of some other currencies are as follows: an Austrian schilling, 6.29 liras; Belgian franc, 2.85 liras; a Dutch florin, 42.15 liras; a Swedish krona, 19.86 liras; 100 Italian lira; 9.62 liras; a Norwegian krone, 17.02 liras; a Saudi riyal, 24.89 liras. The devaluation of the Turkish lira against these foreign currencies ranges from 1.47 percent to 4.91 percent. The highest devaluation is against the Australian dollar and the smallest against the Italian lira.

PLO REPRESENTATIVE GHAZI HUSAYN REJECTS ANTISEMITISM

AU161348 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] The representative of the Palestinian Liberation Organization in Austria, Husayn, has condemned antisemitic activities in Europe. Husayn declared that the outrages in Paris and in Munich were indicative of the threat to democracy posed by fascist elements. He stressed that the PLO did not maintain any relations with antisemitic organizations. He emphasized that the PLO distinguishes between Jews and Zionism and that its struggle is directed only against the racist and expansionist character of Zionism.

HONORARY AUSTRIAN CONSUL IN LIECHTENSTEIN DISMISSED

AU151842 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 15 Oct 80 p 2

[Summary] Foreign Minister Pahr has decided to terminate the contract with Austria's honorary consul general in Liechtenstein, Herbert Batliner, who in a lecture had criticized the Liechtenstein judicial authorities' legal aid to Austrian authorities investigating the Vienna General Hospital affair. After studying the text of the lecture, the foreign minister decided that there obviously existed grave conflicts of interest between Batliner's work--he manages several mailbox companies--and his functions as representative of Austria's interests. The Foreign Ministry declared in a release that Batliner's business activities are likely to jeopardize Austrian interests.

NEW GOVERNMENT POLITICAL AGREEMENT REPORTED

LD161510 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Excerpts] After a week of difficult and delicate negotiations the Socialists and Social Christians finally reached agreement on a program at 4 o'clock this morning. The new political agreement incorporates points for future government action. Mr Martens will receive the press and journalists at 1600 hours to give them all the necessary details. Party congresses are planned for Sunday. The new government will be sworn in next week.

The government will have a comfortable majority in the chamber--140 out of 212, but without the Liberals there will not be the two-thirds majority necessary to carry on with the reform of the state which provides for regionalization into three entities.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY'S PROGRAM IN COPENHAGEN OUTLINED

[Summary] On Tuesday afternoon, 14 October, Chancellor Bruno Kreisky arrived in Copenhagen for a 2-day official visit. The chancellor was welcomed by Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen, who had visited Vienna in January. Kreisky will discuss with his host primarily the Middle East problem and the North-South dialog. Wednesday, the chancellor will visit the Danish Parliament and continue his talks with Prime Minister Jorgensen. At noon, the queen will give a banquet for him at Fredensborg Castle, and in the afternoon Kreisky will give a lecture in Roskilde on the topic "Europe Today."

In the evening, Kreisky will give a dinner for his hosts at the Angleterre Hotel. On Thursday morning the chancellor--who is accompanied among others by Friedrich Bauer, political director of the Foreign Ministry, Deputy Chief of Ptorocol Franz Krieger and his secretary, Hans Salomon--will return to Vienna.

PRIME MINISTER DEPARTS 16 OCT FOR 2-DAY SFRY VISIT

LD161108 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto left today for a 2-day official visit to Yugoslavia. The visit takes place at the invitation of the Yugoslav premier, Veselin Djuranovic, and is in return for Djuranovic's visit to Finland in 1978. Besides official talks Prime Minister Koivisto's program includes a visit to President Tito's grave. During the visit Koivisto also intends to acquaint himself with the Yugoslav enterprise self-management system. The official talks between the premiers will deal with topical international questions and Finnish-Yugoslav relations.

SPAIN

FOREIGN MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON STRASBOURG MEETING

LD162306 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 16 Oct 80

[Text] Carlos Castillo reports on the foreign minister's visit to Strasbourg: Foreign Minister Perez Llorca spent today attending the meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Council of Europe. The meeting was held behind closed doors today in Strasbourg The two main subjects of the meeting were preparations for the Madrid conference and, at France's request, the resurgence of fascism in Europe and the problem of racism in several cities. [Begin Castillo recording] Mister Minister, while no attempt was made to reach a common position, what were the guidelines to emerge from the exchange of views on the Madrid conference?

[Perez Llorca] What emerged was a common desire to make an enormous effort to continue along the road of security and peace in Europe, but not a security and a peace which is fictitious and bought at any price. We wish to achieve a security and a peace arrived at from an awareness of the difficulties involved in the process, difficulties which basically, almost exclusively, derive from the somewhat rigid position which has been taken by the Soviet Union and its allies in the conference.

[Question] In response to France's request to discuss the subject of the resurgence of fascism in Europe, Spain introduced the subject of terrorism. What did you say Mister Minister?

[Answer] In the first place we supported the French proposal on the struggle against fascism, antisemitism, and so forth. We believe that the terrorism which exists in Europe is a broader phenomenon--there is a terrorism of the extreme right and a terrorism of the extreme left. The phenomenon of terrorism has to be looked at as a whole and fought accordingly, and while we therefore gave wholehearted support to the French proposal we put forward our own point on the agenda. We were made aware of the enormous concern which exists in Europe and the political desire for international cooperation in the struggle against terrorism.

[Question] Finally, Mister Minister, this morning you had a meeting with the president of the European Parliament, Madame Simone Weil. What did you discuss at this meeting?

[Answer] We spoke of matters concerning European politics and I explained to the president of the European Parliament the political (?and economic) aspects entailed in Spain's entry into the EEC. I am glad to have found in Simone Weil someone who is well apprised of the Spanish situation and who is a sincere ally of Spain's entry into the EEC. [end recording]

PLO DELEGATE IN VIENNA VIEWS EUROPEAN STAND ON MIDEAST

AU161818 Vienna KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 16 Oct 80 p 2

[Kurt Seinitz article: "Exacerbation in the Middle East; Cooling Off of Kreisky-PLO"]

[Text] Beirut/Vienna--The war and crisis psychosis in the Middle East has now--as was to be feared-- spread also to the PLO, where a new radicalization is imminent. As early as in the next few days discussions on a new policy, primarily vis-a-vis West Europe, will begin in the leading PLO bodies. A significant aspect in this context is a certain cooling down of relations between Kreisky, the friend of the Palestinians, and the PLO.

"We are embittered over West Europe, and disappointed," said Dr Ghazi Husayn, PLO representative in Vienna. "The Europeans have merely used fine words in order to secure their economic interests in the Arab countries. The result is that the Europeans today have secured their economic interests in the Arab region while we are worse off than before 1977. There is not the slightest trace of any pressure on Israel to induce it to change its policy. Things cannot go on like this."

The first consequences are to be felt by the Europeans as early as in November. The PLO intends to urge the Arab brothers at next month's Arab summit conference in Amman to closely link economic and political questions in relations with the West in the future. A sharper wind is to blow into the face of the oil-dependent Europeans in the future.

The rather unprofitable "moderate course" of the past few years has posed difficulties for PLO Chief 'Arafat's argumentation.

PLO Representative Ghazi Husayn: "Today there is a militant mood prevailing among the Palestinians in the Middle East that is more pronounced than it has been for a long time. In the past, they rather tended to be afraid of a war, but now they have grown accustomed to the war atmosphere, the Iraq-Iran conflict is developing into a permanent war and the entire Gulf threatens to blow up." Another matter is a certain cooling off in the relations between the PLO and Kreisky, the friend of the Palestinians. It is believed that the chancellor and his Socialist International are working on a new model for a Middle East solution, envisaging the following approach: The PLO cannot bring itself to a clear-cut position vis-a-vis Israel: Israel in principle rejects contacts with the PLO: hence one should take the Israeli Labour Party--which will be the next government party--at its word and also get Jordan back into the game. The Labour Party wants to negotiate with Jordan about the return of the occupied territories. In this negotiating process--as Kreisky declared--a Palestinian delegation might be brought into the game, though not under the name of "PLO."

The PLO reacts very sharply to such plans: "To this we must say a clear-cut 'no.' We will not permit Israel to erase the name PLO. This is merely a pretext to also deprive us of our rights. The Palestinian people have rallied around the PLO, and have staked all their hopes on the PLO. And, what is more: To us, the Israeli Labour Party is worse than Menahem Begin. Begin has 'achieved' a great deal for us. He does what he says. The Labour Party, however, is using fine words to hide its true aims from the world. It also wants to prevent an independent Palestinian state, and instead wants to distribute the occupied territory among Egypt, Israel and Jordan. It also wants to disunite the Arabs so as to be able to then tell the West: 'Look here, the Arabs are once again unable to come to terms among themselves.' The result is why that party is more dangerous than Begin." For the same reason, there are also hard words at present against the Socialist International: "What they want is primarily to get the Israeli Labour Party into power." It is intended to thoroughly discuss the whole problem with Kreisky because the chancellor "continues to be the best and most objective Western politician who is seriously trying to bring about a Middle East solution that is in favor of all peoples. He is a politician of international caliber."

Despite the latest differences, Kreisky thus continues to enjoy a high reputation within the PLO, the more so as it is believed in circles close to 'Arafat that all current problems are primarily a result of the U.S. pressure on Europe. "The election campaign in the United States is at present showing more clearly than in earlier stages how the U.S. politicians are being blackmailed by Israel and are exerting pressures on Europe. A regular campaign struggle over the Jewish votes has begun. The presidential elections threaten to become disastrous for the Middle East. It is grotesque, but one has to hope that Carter remains President. He would be the lesser evil."

WIENER ZEITUNG REVIEWS 249TH MBFR PLENARY SESSION

[Unattributed report: "Force Reduction Talks Still Making No Progress"]

[Text] Again no progress was noted Thursday at the 249th plenary session of the Vienna negotiations on reduction of troops in central Europe. The East and West continued to charge each other with failing to adequately respond to the other side's proposals, and thus with impeding progress at the negotiations. Bulgarian Delegate Ambassador Lubomir Zhopov, only speaker to address the plenary session, declared that the West was attempting to distort the meaning of the latest Eastern proposals and seeking to detract from them. Zhopov emphasized that NATO is at present aiming at a strong expansion of its military potential in Europe.

Commenting on these charges, a Western press spokesman declared that the NATO countries were certainly not seeking to detract from, let alone distort, the Eastern proposals of July of this year. On the contrary, the West last week responded to the Eastern proposal, stating its readiness to negotiate concerning them, provided that a clarification was first achieved on the controversial troop strengths of the Warsaw Pact forces.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY RETURNS FROM DENMARK

[Summary] Yesterday at noon, 16 October, Chancellor Bruno Kreisky returned from his 3-day official visit to Denmark. In Copenhagen he had talks with Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen, primarily on international questions, and also met Queen Margrethe II. "Briefly summing up the results of his talks, Kreisky declared that two questions were particularly in the foreground: industrial cooperation in third markets and cooperation in the field of development aid."

BOELLING REAFFIRMS NEED FOR DETENTE, MILITARY BALANCE

LD181032 Hamburg DPA in German 0939 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Text] Stuttgart, 18 Oct (DPA)--Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling has underlined the Federal Government's view that despite the serious setback for the policy of detente there is "no alternative to the policy of cooperation on the basis of equilibrium." In an interview on South German Radio today Boelling went on to say that in the view of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt the existence of an atmosphere of trust in Europe is crucial for a lasting normalization and steady improvement of neighborly relations between the two German states. Boelling pointed to the continuing substantial superiority of the Soviet Union in medium-range missiles and stressed that in inter-German relations "everything is doomed to remain fragmented" if the Europeans cannot agree to a genuine military balance.

FURTHER COVERAGE OF REACTIONS TO GDR MONETARY, OTHER ACTIONS

Genscher: 'Decision of Weakness'

LD171824 Hamburg DPA in German 1709 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 17 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has described the GDR's increase in the compulsory exchange requirement as a decision of weakness with regard to the situation in Poland. In an interview on French television published today by the Bonn Foreign Ministry, Genscher said that this decision will lead to a reduction in the opportunities for contacts in Germany as a result of the establishment of financial obstacles. However, for its part the Federal Republic will not answer a policy of demarcation with demarcation but is determined to continue a policy of cooperation with the communist countries. A return to the cold war would most severely affect the Germans, who are obliged against their will to live in two states.

Dohnanyi Advocates "Vigorous Detente'

LD181124 Hamburg DPA in German 1002 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Bonn; 18 Oct (DPA)--In the opinion of Klaus von Dohnanyi (SPD); state minister in the Foreign Ministry, the Federal Government must adhere to its policy of "vigorous detente" despite the GDR's new demarcation policy. Speaking on Southwest German Radio today Dohnanyi said it would indeed be a sign of weakness "if the Federal Government for its part were to start to pursue a kind of GDR policy, that is, if the Federal Government were to reply to the GDR leadership's efforts to limit contacts with measures which had the same results." There could only be one answer to the East Berlin measures: The resolute continuation of a policy which they fear over there." Dohnanyi does not think the Federal Government has any chance of "forcing the GDR on to the path of reason." In the economic field contractual undertakings must be fulfilled. "Despite claims which are sometimes made to the contrary," the Federal Republic does not pay the GDR anything which is not on a quid pro quo basis.

Huonker on Embassy, Citizenship Issues

LD190902 Hamburg DPA in German 0506 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] Saarbruecken, 19 Oct (DPA)--On the basis of the Basic Treaty between the GDR and the FRG there can, in the view of Guenter Huonker, minister of state in the federal chancellor's office, be no embassies in Bonn and East Berlin. In an interview with Saarland Radio, Huonker said on Sunday morning: "Although this demand by the GDR is now new, I must emphasize that there cannot be and therefore will not be any transformation of the permanent missions into embassies."

With reference to the question of the recognition of a separate GDR citizenship, Huonker said that there must be no departure from previous practice. As the constitution stood there was no room for maneuver on the question of status. Huonker said: "We are not opposed to the GDR having a citizenship for its citizens, but there can be no question at all of our abandoning our position that all Germans are German within the meaning of our Basic Law."

Officials on Contacts With GDR

LD181559 Hamburg DPA in German 1457 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Text] Hamburg, 18 Oct (DPA)--According to Gunter Huonker, minister of state in the federal chancellor's office, the Federal Government has no possibility of exerting effective pressure on the GDR leadership in the short term in order to have the increase in the minimum exchange requirement rescinded. In a Bavarian Radio interview, Huonker repeated that verbal contacts with the GDR had not been broken off despite the recent severe strains. They are still talking to one another, "but at a somewhat lower level."

The governing mayor of Berlin, Dietrich Stobbe (SPD), made it clear in a BILD AM SONNTAG interview that there would continue to be talks with the GDR. "These talks will be continued at further levels, and notonly by German conversation partners." Stobbe stressed that the West would have to make it plain, both at the CSCE followup meeting in Madrid and in Moscow, that the GDR would be harming itself if it did not rescind the measures it had made.

The minister for inter-German relations, Egon Franke, has described as "public mischief" a report by the Bielefeld WESTFALEN-BLATT that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt knew of East Berlin's intention to double the minimum exchange requirement long before the federal election. The newspaper had based its report on information supplied by a "senior official from a Bonn ministry."

PAPER ALLEGES SCHMIDT KNEW OF GDR PLANS BEFORE ELECTIONS

LD172258 Hamburg DPA in German 2150 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Bielefeld, 17 Oct (DPA)--According to a report in the WESTFALEN-BLATT, which is published in Bielefeld, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt knew a long time before the federal elections of East Berlin's intention to double the mandatory currency exchange requirements for visitors to the GDR. This was why he also called off his planned trip to the GDR.

The paper bases its report in its Saturday edition on information from a "high-ranking official from a Bonn ministry" who did not wish to be named. The informant from Bonn government circles saw--so stated the information prereleased by the paper to DPA--in the "knowledge of the GDR measure" the "real reason for Federal Chancellor Schmidt's GDR trip being called off."

PCF'S FITERMAN ADDRESSES CONFERENCE ON PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

LD171649 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 13 Oct 80 supplement pages II-IV

[Apparent text of PCF Politburo member Charles Fiterman report to PCF national conference in Nanterre on 11 October: "Struggle With Us, Vote With Us"]

[Excerpts] 1. ToChange or Not To Change, That Is the Question

Dear comrades,

We are gathered here today to choose the Communist candidate for the presidential election and also to define the nature and methods of the campaign which we are going to wage, the questions and the arguments which we are going to put forward.

To do this we have a perfectly clear and sound basis: the policy defined by our 23d congress last year. We do not, therefore, have to discuss it again or seek a new line. We consider that it is still fully valid and gives us the fundamental objective which we must take as the focal point of the battle now beginning: to attain the far-reaching democratic changes which will make our country progress along the path of a French brand of socialism.

This objective corresponds fully to France's needs and realities in 1980.

The most obvious and far-reaching of those realities is the crisis. [If France is to overcome the crisis a complete change of direction is needed. A new policy is needed which substitutes satisfaction of the people's needs and national development for the trusts' profit race as the goals and driving forces in the country's activity. That is the reply given by our 23d congress.

Either we implement this new policy against capital and serving the workers and the country, or we maintain the law of the privileged and the multinational trusts with all the resulting disastrous consequences for the workers and the nation.

In other words, to change or not to change. That is the question posed by the country's situation and in the center of the political confrontation. That is the choice which French people are being offered in the presidential election.

II. Our Candidate: The Candidate of Change

In this battle the significance of the Communist candidacy is clear: Our candidate will be the candidate for change.

The PCF's entire activity is aimed at defending the interests of the people's masses and solving the serious problems facing our country.

We reject the policy of high living costs and austerity for the workers, unemployment, recession and destruction and the thwarting of young people's aspirations. We reject the restriction of the workers' freedom and democratic rights, the harnessing of the media, the attempts to impoverish and control culture, the limitation of the role played by the elected assemblies, authoritarianism and personalization of government. We reject the degradation of social relationships, disdain for human beings, discrimination in all its forms and the blind violence which this regime and this policy generate when they do not directly organize them. We reject attempts to abase France and give it a servile role, we reject its part in dominating other peoples and in aggravating tensions and conflicts.

We oppose all attempts to draw the workers into supporting this harmful policy.

We support all struggles which make it possible to loosen the dominating hold of capital and its government.

We are struggling to gradually push back this domination and to make progress toward the economic, social and democratic changes which the country needs so much.

We want the policies and the government to change, we want a new policy to be implemented, giving the workers the improvements and changes which they want in their lives and in the country's situation. The sooner these changes are made, the better. We are doing and will continue to do everything we can to bring them about. In order to attain them we are prepared to take our full part in responsibilities at all levels of the country's life including the government of France. Furthermore we are demanding these responsibilities on behalf of the millions of men and women who are now kept out of the country's affairs and without whose participation there will be no salvation for France.

That is what we want and what we are doing. These are the objectives, the hopes and the battle which we are calling and will call on all French men and women to share with us by voting for the Communist candidate in the presidential election.

The Candidate of Working Men and Women and Young People

We are addressing this appeal to the exploited, the workers at factories, mines, construction sites, laboratories and offices. They are suffering and want to live and work in a different way. Struggling with us and voting with us will give them a way of expressing their discontent and asserting their rights. The Communist candidate will be their candidate, the workers' candidate.

We are addressing this appeal to the rural workers for whom the policy of European integration leaves no future but growing poverty or exodus. They want to be able to live from their work, on their soil. We urge them to struggle with us against the elimination of our production and against the Common Market's expansion, we urge them to struggle for their future. The Communist candidate will be their candidate.

We are addressing this appeal to women who frequently suffer the fiercest exploitation by employers; to the women who have experienced the exhausting life to which they are doomed by excessive working hours, work which is too laborious and badly paid and who, in addition, have housework to do. We are appealing to the women who are refused the right to a job and to workers' wives who devote their lives to running the home with all the worry that involves. We share their anxieties, their hardships and their aspirations and we appeal to them to struggle with us. The Communist candidate will be their candidate, the candidate for a better life and equality for women, the candidate of working women.

We address this appeal to all those young boys and girls who are entering life through a dark tunnel: the tunnel of the knowledge denied to workers' children, the tunnel of unsuitable or nonexistent training and of increased exploitation. We understand their disappointments, their hopes and their revolt. We share them, we who are revolutionaries.

We urge them to struggle, to take initiatives and assume responsibilities. The Communist candidate will be their candidate, the candidate of exploited young people in revolt.

We are addressing this appeal to all those people because they need change most.

However, our appeal is not limited to them. We are addressing technicians, engineers and cadres whose conditions for pursuing their professions are being affected by the crisis and who do not accept big capital's waste and abandonments.

We are also addressing this appeal to intellectual workers in all disciplines whose activity is being mutilated by the Giscardian government's policy of social and cultural segregation. We are addressing this appeal to self-employed workers who want to pursue the activity they like without being subjected to constant harassment and without having to worry about the future.

We say to all these people that our battle is their battle and we call upon them to wage it with us.

III. What Does Change Mean?

However, we are speaking and intend to speak frankly to all those people. Election time is a time for promises. There will be no lack of people announcing better days ahead, people who will conjugate the verb to change in all its tenses without answering the question of what is to be changed and how.

However, change can only be meaningful for the blue-and white-collar workers and their families if it brings them the improvements and changes they expect. It cannot be brought about without creating the right conditions and without making fundamental alterations in the country's social, economic and political situation.

There will be no change without justice; in other words, without far-reaching and systematic action against inequality and without giving urgent priority to satisfying the demands of millions of working men and women who are the most severely exploited, the worst paid, the most seriously affected in their right to knowledge, to health, to housing, to culture, to leisure, in short, to life--a real life.

Meeting their demands is necessary for them, but it is also necessary in order to revive the economy and employment, to lay the foundations for new labor productivity and to extend economic and political democracy by giving them a greater part to play in choices and decisions.

There will be no change without a tough line, not against the workers but against those who are misappropriating and wasting the national resources. A determined and effective attack on privileges is absolutely essential because it is the privileged people who have plunged the country into the crisis and are depriving it of the means of overcoming the crisis. It is they who are living beyond France's means.

There will be no change without freedom, not only for those who have the means of obtaining freedom but for all those men and women who are at present deprived of freedom. In other words, there will be no change unless working men and women and young people everywhere obtain the right and means to learn, work, live, speak, act and decide.

There will be no change without a struggle to develop new relationships among men based on equality, respect for others, responsibility and fraternity. Eliminating all discrimi-matopm, attacks on human dignity, violence, and hatred, and calling for effort, solidarity, responsibility toward yourself and others--this is what is necessary in order to rally the forces capable of getting France out of the rut and bringing about its transformation.

There will be no change without introducing far-reaching democratic reforms which attack capital's omnipotence, without calling into question and dismantling the exclusive domination exerted by billionaries on the economy and the state. That means democratic nationalizations, new rights for the workers in the enterprises, clarification and simplification of grievances channels, new rights for communes and departments, democratic regional power, decentralization and debureaucratization of the state, elimination of all forms of the violation of universal suffrage and the freedom of the media. This means, quite simply, that to assert the law of social and national progress we must smash the government and the law of money. Otherwise there will be no progress.

We Need a Foreign Policy Which Contributes to a Constructive Development of the World

Finally, there will be no change without a policy which ensures for France a new international role, serving peace, disarmament, cooperation and friendship among nations.

All other French political forces are striving to paint an extremely gloomy picture of the international situation. They are predicting energy shortages and announcing war--especially by reviving the old catchphrase of the fifties: Soviet expansionism. According to them there is nothing more we can do but resign ourselves to our fate, submit in order to survive, close ranks behind the U.S. protector and its West German assistant and, naturally, put off all change indefinitely, because this is not the time to make "waves."

We Communists categorically reject this view of the world, which is deliberately caricatured in our country the better to oppose change and justify its rejection.

Now, we see nothing in the international situation to justify either fearing change or accepting the political and social status quo in Europe; quite the reverse, we see in the internaitonal situation additional reasons for taking action for political change in our country.

"The world is progressing," we said at our 23rd congress. That vital conclusion has been borne out still further recently.

The Olympic games were a huge success for the athletes and the peoples, for peace and also for socialism, and at the same time were a total defeat for the boycotters. All imperialism's fuss, pressures and interventions cannot prevent Cuba progressing along the path of socialism with its people's enthusiastic support, cannot prevent Vietnam from rebuilding its country or Kampuchea from being reborn. They cannot prevent the gradual consolidation of the people's forces in Afghanistan under the Karmal government's leadership.

In the Middle East the Israeli leaders are facing increasing problems and the strange and unacceptable way in which Begin is using the Rue Copernic attack [bombing of Paris synagogue] to try to distract criticism and justify his policy of systematically stifling the Palestinian people's rights and aspirations will certainly not reverse this trend.

I have only mentioned a few of the facts which demonstrate that the world has changed and is changing. All problems are no longer settled on the basis of the survival of the fittest and the richest. Justice, equality, freedom, independence and peace are scoring points and taking an increasingly firm place in international life.

Of course, this development is not taking place without setbacks and without encountering difficulties. The events in Poland are an example of this.

Serious and grave problems have arisen in Poland. However, they do not alter our overall assessment of the socialist countries' experiment.

First this is because it is impossible, without making a great mistake, to lose sight of socialism's achievements, in Poland as elsewhere--achievements to which, moreover, the Polish people have demonstrated their attachment.

Second, it is because the Polish workers and leaders are facing these problems with the will to surmount them in a way which is favorable to a new development of socialism. We hope they will succeed by boldly implementing the major economic, social, and democratic reforms which the situation in their country requires.

The development of international life is not exempt from dangers and tensions either. Faced with a serious crisis in their system, the leaders of the capitalist work are trying to tackle it by increasing the right to dispose of their wealth, by stepping up pressures and interference, by stirring up tension and rivalry and by reviving the ruinous and dangerous arms race. They support the most brutal dictatorships and organize coups against the peoples' democratic will, as we have recently seen in Bolivia and Turkey. All this justifies intensified action to promote disarmament, peace and independence.

However, the problems and dangers which characterize the international situation do not contradict the fundamental evolution in the direction of progress. They stress the complexity of this movement, the bitterness of the struggle between the forces of the future and those of the past. They call for lucidity, of course, and for action, but not for pessimism and submission.

We Want Neither Condemnation nor Salvation From Outside

That is why we find reasons for wanting France to have a new foreign policy both in the new possibilities and in the dangers which the world around us contains. We want a dynamic policy in favor of disarmament, the organization of collective security and peace. We want an innovating policy favoring the development of a cooperation among nations based on equality, mutual interest and aid to the poorest countries, on the search for a new world economic and political order. We want a policy based on the defense of our independence and our sovereignty. We want a policy of nonalignment which would enable France--without abandoning its alliances--to speak for itself and act in its own name, thereby demonstrating its will to free itself from bloc politics and to move toward the blocs' simultaneous dissolution.

This policy corresponds to what all nations which aspire to peace, development and progress expect from France, and in return it would give our country major means of overcoming the crisis and ensuring a new democratic and national resurgence.

Yes, rejecting this independent and peaceful policy and advocating increased Atlanticism and European integration under U.S. protection means turning our backs on change in our country, and counting on foreign countries to prevent change. As far as we are concerned, on the other hand, we want neither condemnation nor salvation from outside. Struggling for this new policy as we are doing means working to assemble the international assets for the change we desire for France, and which the French people will obtain by their own battle.

Changing things, really changing things and steering the country out of the crisis means we have to want all this, to make progress along the path in all spheres and to achieve all this. Without such a will, such action, such a policy of change--revolutionary in the real sense of the word--there is and can only be demagoguery and deception for the workers and their families.

IV. The Key to Change: Communist Votes in the First Round

It is precisely because the changes expected by the workers and which the country needs require us to call privileges into question and carry out far-reaching reforms that they cannot be obtained in a fog of vague promises, in the swamp of political alliances and while passively awaiting a savior's miracles.

They will be and can only be the result of a consistent, fierce and systematic class struggle.

On which political force, on which candidate can working men and women and young people count to uphold their interests and act with them to the end in order to change things?

Choosing the Right Means Sinking Further Into the Rut

On the rightwing parties? Certainly not! They have been running France for 22 years, and where is France now? In a crisis, stuck in a rut. Giscard d'Estaing is the champion of conservatisim, the representative of the France of palaces and castles, the spokesman for the aristocracy and for money. His policy is brutal toward the workers, insensitive to human suffering, unjust to the point of disdain toward ordinary people, and disastrous for France. Power smacks of the monarcy under Louis XV, the empire under Napoleon III and the republic under Mr. Thiers.

His objective is not to change things but to ensure the continuation of the bourgeoisie's policy of which he is the best defender. We must emphasize this point.

In crisis conditions and taking account of the discontent which capital's policy is arousing, attaining that objeccive requires that the bourgeoisie must succeed in expanding the political foundation of its power and guaranteeing its stability in a lasting way.

That is particularly necessary for it since, if it is to try to safeguard its positions and privileges in the crisis, it needs to further strengthen its policy of austerity, unemployment, economic and financial redeployment and national abandonment. To be convinced of that you just have to look at Francois Ceyrac's urgent appeals to the French workers to agree to live "Japanese-style," with lower wages, with increased exploitation, with job insecurity extended to the majority of the working class, with nonexistent social guarantees, with employers who enjoy a divine right. It is understandable that such a situation should make the billionaires dream.

However, this is France, thank God! If you will allow me to say so. And here such a policy arouses greater discontent, anger, struggles and opposition.

Giscard d'Estaing's Objective

That is why, as early as 1974, Giscard d'Estaing made the expansion of his government's political base a priority and constant objective. To this effect he has tried and is still trying to weaken the PCF and obtain the support, in one form or another, of the PS and the forces close to it in implementing his policy.

It should be pointed out that those efforts have not been entirely without result since [former Left Radical Movement leader] Robert Fabre rallied to the Giscardian flag by accepting a position of trust from the Elysee and also since, at the trade union level, the government's and employers' sirens are causing some damage.

It is quite obvious that Giscard d'Estaing is counting on the presidential election to take another step in seeking his central objective.

All the rightwing forces are supporting this effort, each in its own way. [UDF president] Lecanuet is of course supporting it, but so are [RPR leadership members] Chirac and Debre. Unswerving supporters of Giscardian policy in practice at all decisive moments, they only differ from it verbally the better to play their role of channeling discontent and acting as a bridge held out to the Socialists. Is that why they have, for the past few months, been trying to outdo each other in pro-Atlanticism, which is enough to confuse more than one Gaullist?

In any case, the workers cannot hope for any change from that quarter, quite the reverse: They can only expect the threat of their situation deteriorating.

PS Policy

What about the PS?

For the 11 years which preceded General de Gaulle's accession to government, the PS ran France, sometimes with the right and sometimes without it, but always without us Communists. Where did that lead? To the Fourth Republic's bankruptcy. This story is an old one but the PS mentions it, especially since its first secretary took a direct part in it.

Indeed the whole of historical experience stresses the unstable, hesitant and petty political nature of the PS, its constant tendency to retreat from questioning the big bourgeoisie's positions and to collaborate with it in the "loyal administration" of capital's affairs as soon as the people's movement and the PCF within it are not strong enough to force it to take a different line.

The recent experience of the Joint Program unfortunately verified this fact. The people's movement had enabled the efforts made for more than 10 years by our party to result in the agreement with the PS on a joint government program. However, right from that point the Socialist leaders' aim was not the victory of this new policy but the use of the agreement reached to create illusions about them, to strengthen themselves at our expense and to break the union at the decisive moment. That is what they succeeded in doing in 1977 in the conditions analyzed at our 23d congress, and we were unable to prevent this blow. The left's imbalance in the PS' favor and the PCF's inadequate strength caused division and defeat.

Today, when Francois Mitterrand and the Socialist leaders have led their party and the hopes it embodied into a blind alley, they have launched into a kind of "headlong flight" or rather "flight to the right."

They openly assert political positions which in all essential spheres converge with the Giscardian government's positions. In order to revive economic activity they no longer advocate boosting popular consumption as a priority, as the Joint Program did, but boosting private investment, which is surprisingly reminiscent of Professor Barre's theory. Moving from words to action, they are curbing and even preventing the development of social struggles, not hesitating to entrust this sad role to the trade union organizations in whose leaderships they exert a dominating or exclusive influence.

Toward a Rightwing-PS Cooperation?

They advocate weakening the bases and means of ensuring national independence, France's further integration into the West European and Atlantic bloc, at the military level among others, the expansion of the Common Market and a policy of confrontation with the Soviet Union and also with most Third World countries, indulging in disastrous extremes in all spheres.

They are stopping at nothing in their attempt to weaken our party, to deny it its just representation, as was seen in the senatorial elections. They are proclaiming on all sides that they will not negotiate during the presidential election. They are replacing unity within the framework of the leftwing union by an appeal to people to rally round the PS, which claims to be the only party to offer solutions to the problems facing the workers and the country.

However, the PS alone, and free to indulge its inclinations, has never changed society anywhere; it has always become entangled in rightwing policy, preparing the right's return in force after having sown disillusion and bitterness among the workers and democrats, as we have just seen happen in Portugal. In a situation of capitalist crisis, especially in the present deep crisis, the PS alone cannot offer any other prospect than mere participation in implementing the right's brutally antipopular and antinational policy. No social democratic policy would be different from that policy.

All the indications are that it is in this context that the PS' present policy is to be placed and not in the context of change. The welcome given by Francois Mitterrand and his friends to friendly signals from Jacques Chirac and Michel Debre confirm that. Francois Mitterrand is opening up the possibility of establishing direct cooperation between the right and the PS following the presidential election--a cooperation which has already been inaugurated, as I noted before, by Robert Fabre. Unfortunately he is placing at the service of this rightwing policy the forces he in the period when he was forced to subscribe to the Joint Program.

Therefore there is a danger that the presidential election--instead of bringing about the change which the workers expect--might be used by the right and the PS to create between them the conditions for new cooperation guaranteeing wider support for capital's policy--the famous consensus about which the bourgeoisie's leaders are dreaming. This is a serious danger. It constitutes one of the fundamental issues of next April's election.

The PCF--the Workers Party--Is the Party of Change

In these circumstances, are the workers to think that the pursuit of capital's policy is inevitable, that the PS' support for that policy is definitive and irreversible? No, of course not.

Is there a force on which they can rely to counter the bourgeoisie's operation, defend their workers' interests, uphold their hopes, take dynamic, consistent and effective action for change? Yes, this force exists! It is the PCF. Struggling with it and supporting the PCF candidate in the presidential election is the decisive means they have for making progress.

Our party's vocation and raison d'etre is the defense of the interests of the working class and all workers. This action comes naturally to it since the party stemmed from the workers itself, since it is formed of men and women who share the concerns, problems and aspirations of all workers and who have decided to unite to fight for a new life and a new society. This ability to react to injustice and inequality and to defend the exploited has given our party the title "people's advocate" and we are proud of that title and intend to deserve it always.

However, our action is not limited to this. Being a party of struggle and opposition, we also want to be and are a government party. Our party is proposing new solutions and a new policy for France. Ultimately our entire action is aimed at pushing back capital's domination, putting an end to it and to the right's power and imposing the necessary economic, social and political changes.

The PCF is a workers party, a party inspired by revolutionary ideas, a party strongly organized for struggle, and it has the means of taking effective and consistent action to promote these great objectives without giving up at the first obstacle and sinking into compromise with the bourgeoisie.

That does not make us either perfect or infallible. Perfection and infallibility are not of this world. However, if the Communists make mistakes, they have the merit of admitting them frankly, constantly submitting their activity to critical consideration, never contenting themselves with what has been achieved and always taking decisions not on the basis of biased interests but on the basis of the working class' and people's interest.

Ensuring greater strength for the PCF, in other words for its fight for change, and imposing its share in responsibilities is, in fact, the fundamental problem to be solved, the key question in French political life and hence in the presidential election battle. All the rest is merely an additional element or a petty political game.

A Communist Vote--A Vote for the Union

Does this mean that our party's objective is to obtain enough strength to solve the country's problems alone? No, that is not our policy. We do not aspire to any monopoly or even domination. Our line, the line laid down by our 23d congress, is the search for the union of all the people's forces, the leftwing union in the struggle to attain the objectives of democratic change and to pursue this change until we achieve a democratic form of socialism. The fact that there might be great difficulties along the path of this union does not and will never make us give up because this union is a necessary precondition of the success of our battle.

Can the presidential election help overcome these difficulties? Yes, it can.

To succeed we must constantly bear in mind the conclusion drawn by our 23d congress from the Joint Program experiment.

That experiement demonstrated that agreement with the PS on a document, however good, however solemnly initialed, is not enough to guarantee the union and change in that such an agreement comes from the top and is not based on a sufficiently strong people's movement determined to take action to promote the solutions of change. This experiment demonstrated that agreement reached in that way can become a source of confusion and an obstacle to the development of the workers' struggle. In these conditions discussion at the top becomes mere show and the agreement becomes a shield. That is not the right way.

Of course, saying that does not mean that we would give up trying to reach political agreements with the other forces interested in change, and particularly with the PS. Such agreements will be necessary.

However, it is clear that the PS' present policy makes such an agreement impossible. And, at the present stage, there is no indication that this situation will change between now and 26 April next year. Therefore to try to reach such an agreement would be to enter a blind alley. In addition, and this is the fundamental factor, such agreements--as we have seen--cannot have any mobilizing value, they cannot lead to the realization of the pledges they proclaim unless they are based on the struggle of the workers themselves, on their capacity to exert control, on the possibility which the committed forces of change have to stand up and back them: in other words, on the PCF's strength.

It is precisely that lesson based on experience which led our party--in keeping with the strategy defined by its 22d and 23d congresses--to the view that there should be a Communist candidate in the presidential election.

RADIO ANNOUNCES FORMATION OF NEW GOVERNMENT

Forlani Final Agreement

LD172034 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1935 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Prime Minister-designate Forlani will go to the presidential palace tomorrow morning to withdraw his reservations on the formation of the new government and will submit to President Pertini the composition of the new executive. This evening, after the meetings of the directorates of the four parties of the government majority, Forlani will hold another collegial meeting, including a working dinner, to finalize the new list of ministers.

New Cabinet Ministers Named

Tourism: Nicolae Signorello (DC)
Cultural Heritage: Oddo Biasini (PRI)

They will be sworn in this evening.

The cabinet will meet Monday to appoint the under-secretaries and will go before the Parliament some time towards the middle of next week.

President of the Republic Sandro Pertini, who had cut short a trip to China to be on hand during the government crisis, voiced his satisfaction today for the rapidity with which Forlani brought the crisis to a close.

Reactions From Parties

LD190858 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Excerpts] The four-party government headed by Prime Minister Forlani took the oath at 1800 today before President Pertini at the presidential palace. The new executive is made up of 13 DC ministers and 13 ministers of the lay-socialist line-up. The government will assume its constitutional power after the voting in Parliament which is to take place on Wednesday, 22 October. Forlani will present his program and will address only one chamber of Parliament, the Chamber of Deputies. His statement will later be communicated to the Senate, which has been summoned for the occasion and will meet at 1800 on Wednesday. On Monday, 20 October, the ministers will hold their first meeting to appoint under secretaries.

Italian Social Movement-National Right Secretary General Almirante has said that this government is a prisoner of the factionalism which dominates the DC. However, Liberal Party Secretary Zanone feels that Forlani has succeeded in containing the inadmissible demands which would have tended to overextend the structure of the government. Magri, the secretary of the Democratic Party of Proletarian Unity, has stated that the men of the new government's program are carbon copies of those of Cossiga. The problem, Magri says, is not to give it a different opposition but to create different prospects for the country.

Spadolini, on behalf of the PRI, has reiterated his full and loyal support for Forlani and for the government. Radical Party representative Spadaccia has launched a harsh attack on the government which he calls the product of the balancing games among the parties. Finally, a different reaction from the PSI, which has issued a harshly critical note from the socialist left directed especially against the Craxi majority. The note states that a road has been chosen which ignores the political agreements. This is a reference to the request for a committed and important participation by the left, that of Signorile or Cicchitto in the socialist government membership. Aniasi, who is a member of the PSI government group, made a statement in the early afternoon which is interpreted by political observers as a dissociation from that same left.

The latter has also attacked Craxi through a statement made by Lombardi, during an interview with L'EUROPEO, protesting against the exclusion from the government of minister Giannini. Conversely, tomorrow's AVANTI will state that the influence of the socialists in the government has become stronger through the consolidation of a constructive relationship with the Social Democrat Party and the principle of equal footing between Christian Democrats and the secular parties. Vittorino Colombo publishes an article in tomorrow's DC organ, POPOLO, in which he expresses satisfaction at the solution adopted with the collaboration between DC, PSI, PSDI and PRI and his confident expectations regarding the decisions which the Liberals will take after hearing Forlani's program. There has been no comment as yet from the Communists.

GENOA POLICE FIND RED BRIGADES BASE

LD172116 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1935 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] An operational base of the Red Brigades has been uncovered at Diano Marina by the carabinieri and the political police of Genoa-Imperia. It contained material described by the investigators as very important. There were also arms, submachine guns, rifles, explosives, detonators, fuses and false passports and documents. A large amount of propaganda material of the Red Brigades was also confiscated. It included the matrix used for the printing of the clandestine paper ARMED STRUGGLE FOR COMMUNISM which appeared last June in various Italian towns. The hideout was managed by three youths from Imperia who are already in jail--Mantanari, Tosetti and De Silvestri--and charged with participating in armed gangs.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS TO BE HELD 7 DEC

LD172234 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2250 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] The presidential elections will be held on 7 December. A communique just issued by the presidency of the republic says that after hearing the political parties represented in parliament and the prime minister, Gen Ramalho Eanes today signed the decree setting 7 December as the date for the presidential elections.

Details of Election

LD190849 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The presidential elections have been officially set for 7 December. The election campaign will begin on 22 November and end on 5 December.

Each candidate must be backed by a minimum of 7,500 citizens and the maximum expenditure allowed to each candidature is 2,500 contos. The candidates must submit their campaign accounts to the national elections committee by 6 January.

The voters, too, have their duties. Any citizen who abstains from voting in the 7 December elections without just cause will be liable to sanctions of a civic and political nature. This is stipulated in the presidential elections law promulgated on 3 May 1976. The law says that abstention from voting will render the abstainer ineligible for holding any government offices for the duration of the presidential term of office.

Only electors registered in the Portuguese mainland, Madeira, Azores and Macao may vote in these elections. The emigrants, making up some 2.3 percent of the Portuguese electorate, are excluded.

Ten people have so far announced their decision to run. They are Generals Ramalho Eanes, Soares Carneiro, Galvao de Melo, Colonel Pires Veloso, Major Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho, Captain (Calzinho), the Socialist Party dissident and former deputy Aires Rodrigues and Dr. Meneses Alves. Also running are an Oporto tenant farmer and a Coimbra businessman.

According to an opinion poll carried out during the legislative elections campaign and published today in the weekly EXPRESSO, 81 percent of the Portuguese favor Ramalho Eanes' candidacy.

SOCIALIST PARTY HAS CRISIS OVER SUPPORT FOR EANES

NC191618 Paris AFP in English 1556 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] Lisbon, 19 Oct (AFP)--Mario Soares, secretary-general of the Portuguese Socialist Party, has threatened to resign if the party continues its support for the re-election of President Gen Antonio Ramalho Eanes, a reliable Socialist source said today.

Mr Soares argued throughout the night before the party's national committee for the withdrawal of party support from General Eanes, but he reportedly failed to win the issue.

The Socialist leader, who had been supporting the candidacy of General Eanes, made his statement following a press conference yesterday in which the president spoke in favor of swinging the country toward "social democracy."

The Socialist Party is the country's second largest, and General Eanes is considered favoured to win the presidential vote scheduled for December.

The committee is to meet later today to attempt to find a solution to the crisis, the party's worst since the 1974 Portuguese revolution.

Soares' Nonsupport for Eanes

LD192006 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] Quoting an official source, the Portuguese news agency [ANOP] reports that the Socialist Party secretary general, Dr Mario Soares, has withdrawn his personal support for President Ramalho Eanes's bid for a second term of office.

The same source said that at 1700 today General Ramalho Eanes received a personal letter from Mario Soares announcing his decision.

Socialist Party Backs Eanes

LD192234 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2100 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] The Socialist Party's national political committee has come out in favor of Ramalho Eanes' candidacy for a second term of office.

Mario Soares has supended the exercise of his party functions until the end of the election campaign. He is to be temporarily replaced by the chairman, Antonio Macedo. The same has happened to the party's national secretariat, which has suspended its functions [words indistinct].

The vote on whether to support Eanes went as follows: in favor--78 votes; against--43; there were 8 abstentions. [passage indistinct]

SA CARNEIRO CRITICIZES EANES' REMARKS OF 14 OCT

LD190342 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0000 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro, the prime minister, has described the news conference held last Tuesday by Gen Ramalho Eanes as regrettable and has stated that the possibility of the president of the republic being returned for another term of office is becoming increasingly absurd. He reiterated his resolve not to head a government with Eanes in the presidency, particularly in the light of the news conference.

Sa Carneiro accused Eanes of lacking consistency and of having only a blueprint for power, not a blueprint for a society, which forces him into engaging in vote-hunting operations.

Another criticism leveled by the Social Democratic Party leader at the head of state concerned the question of Timor. He said that his request last spring for a copy of the military report on Timor had met with no response. During the past week Sa Carneiro again asked for a copy after Gen Ramalho Eanes had declared that the report was at the government's disposal. The government, he said, needs the report and also the opinion of the Council of the Revolution in order to draw up a plan envisaging a solution to the Timor question.

Replying to a reporter's question on alleged criticism by Helena Reseta [a leading Social Democratic member] of the government's action in the sphere of the mass media, Sa Carneiro said that he is on record as advocating that the managements of the state-owned news media should be responsible to parliament. He added that any criticisms should be leveled at the media managements themselves, adding that he never asked the latter to carry his news conferences in full. This was an allusion to the presidency of the republic's request to Portuguese television to carry an unedited broadcast of General Eanes' recent news conference.

With regard to the resignation of the commander general of the public security police, Sa Carniero stated that the government is still waiting for the chief of the armed forces general staff to declare his stand on the matter in order to go ahead with the replacement of Gen Lopes Alves. He added that the piece of legislation making the resignation official was sent to Gen Ramalho Eanes on 10 October.

PRESIDENT, PRIME MINISTER RECEIVE CAPE VERDE LEADER

[Text] Cape Verde Prime Minister Pedro Pires arrived in Lisbon yesterday en route to France which he will be visiting at the invitation of Premier Barre. This afternoon Pedro Pires was received by the president of the republic and in the morning had a meeting with Prime Minister Sa Carneiro. After the latter meeting Pedro Pires told an RDP reporter that he and his Portuguese counterpart engaged in a brief review of the state of cooperation between the two countries, and added:

[Begin Pires recording] It has been more or less established that both the Portuguese and Cape Verde governments will be doing their utmost to consolidate and develop joint cooperation. We also discussed several international questions, with particular emphasis on those regarding the situation on the African continent.

FOREIGN MINISTER'S REMARKS ON RETURN FROM STRASBOURG

LD172216 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Portuguese Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral returned this afternoon from Strasbourg where he took part in the meeting of the ministerial committee of the Council of Europe. While in Strasbourg, Freitas do Amaral had contacts with his Netherlands counterpart, to whom he explained the objectives and scope of the Portuguese plan for Timor which is to be pursued with or withour the support of the Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor [FRETELIN].

Speaking on this matter upon his arrival in Lisbon, the foreign minister said that the preparation of the government's plan for Timor was delayed by the cabinet's failure to secure access to the presidency of the republic's military report on the matter. According to Freitas do Amaral, however, the content of this military report will not change the government's stand on the Timor issue.

According to the foreign minister, the meeting of the Council of Europe was characterized by a strong condemnation of terrorism and all forms of racism and profascist intolerance. It was also decided that the West must adopt a firm stand with regard to the violations of the Helsinki agreements. Particularly emphasized were the Soviet military presence in Afghanistan and the human rights situation in the USSR and remaining East European countries.

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE ON U.S. ELECTION CAMPAIGN

LD171001 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 11 Oct 80 Part 1 p 8

[Editorial: "Carter's Change of Course"]

[Text] President Carter is in difficulties. His election campaign is not going well. The upswing he saw in the opinion polls after his renomination at the Democratic Party convention in August has crumbled away, and 25 days before the election he is staring defeat in the face. All the predictions say that he has already lost the election to Ronald Reagan in the states west of the Mississippi, from the Kansas and Dakota prairies all the way to the Pacific coast, that the election is in the balance in all the northern industrial states, which are all very necessary for the President if he is to win, and that he is not even safe in his own stronghold in the Southern States, where Texas, which generally goes with the winner, is slipping out of his hands.

The gloomy prospects have led Carter to make a U-turn in his campaign course. Like last summer when he suddenly admitted his weakness as President and wrote off 2.5 years of his administration as wasted, he now publically regrets and repents of the coarse insinuations he has fired off at Ronald Reagan in recent weeks and which the press has sharply criticized. There is to be no more abuse. In the last 3 weeks it is to be a worthy and serious campaign.

If an election campaign wins an election, and it seldom does so alone, it is hardly with these tactics. This sudden change is too reminiscent of Carter's earlier admissions of failures of judgment, both in domestic and foreign affairs, and it could become a bad habit for a President to ask for forgiveness too much.

But there could be factors other than the election campaign itself that will be decisive. If Carter wins it could to a very large extent be because he already is President. The respect for the White House as a rallying national symbol and for the prestige of his office will be to Carter's advantage among the 20 percent of voters who have not yet finally made up their minds. The opinion polls divide them roughly in the same pattern as others who have made up their minds, but it could very well be that they will finally fall to the President if in the next few weeks they are not given direct impulses in Reagan's direction.

There is one factor which cannot be measured and which none of the presidential candidates can do anything about. This is the fact that the war in the Middle East for the fourth time in a year faces the United States with an international conflict which with all its power it cannot influence: There have been the hostages in Iran, who are still there; there has been the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan, which is still going on; there were the Olympic games, which followed their twisted course in Moscow; and now there is the war between Iraq and Iran, which is bombing to pieces some of the most important oilfields in the world, without the United States or anyone else being able to bring about even a cease-fire. The undertone of powerlessness at the heart of the election campaign could be the force to decide the election, without the outcome being fair to Carter or deserved by Reagan.

REPORT ON KREISKY-JORGENSEN TALKS

AU161809 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 16 Oct 80 pp 1,2

Jorgensen stressed his interest in Willy Brandt's report on the North-South problem, which he discussed with Kreisky, and declared that to this day there was no better proposal for solving the problems between the industrialized nations and the Third World countries. Jorgensen stressed Denmark's positive attitude toward Austria's wish for closer relations with the Common Market.

Kreisky declared that he agreed with Jorgensen's statements, and added that there were no bilateral problems between the two countries except the fact that there was no social insurance agreement between the two states. However, negotiations on such an agreement had already begun.

"Asked whether the Socialist International maintained contacts with Iran even during the war, Kreisky said there were personal contacts with both sides. However, he said, he does not regard as expedient any mediation attempt by the Socialist International between Iran and Iraq."

In reply to questions regarding the PLO, both government chiefs outlined their respective positions. "Jorgensen said Denmark was not ready to recognize the PLO, but it was ready to lend a willing ear to some of its demands, because in talks on the Middle East all factors must be taken into consideration." Kreisky pointed out that Austria in principle recognizes only states, and not even governments. "'We have de facto expressed our opinion that we recognize the PLO as representing the Palestinian people who have no country and no state. This is why we have offered the PLO representative in Vienna all the possibilities he needs for fulfilling his tasks. We are aware of the fact that we have gone a step further than the other European governments, but we considered this step long before the others,' Kreisky stressed. He added that, on the other hand, Austria was the only state that served as a transit country for Jews coming from the USSR. In both cases it is a question of helping oppressed peoples--this applies both to the Russian Jews and to the Palestinians without a country of their own and without the right to self-determination, he said."

PREBEN STEEN NEILSEN DISPUTES SOGAARD'S DEFENSE LINE

LD171247 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 10 Oct 80 Part 1 p 1

[Christian Broendum report: "Social Democratic Split on Defense Cuts"]

[Excerpts] Folketing Member Preben Steen Neilsen, Social Democratic defense spokesman, has attacked Defense Minister Poul Sogaard's proposal for a new defense settlement. Unlike the minister, he does not think that the reductions in defense personnel and materiel, which would be a consequence of the minister's proposal, are defensible. Preben Steen Neilsen told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE: "From a military viewpoint there are no arguments to support cuts." Against this stands the minister's own declaration in his proposal for a new defense settlement: "The above-mentioned necessary adjustments will mean a certain quantitative reduction of strength targets, but at the same time a qualitative improvement in materiel and training and a higher level of activities, and will therefore give the armed forces an acceptable defense capacity."

When asked if despite his reservations from the military viewpoint he supports the defense minister's proposal, Preben Steen Neilsen said: "We must take economics into consideration and we will have to reduce the strength targets from the 1973 defense settlement to bring about some agreement between targets and funds. If the question is put in this way, then I must answer yes. But we are not dealing with a final unchangeable proposal here, but a proposal open to negotiation. If there are to be any changes in the size of the defense budget they must be upward."

At the same time Social Democratic Folketing Group Chairman Knud Heinesen attacked in the Social Democratic publication "NEW POLITICS" yesterday the assertion that increased Third World aid could replace defense spending, an idea often put forward by the left-wing of the Social Democratic Party.

ATAKOL RETURNS FROM NEW YORK, COMMENTS ON CONTACTS

TA171r21 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] The Minister of Foreign Affairs and Defense, Mr Atakol, has returned to the Federated State after contacts in New York, Washington and London. Mr Atakol who had gone to New York for the UN General Assembly meetings, later went to Washington and London.

In a statement at Ercan State Airport on his return, Mr Atakol said that while in New York he had attended a meeting of the foreign ministers of Islamic countries. He added that he also had bilateral meetings with the UN Secretary General Mr Waldheim and the foreign ministers of several countries. Mr Atakol said that in Washington he had beneficial talks with the State Department Deputy Secretary Warren Christopher and high-ranking officials of the World Bank.

He stated that in London he had held meetings with the undersecretary to the Foreign Office responsible for Cyprus, the secretary of the Foreign Relations Committee of the British Parliament and representatives of British tourist organizations.

Mr Atakol said that in all his talks, which had been very beneficial, he had explained the latest developments on the Cyprus problem and had pointed out the discriminatory policy being followed toward the Turkish Cypriot community. He said that this attitude, especially at a time when the Cyprus intercommunal talks were being held, was leading to the hardening of the Turkish Cypriot attitude. He stated that he had stressed the Turkish Cypriot aims of living in freedom, freedom from any pressures and in equality with the Greek Cypriots and not as second class citizens.

Mr Atakol concluded by saying that everyone with whom he had held talks had shown better understanding than before to the Turkish Cypriot cause.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS TO WELCOME BRITISH DELEGATION VISIT

TA171328 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] A spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Defense has said that any parliamentary delegation that wanted to visit the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus could do so following a formal request to the Federated State authorities. He was commenting to correspondents this morning on reports that a British parliamentary delegation would be visiting Cyprus on a fact-finding mission to prepare a report for the British Parliament. He said that reports of the visit had been unofficially communicated to the Turkish Cypriot representative in London and to certain officials in the Fedrated State. He recalled that a similar visit had taken place to southern Cyprus in the past and that the delegation had prepared an anti-Turkish report. Nevertheless, the spokesman said that the delegation which is expected to visit Cyprus in December would be welcomed to visit the Turkish Federated State provided they make a formal request to the Federated State authorities for such a visit. He stressed [the hope] that the British parliamentary delegation would accord as equal a treatment to the Federated State as to the Greek Cypriot administration in the south.

When asked whether a continuation of the Cyprus intercommunal talks would be appropriate as the Greek Cypriot administration had lost its majority in the Greek Cypriot House of Representatives and there was a possibility of an early general election, the spokesman said that a general political assessment should be made but, nevertheless, the intercommunal talks would be continued.

I KATHIMERINI SAYS GOVERNMENT ACCEPTS ROGERS PLAN ON NATO

AT191326 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 19 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The issue of our country's return to NATO has entered a stage of rapid development following General Rogers' intense consultations in Athens and Ankara over the last 2 days. According to press reports, the Greek Government has considered the proposals of the NATO commander to be acceptable, as they have been formulated on the basis of Rogers' recent contacts with Chief of the National Defense General Staff General Gratsios in Naples (Thursday) and Turkish President General Evren in Ankara (Friday). Yesterday at noon, Prime Minister Y. Rallis briefed President of the Republic K. Karamanlis on the government's positive response; at 1930 he met with A. Papandreou. Following his briefing the PASOK chairman will make a statement today putting forth his party's position.

Now any further development of the issue depends on the position of Turkey which so far has not taken a stand on the Rogers proposals. Ankara's stand will possibly be announced when the issue is introduced to the NATO Military Committee for a final decision.

According to our reports the acceptance in principle of the Rogers proposals was decided upon during a meeting yesterday of the government committee: The Supreme National Defense Council, which convened at noon under the chairmanship of the prime minister, was also briefed in this regard.

The Greek Government's positive response became final after both the political and military aspects of the proposals were carefully studied and after all factors of the plan, on the basis of which our country's return to the military wing of the Atlantic alliance is being proposed, were evaluated.

According to our reports, the Rogers plan envisages that the status of operational control of the Aegean that was in force prior to 1974 will not change with Greece's return to the alliance's military wing but, at the same time, provides an opportunity for examining certain Turkish proposals for amending the borders of the two countries' zones of responsibility.

KKE (Exterior) Denounces Plan

[Statement issued 18 October in Athens by KKE (Exterior) Central Committee Press Office]

[Text] Following the statement on the country's reconfinement to the military wing of NATO, the KKE Central Committee Press Office has published the following statement:

As the government spokesman announced today after a similar statement by Chairman of the Socialist International Willy Brandt, the Rallis government has accepted the Rogers proposals and is proceeding with Greece's reconfinement to the NATO military wing.

It is thus being proved that the recent rhetoric about resistance to pressure was a deceptive trick by the government while at the same time it was proceeding into unacceptable concessions and compromises with the imperialists.

With this action, the government has put our country at the absolute disposal of U.S.-NATO imperialism. It has involved Greece in the adventurist plans of the Americans in the Middle East area at a critical period for peace, thus exposing the country to incalculable dangers. It has opened a dangerous stage for our defense and sovereign rights in the Aegean.

The Rallis government bears historic responsibilities for this action which is tantamount to national treason.

The government has no right to proceed with this antinational act. All the more so, since it is a minority government and the Greek people have not given it any authority in this respect.

We are convinced that the Greek people will manifest national unanimity in condemning this action and will struggle as one, determined to defend national independence and to have a Greece without NATO and bases, a Greece of national independence, democracy and social progress.

KKE (Interior) Scores Plan

AT191416 Athens I AVYI in Greek 19 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Following official reports about the acceptance by the Greek Government of the new Rogers proposals, the KKE (Interior) Central Committee, which has been conferring since yesterday (17 October), issued the following statement:

The KKE (Interior) Central Committee expresses its complete and categorical opposition to the country's return to the NATO military wing under whatever conditions this may take place.

We believe that the Rallis government is in complete opposition to popular will which demands that the application for return to NATO be withdrawn and the agreement for the U.S. bases in our country not be renewed. The government has no right to proceed into an agreement for return to NATO, all the more now when the country is in a pre-election period.

With militant movements and a coordinated mass struggle, all the democratic forces of the country must reject this traitorous policy of the government and demand respect for the Greek people's will: for the country's presence outside the military wing of NATO, the abolution of the U.S.-NATO bases, and the protection of national interests, national sovereignty and independence.

Papandreou Criticizes Return to NATO

AT192036 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] In a message to the Greek people, the leader of the official opposition and chairman of PASOK, A. Papandreou, mentioned that only yesterday he learned that the government had accepted the Rogers plan of 16 October regarding Greece's return to the NATO military wing.

It is difficult for the Greek people to forget, Papandreou stated, that in 1974 the prime minister, at that time Karamanlis, withdrew Greece from NATO--finally and irrevocably, as he had said--as a result of the allies' position on the barbaric invasion of the Turkish troops in Cyprus. Now the Greek Government is accepting the Rogers plan and is returning to NATO despite the fact that the Turkish armed forces, that is the NATO Armed Forces, occupy 38 percent of the land of suffering Cyprus. Therefore, the conclusion is inevitable that with this action the Greek Government is recognizing Cyprus' partition.

We have repeatedly stressed that the Atlantic alliance not only does not guarantee our country's borders but actually undermines them. However, in addition to the issue of the principle of whether or not Greece should return to NATO--the chairman of PASOK went on to say--a basic question arises. Do the terms under which our country is returning to NATO entail national concessions to Turkey? We claim that these terms are nationally unacceptable because they downgrade the country's defense, because they lead to concessions of Greek sovereign rights, and, finally, because they lead to future adventures.

It is worth noting that definition of the new status will be left to an interallied committee that certainly will not reach decisions soon if the differences between the two sides are taken into consideration. Furthermore, during the negotiations for the distribution, command and control over the Aegean airspace there will exist such generality that Turkey will use the Aegean airspace without the restrictions that were in force until 1974. Together with the new Rogers plan the limitation of national airspace from 10 to 6 miles becomes final.

It is a mistake, Papandreou stressed, to call the return to NATO "reintegration." It concerns an integration under new terms which constitutes a new agreement which, according to the Constitution, cannot be valid without a formal law. It should be noted that, to conclude a new agreement, an increased parliamentary majority is necessary, that is three-fifths of Parliament. However, it is clear to us and to the Greek people that the current Parliament does not have the necessary prestige because its composition is obviously in disharmony with popular feeling. Consequently, we do not recognize the right of this government to commit the country to integration with the NATO military wing, even if the government succeeds in passing its decision through the current chamber.

The president of the republic should dissolve the Parliament by recognizing its obvious disharmony with popular feeling, and the prime minister should propose to the president of the republic the renewal of the popular mandate, so the national issue of returning to NATO, which is of such exceptional significance, will be dealt with through new terms in the alliance's military wing.

Finally, Papandreou stated that PASOK shoulders the responsibility of putting the agreement for return to NATO to the judgment of the new chamber when it has assumed power in the national government.

Government Reply to Papandreou

AT192045 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Statement by Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis in reply to Andreas Papandreou's statement on NATO return]

[Text] The government regrets that, despite the complete briefing that was made to him on the basis of official texts, the PASOK chairman was not able or did not want to understand the truth. The fact is that, contrary to everything Papandreou says, no sovereign right of the country has been impinged upon and Greece is returning to the alliance's military wing in such a way that its defense capability is being strengthened and its military interests are being fully protected. This was unanimously judged to be the case by the country's military leadership. With the policy the government is following, the international position and security of Greece are being strengthened. For its part, the PASOK policy would obviously expose our country to dangers and would reduce its defense capability.

The strengthening of Greece's international position which will emerge from a return to NATO will certainly benefit Cyprus, to whom Greece will be in a position to give stronger support.

Greece never withdrew from the NATO political alliance to which its integration was ratified by law in 1952. The withdrawal from the military wing in 1974 did not take place through law but through government decision. Consequently, our return, which is taking place within the same legal framework envisaged by the alliance's charter, does not require legislative ratification. The government will ask the approval of its decision from the chamber through a vote of confidence.

The claim that the current Parliament does not reflect popular feeling constitutes an arbitrary judgment by Papandreou, which, of course, is not shared by the government.

NATO Statement Approves Return

Brandt is also due to meet majority opposition leader and chairman of PASOK Andreas Papandreou and KODISO, Democratic Socialist Party, Chairman Pasmazoglou.

DPA reports Brandt Talks

LD171952 Hamburg DPA in German 1504 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Athens, 17 Oct (DPA)--European issues dominated a number of talks held in Athens today between SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis, Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis and the leftwing Socialist opposition leader, Andreas Papandreou.

Brandt, who arrived in Athens on Thursday, and travels on to Crete for a holiday on Saturday, acquainted himself during the talks, which were held in a friendly atmosphere, with Greece's expectations concerning its admission to the European Community which comes into force on 1 January 1981. According to informed sources, Karamanlis and Rallis expressed in this connection the priority of political viewpoints and stressed that possible economic difficulties could be tolerated during a transitional period while Greece is becoming firmly tied to Europe and undergoing internal democratic stabilization.

According to these sources, the Greek side was cautious and somewhat skeptical during the talks regarding future developments in Turkey following the military coup and the possible effects of this on Greek-Turkish relations, since there are as yet no indications that the new regime will be able to overcome Turkey's deep-rooted domestic problems. Brandt expressed hope in this respect that there will be a return to democracy in Turkey and that it will be possible to get political fanaticism in Turkey under control. The talks also touched on the problem of Greece's return to military integration in NATO. The talks with Papandreou touched on questions of international cooperation between socialist parties.

Brandt Holds Press Conference

[Text] Willy Brandt, chairman of the West German Social Democratic Party, who is on a private visit to Athens held a press conference at noon today for representatives of the Greek and foreign press.

Brandt reminded all that he is in Athens today, 18 October, the date on which 36 years ago the Greek Government under Yeoryios Papandreou returned to Athens. Since that time, he said, Greece has gone through difficult phases but today it is in the process of accession to the Common Market. He added that during his stay in Athens he had interesting contacts with Greek leaders who demonstrated a great interest in the EEC. He also received valuable information and evaluations on the Community, Europe, problems of security and cooperation and on NATO.

In conclusion Brandt said, among other things, that responsible Greek politicians fully appreciate the situation not only in relation to the eastern Mediterranean but also on a wider scale including the Persian Gulf area. He expressed the hope that relations between West Germany and Greece will continue to be friendly and that they will be further expanded.

Comments on NATO, PASOK

AT191437 Athens NEWS in English 19 Oct 80 p 3

[By Lee Stokes]

[Excerpts] Former W. German Chancellor and leader of his country's Social Democratic Party Willy Brandt, currently on a private visit to Athens, gave a press conference at an Athens hotel yesterday noon in which he pointed out, inter alia, that "the main influence in Turkey is from the United States of America, while West Germany was playing a substituting role" in that country.

Mr Brandt, answering a question posed by the NEWSWEEK correspondent in Athens on whether special efforts had been made by the Social Democratic Party and others in West Germany to help bridge the gap between the Greeks and the Turks in view of West Germany's traditional ties of friendship with Turkey, said "He would be only too happy if his countrymen's influence could be used to settle the issues of Cyprus and the Aegean." Adding that the main influence in Turkey is one from the U.S. with West Germany playing a substitutive role. Political observers attached importance to the former chancellor's observation given that a new "Rogers' plan" is expected in Athens, which will allow Greece to re-enter the military wing of the Atlantic alliance.

SDP and PASOK "Different Parties"

Mr Brandt, on being asked to comment on relations between the Social Democratic Party and the Pan-Hellenic Socialist Movement, the main opposition party in Greece, said the two parties were linked not organically but on an ad hoc basis, adding "We are two different parties."

He said he had held talks with Mr Papandreou both here and during the latter's recent visit to Bonn, and had agreed to an exchange of views between the two parties.

Military Aid to Greece and Turkey

On the issue of military aid to Greece and Turkey, Mr Brandt repeated that "without being disloyal (to my own government), I hope the misgivings in Greece concerning (military aid to Greece and Turkey) will be overcome." Mr Brandt was making a reference to the Greek Government's refusal to accept 60 million marks in military aid from the FRG while Turkey received 600 million, i.e. a ratio of 1:10, compared to the initial ratio of 3:5 which the Bonn administration had originally agreed to adhere to for the sake of a balance of power in the Aegean.

The SDP leader said: "I understand the Greek Government's position," adding that he hoped some of these misunderstandings would be removed during the course of the next few weeks. He said that, objectively, it was a very difficult thing (to keep on best terms with) two nations with whom the FRG had different historical relations and close ties. He said that new problems would arise once Greece became a full member of the EEC, saying it would be "more difficult to manage the balance necessary if one looks at the region."

PASOK and Socialist International

Mr Brandt, referring to a possible application by PASOK to become a member of Socialist International [SI] said that SI was not a superpower, but a grouping of friendly parties, where each party had full responsibility for its own policies. He said there was no indication that PASOK at this time wanted to join Socialist International, adding that there was no tendency for SI to influence PASOK.

Solution in the Air

Mr Brandt, on being asked whether he discussed Greece's position in NATO during his talks with officials in Athens, said he spoke vaguely on this country's position in the alliance "to which she always belonged" even though she is currently not in its military wing.

Mr Brandt said that in his opinion, following contacts here and reports from Bonn, Greece is moving closer (to the alliance), hinting that a solution to the impasse on Greek re-entry into the military wing of NATO was not far in coming.

PASOK and the EEC

On being asked to comment on PASOK's opposition to EEC entry, Mr Brandt said PASOK seemed less against the EEC than "some of my British friends", adding that PASOK [phrase as published] MP's looked like working within the framework of the European Parliament once this country becomes a full member of the Common Market.

FOREIGN MINISTER ADDRESSES EUROPEAN MINISTERS ON TERRORISM

TA171714 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has asked that, following an increase in the attacks directed against Turkish missions abroad, host countries take the necessary measures to prevent these incidents

Turkmen delivered a speech on terrorism at the 67th meeting of the European ministerial council in Strasbourg. Turkmen in his speech noted that countries should condemn all terrorist incidents regardless of the source or nature. Turkmen said that in addition to increasing the measures taken in combating terrorism on a national level, governments should also develop bilateral and international cooperation.

The foreign minister stated that the Turkish Government is opposed to all kinds of terrorist acts regardless of their source or motive. Pointing out that the Turkish Government is determined to prevent incidents of terrorism, Turkmen said that these incidents will be dealt with indiscriminately regardless of their source.

Turkmen Report on Session

TA171518 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Telephone report by Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen in his speech at the Council of Europe ministerial council meeting in Strasbourg--recorded]

[Text] Various international issues were discussed during the European ministerial council meeting, which ended last night. First, issues concerning the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe were taken up at the meeting. In my speech on this subject, I noted that Turkey agrees with the views expressed regarding the current international situation and the process of detente, that the situation in Afghanistan and certain other developments adversely affected detente and that these circumstances should not, however, prevent us from working for the success of the Madrid conference. I seized the opportunity to stress that Turkey attaches great importance to the continuation of the process of detente.

Second, the development of European cooperation was discussed during the meeting. In my statement on this subject, I said that the visa requirement imposed by the FRG and France on Turkish citizens constitutes an obstacle to the development of European cooperation and that it discriminates against Turkish citizens. I called on other countries, which could be likely to take similar measures, to refrain from such action. I stated that our government would take the necessary administrative and legal measures. I added that we insistently expect the countries which imposed the visa requirement to review their decisions. Following my speech, the FRG state minister expressed regret over the obligation of the FRG Government to make this decision, that the decision is definitely not discriminatory, that he welcomed my speech and that his government will, in the future, review the visa requirement for Turkish citizens, which is in fact a temporary decision. He also expressed the hope that it will be possible to cancel it.

SWITZERLAND, CANADA EXTEND LOANS WITHIN OECD FRAMEWORK

TA171833 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] The agreements on the $37 million medium and long-term loans to be extended to Turkey by Switzerland within the framework of the OECD were signed in Ankara today. Of the $37 million, $15.5 million will be drawn in cash. This portion of the loan, which will be released following the signing of a banker's agreement, will be subject to the current market interest rate. The loan will be used to purchase goods from Switzerland. This loan is extended free of interest and for 25 years--with a 10-year grace period.

The agreements were signed by Finance Ministry Treasury Director General Tunc Bilge on behalf of Turkey and by Swiss Ambssador to Ankara Dieter Erich Chenaux-Repond on behalf of Switzerland.

The agreement on the $10.5 million loan to be extended to Turkey by Canada within the OECD special aid framework was also signed in Ankara today. This loan, which will be used to purchase goods from Canada, will be paid back in 20 years, with a 5-year grace period. It will be subject to a 5 percent interest rate.

TURKISH-U.S. TALKS ON DEFENSE PROJECTS END

TA171658 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] The meetings on joint defense projects cited in the Turkish-U.S. defense and economic cooperation agreement have ended in Ankara.

According to a statement issued by the Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General, the necessary procedures for the speedy realization of seven joint projects were determined during the meetings, which lasted 2 days. According to the statement, the Turkish side presented its domestic resources for the realization of the projects and determined its needs for foreign finance, and the U.S. side undertook to increase and continue its financial and technical support.

The two sides also agreed that the development of the Turkish defense industry will contribute to the cooperation both within a bilateral framework and within the framework of NATO.

The meetings, that are being held in accordance with the complementary agreement which is the second addition to the Turkish-U.S. defense and economic cooperation agreement, on defense industry cooperation will be continued at regular intervals.

ROGERS MEETS WITH EVREN, DISCUSSES NATO

TA171819 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 17 Oct 80

ENERGY MINISTER COMMENTS ON OIL SUPPLIES

TA191045 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] Energy and natural resources Minister Serbulent Bingol has said that Turkey has sufficient supplies of crude oil and that all the necessary measures have been taken to ensure the full capacity production of the refineries until the end of the year.

In a statement to the national press agency, Bingol said that 1,068,000 tons of crude oil have been secured--including existing stocks, the oil tankers on the roads, and the import deals which have already been paid for. This amount is sufficient to meet the refineries' needs for 1 month. Noting that 1 million tons of crude oil will be purchased from Libya and the spot market during November and December, Bingol announced that the country's needs for the next few months will thus be easily met.

Adding that some 7 million tons of coal are expected to be distributed during the 1980-1981 period, the energy minister noted that 24,000 tons of coal are being distributed daily and that this amount will be increased to 28,000 tons as soon as possible.

REPORT ON MEETING OF W. EUROPEAN COMMUNIST PARTIES

LD200919 Brussels LE SOIR in French 12-13 Oct 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "European Communist Parties and the Economic Crisis"]

[Text] At the beginning of the week the Belgian Communist Party [PCB] played host in Brussels to communist party delegations from European capitalist countries, that is, from countries where communists are not in power. All the communist parties except those of Iceland and Cyprus accepted the PCB invitation. The aim of the meeting was to study the consequences of the economic crisis and seek a response to it, at least as far as the defense of the people most severely affected by it is concerned. A German delegate referred to what he called "fascism and rightist capitalism." The meeting was "informal" and no resolutions were adopted. It was decided not to discuss any other present-day problem. For instance, the arms race was referred to only from the viewpoint of the burden which it represents for already weakened economies.

Certain countries' membership in the Common Market was discussed, but we were told that the study of this subject was pragmatic rather than principled. The particular parties' views on the EEC have apparently remained unchanged--the Italians and the Spaniards are in favor, or broadly so, whereas the Greeks and the Portuguese not to mention the French are against. Action to be taken with respect to multinational companies and to the consequences of the introduction of new technologies which foster unemployment were also discussed. However, communist parties do not wish to encroach on the role reserved for trade unions in this sphere. The results of these exchanges of views will be conveyed by the delegates to their respective leaderships and will be put in the hands of experts, with a view to putting ideas into action.

PCI Paper's Report

LD170907 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 10 Oct 80 p 21

[Arturo Barioli dispatch: "Open Comparison of Lines Among 21 European Communist Parties"]

[Text] Brussels--A lively, frank and open debate characterized the proceedings at the meeting of capitalist Europe's communist parties on the problems of the economic and social crisis, European integration and workers and democratic struggles, which ended in the Belgian capital yesterday. Over 50 speeches enriched mutual acquaintance with analyses and stances and made it possible to identify both points of convergence and points on which differences exist.

It was, as Comrade [PCI Central Committee member] Sergio Segre said, a demonstration of autonomy of assessment and approach. Furthermore, there are differences and diversities also within the socialist and social democratic parties, as shown by these parties' attitudes to the EEC, but there are also major issues on which a shared effort of research and formulation is possible and topical. Segre referred mainly to the problem of North-South relations, "which we regard as of essential importance and which we believe can be worked on to reach not only a shared viewpoint and assessment on the part of the West European communist parties and corresponding initiatives, but also a broad convergence with the other leftwing forces, with the socialist and social democratic parties and with other Christian or secular forces." This issue, Segre continued, immediately evokes the issue of East-West relations "since it is only too clear that, without a new thrust to detente and cooperation, without the success of the coming Madrid conference, without a halt to the arms race and without an understanding on a balanced and controlled reduction of all weapons, the world will be unable to devote to the problem of creating new relations between the developed and underdeveloped or developing countries the priority attention that it must have."

In the Italian Communists' opinion there is a close link between action to build a new international order and the struggle to advance along the democratic road to a kind of socialism based on freedom, democracy and pluralism. But, Segre continued, we also see a close link between this struggle, to be conducted in our own country and on a European plane, and the unitary action that we want to conduct and are conducting for a thorough regeneration of the EC. We believe that in this struggle it is possible to come together--as we are already doing in the European Parliament--withother forces of the workers movement and other democratic forces.

Attitudes to European integration, the EEC and its expansion were certainly one of the most hotly-argued points at the meeting. The positions expressed by the Italian Communists (Cervetti, Segre and Adriani) found broad convergences, for instance, with those of the Spanish Communists, for whom "the EEC issue is essential to consideration of a leftwing strategy." It is not, the Spanish Communists maintain, a matter of strengthening the EC as it stands, but of thoroughly transforming it.

A different attitude, however, was expressed by the French Communists, for whom "the expansion of the EEC to include Spain, Portugal and Greece will have disastrous consequences not only for our industry and agriculture and for our people's freedom of action but also for the peoples that will have to enter the EC." Such a stance is also partly shared by the Portuguese comrades.

There were also several differences regarding what kind of relations to build or to reaffirm with the forces of the workers movement and the left (a need which nobody denied in principle). While everyone agrees that leftwing unity is built through action on specific issues, some--like the Italian Communists--make it an indispensable strategic option, while other view it as an incidental and temporary factor, and yet others place the emphasis on condemning the rightwing stances of support for capitalism that allegedly characterize some socialist parties.

The meeting was also attended by two representatives of the Turkish Communist Party, the only illegal party in Europe, who urged the press to act as spokesman for a dramatic appeal. The military junta which built its power on the victims of terrorism, the document states, claims to want to guarantee "security of life" while in fact continuing with its arbitary arrests, torture and assassinations. Some 30,000 people have been arrested in just a few regions, but there is no information concerning the total number of arrests and nothing is known about the prisoners' situation. In the name of humanity, the appeal concludes, we urge you to act to expose these crimes.

PCF Delegation List

[Laurent Sauerwein dispatch: "West European Communist Parties' Meeting"]

[Text] Brussels, 8 October--A West European communist parties' meeting opened in the Belgian capital today. For 2 days delegates from 21 parties will carry out an informal exchange of views on the crisis which each country is facing, on European integration, and on each party's political action, proposals and struggles.

Indeed, the same capitalist crisis is affecting all the countries represented, but in very different circumstances.

The PCF delegation comprises Rene Piquet, Politburo member and European Assembly deputy; Gerard Streiff, Central Committee member and chief of the Foreign Policy Section European Department, Central Committee Member Edmond Aimable and Economic Section Member Bernard Marx.

GENSCHER ON COOPERATION WITH GDR; VISITS DECREASE

LD202006 Hamburg DPA in German 1455 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 20 Oct (DPA)--A week after the increase in the mandatory exchange requirement for Western visitors to the GDR, discussion over the reasons and the possible reactions of the Federal Republic continues unabated. The SED central organ NEUES DEUTSCHLAND has described the action by the GDR authorities as a measure which "does not run counter to the agreements between the GDR and the FRG nor to the spirit of the Helsinki Final Act."

Hans-Dietrich Genscher, FDP chairman and federal foreign minister, reaffirmed to the FDP presidium that the GDR's attempts at demarcation must not be answered by efforts at demarcation by the Federal Republic.

Genscher said that now it is a matter of demonstrating the will of the Federal Republic toward constructive cooperation. He warned against taking up proposals by the opposition regarding renegotiation of the Basic Treaty. Instead of calling into question through renegotiation that which has been "laboriously achieved," it is necessary to "press for the implementation of what has been agreed." Genscher welcomed the suggestion by CDU politician Gerhard Stoltenberg that the political situation regarding Germany be discussed by the leading representatives of all lower house parties.

Gerhard Kunze, authorized representative of the Berlin Senate, again demanded from his GDR counterpart Walter Mueller today the rescinding of the increase in the minimum exchange requirement for visitors to the GDR and East Berlin.

Senate spokesman Hermann Meyn said that during the 1-hour meeting Kunze pointed to the considerable fall-off in visits since the GDR's measure. He particularly stressed the fact that the measures imposed by the GDR authorities caused particular hardship to the socially weak. According to Meyn, Mueller described the Senate's concern as "interference in the internal affairs of the GDR."

Deputy GDR Minister for Culture Horst Pehnert made the continuation of cultural exchanges between the two German states dependent on general developments in political relations. In an interview in WESTFAELISCHER RUNDSCHAU today, Penhert said culture and the arts were "not islands, but dependent on normalization of relations between the states in accordance with the conditions recently set out by GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker.

One week after the introduction of the increased minimum exchange requirement, the number of West Berlin visitors to the GDR has dropped considerably. Senate spokesman Meyn said the number of visitors in this period had fallen by 58.3 percent. From 13-19 October only about 24,000 West Berliners had applied for a day trip to the GDR compared with 55,000 during the same period last year.

At the Luebeck-Schlutup border crossing point, on the other hand, the federal border protection force had registered normal traffic into the GDR. Only in the case of pensioners was a fall of about 30 percent noted.

GOVERNMENT 'WELCOMES' GREEK REENTRY INTO NATO

LD201942 Hamburg DPA in German 1433 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 20 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government has welcomed NATO's approval of Greece's reentry into the alliance's military structure. Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald told the press in Bonn that the government sees this as a strengthening of the alliance's southeast flank and an improvement in possibilities for settling other questions affecting Greece and Turkey.

DETENTE POLICY SEEN ENCOURAGING ADVERSE USSR ACTIONS

[Commentary signed FK.: "Ice Cold From the East"]

[Text] The clouds are gathering threateningly over Poland. While the courageous Walesa is making an introductory speaking tour of the country, attracting an audience of 12,000 in Krakow; while he talks of the new, independent trade unions being strong enough and not having to be afraid of anything, the generals and foreign ministers of the Warsaw Pact are meeting for so-called routine conferences which allegedly--it was declared hastily--have absolutely nothing to do with the Polish affair. The fact that this is being stated so expressly, at odds with all practice, underscores in a way the imminent threat of these meetings to rebellious Poland.

The measures accompanying what is looming ahead include Honecker's reckless delimitation policy, which is being promoted step by step in the direction of confrontation. The harassment of journalists accredited in East Berlin, the prohibition against reporting from the Saxon land synod in Dresden, will not be the last idea the GDR authorities come up with in that respect. It is quite possible that the Federal Government will be in for some embarrassing surprises in telephone communications and tourist traffic with the GDR, and perhaps even in the handling of transit traffic to Berlin.

A world torn from its detente dreams notes with surprise how miserably these partners adhere to treaties, how little they care about the letter and spirit of what they once signed, how greatly they disregard the humanitarian promises of Helsinki and how recklessly they misuse the confidence carelessly placed in them when they feel they need to. The shock over this seems to be particularly great in Scandinavia.

But the case of Afghanistan has already shown that shock alone will not have any effect whatsoever in Moscow. As long as the West European governments, above all the government in Bonn, say that detente policy must be continued, that "dialogue," "practical cooperation" must not suffer, the Kremlin may feel invited to trample on existing treaties and to quell any stirring of freedom with force. Instead of stretching their readiness for detente to no end, the Federal Government at long last should give energetic signals indicating that this very dialogue, this cooperation, may well end abruptly should Moscow continue to disregard human rights, contractual promises and the people's right to self-determination as grossly as before.

OPPOSITION OFFER TO COOPERATE IN FRG-GDR RELATIONS EXAMINED

[Commentary signed Mes.: "Jointly With the Shambles"]

[Text] Community: This lofty term elicits mistrust. Isn't it always invoked whenever politics has ended up in a seemingly hopeless blind alley? Is there more behind it than just mere helplessness or sheer tactics? The shock the GDR has inflicted on Bonn politics with its delimitation measures seems to have triggered a bit more. The idea that inter-German developments have been plunged into serious danger is causing both government and opposition to act more prudently than many people would have expected. Party politics have not been eliminated, yet the matter at issue is indeed seriously being taken into consideration by most people.

The opposition and the government have a similar assessment of the true situation: Bonn politicians have no instruments to prevent the GDR from running amok, except perhaps the instrument of circumspect reactions so as not to complicate matters even more.

In this situation the question plays a secondary role as to who had an inkling of the GDR's change of course, and when. Ever since the current development started in Poland any experienced politician dealing with German affairs could have figured out for himself that the GDR would not go untouched by these developments. Stoltenberg's suggestion of an all-party discussion may be useful in such a situation, because it indicates--leaving aside the tactical variant for a change--the opposition's readiness to refrain from making the shambles any greater. Strong doubt is indicated as to whether the suggestion to renegotiate parts of the Basi· Treaty is a good idea. The GDR would be interested in that only if its demand for the recognition of its own citizenship were to be included. Bonn, however, is prohibited by constitutional law from doing so.

PAPER SUGGESTS U.S. REELECT CARTER GIVEN INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

[Editorial by Horst Schreitter-Schwarzenfeld in Washington: "Reagan the Risk"]

[Text] If foreign affairs were not involved, the world could watch the U.S. election campaign from a distance. If the development of conflict regions such as the Persian Gulf also was not involved, and beyond that the future of global armament, a large part of this world might endure the campaigns of the U.S. presidential candidates like a television film. Carter or Reagan--does it really matter?

Revolutionaries are not involved in the game anyway. The basic pillars of society are not shaken. It is rather irrelevant for the rest of the world whether the U.S. income tax will be lowered immediately, later on or not at all. The main problems remain the same: inflation and unemployment. One might think that Ronald Reagan should be allowed to have a try at it; it can hardly become any worse than under Jimmy Carter.

Still, the United States is not just "any country." To a considerable extent the superpower within the West is responsible for the decisions on war or peace. Whether the United States behaves in an isolationist way or in an interventionist way is a question that concerns everyone. Whether Washington seeks to keep the balance with the Soviet Union or to gain superiority is a decision which affects nearly every country. Washington's defense policy turns out to be immensely important, especially for a country like the Federal Republic of Germany. We might even argue thus: U.S. defense policy is more important to Germany than is German defense policy.

Under these preconditions a potential Reagan presidency appears to be less natural, less normal and less "cool" than if the whole thing were to transpire merely under U.S. auspices. Reagan recommends interventionism where the Carter administration still shrinks back from doing so. Reagan demands that the SALT treaty, the second agreement on the limitation of nuclear armament concluded with the Soviet Union after 7 years of work, be annulled. And Reagan demands, finally, as does the Republican Party in its election platform, that the United States (like in the early fifties) gain strategic superiority over the Soviet Union again.

So far nobody has learned how a potential U.S. President Reagan proposes to negotiate the SALT treaty anew without causing the entire structure of arms control to topple in the process. Nobody knows to this day how the strategic superiority of the United States is to be obtained without unleashing in the process a worldwide arms race unprecedented in history. Detente, the policy of relaxing tensions, surely has been written off in Reagan's concept. Beyond that Reagan still has not answered the question of how--to touch on an American domestic issue--the gigantic extra expenditures for armament are to be covered without drastic cuts in social spending. After all, what he proposes to do is cut rather than increase state spending.

For other countries the problem is not that Reagan lacks international experience. Granted, Reagan at a certain point in his life was a movie actor; but then, most influential people in the United States did something else at some time, and nearly each politically important figure somehow comes from somewhere. The problem is rather that Reagan advocates the philosophy of shaking the process of establishing a balance between the superpowers that is ticklish.

There is a relatively widespread and simple theory about the world that exists in the United States. Under this theory peace is safe only if the United States dominates the world. It is in this "pax Americana" that the core of any policy of military strength is inherent. It is based on the possibly romantic, possibly naive, possibly arrogant idea that one's own strength is morally justified whereas that of the adversary is evil. Even at the risk of using certain cliches here with respect to Ronald Reagan's person we may be allowed to point out that this part of the United States feels good in the role of the valiant sheriff.

For the concept of a hitherto relatively sensitive balance in the world the election of Reagan no doubt spells a risk. At least we may predict that not only the nerves of the leading politicians but also those of the humble inhabitants of this globe will be put to a certain test. Under this aspect it would probably be better if the United States stuck with Jimmy Carter.

WEINSTEIN VIEWS NATO, BUNDESWEHR WEAKNESSES

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "Strong Points and Weak Points of the Bundeswehr"]

[Text] He who knows both the enemy and himself will win a hundred battles. This Chinese wisdom, transposed to NATO and the Warsaw Pact, inspires comparisons--even if we do not wage war but rather wish to prevent it through military readiness. Underrating the military adversary means violating a basic rule of strategy. Attributing to him the myth of invincibility, however, is psychologically wrong.

The superiority of the Red Army is known. Beyond the Iron Curtain it has more tanks than NATO. The vivid discussion on the modernization of the tactical theater nuclear weapons has shown what danger the Soviet SS-20 missiles represent for the Atlantic community. Yet the Warsaw Pact has its weak points. Geostrategically the cue is Poland. In military-technical respects there is a considerable difference in the quality of equipment and training. As far as leadership is concerned, the Russian military people are in an even more difficult position than are generals in the West. Over there it is becoming more and more problematic to supervise, use and operationally apply the complex weapons systems. Communist military organizations are rigid by virtue of their ideology. This is why the leadership apparatus must work in accordance with fixed plans. Strategy, however, is not mathematics. Thus, Afghanistan shows the limit of the Soviet-Russian military flexibility.

NATO has no reason to capitulate intellectually. However, the analysis of the enemy should not cover up one's own weak points. The fall exercises, Autumn Forge, gave the experts cause for criticism. The U.S. 7th Army and the reforger troops assigned to it did not leave the best impression. Granted, the United States Armed Forces are technically perfect, yet the military leaders in the lower ranks display little initiative of their own. The medium-level leadership has still not learned to use the tank as a dynamic weapon in combined battle. The men of the volunteer army, however, are inept in many cases as soldierly technicians. The mass of this army consists of people who more or less are doing a job.

It is different with the British. Here we find a military professionalism which is amazing in our time of aversion toward the military. But then, the British corps is not as well equipped as the Americans.

It would take time until the Army of the Rhine would be armed to a point where the military spirit of the rank and file would be in harmony with the technical potential. And what about the Bundeswehr? Our army just about holds the middle ground between the British and the Americans. Being an army of conscripts it is good, but not devoid of weak points. One of these points is the junior officer corps. The leadership qualities in the platoon, in the company, in the battalion leave much to be desired. The junior officers discuss at length questions concerning internal leadership. The leadership on the medium level, however, is being neglected. This must be changed, especially since the situation was different previously.

The Bundeswehr's most difficult problem, however, must be sought somewhere else. There will be fewer conscripts 5 years from now. The consequence may be that the armed forces, above all the divisions of the ground forces, will be "cadred" unless it is possible to replenish personnel by means of a prolonged service period. The politicians, however, will be inclined to take the course of least resistance. They will seek to mollify the domestic scene, preferring to reduce the army rather than extend the service period. This would be a heavy blow to the defense capability of this country.

This is why the defense minister must set priorities in the inventory that will now be made and which will be followed by decisions in February. The starting point for the considerations must be the question as to which service branch should be given priority politically and strategically. The answer can only be: the army. The divisions are our political currency in the Atlantic alliance. They constitute the elements of foward defense which make the meaning of armament plain to all citizens. The army should receive the lion's share of the budget. For the armed forces on the whole conscription must be extended not later than in 1985. It goes without saying that a ground force can deter credibly only if a strong air force covers it. But it is necessary to point out that 15 Leopard tanks can be given to the army for one Tornado plane.

What remains is the navy. Our strongest Atlantic partner would like to see the Federal Navy enlarged. The counterargument is that we must first of all support the frontline along the "Iron Curtain". We cannot count on the promised U.S. divisions which are supposed to be brought to Europe in case of hostilities. They are not ready for action, nor will they be 5 years from now. Hence, the sea and air power of the United States should protect the northern flank of the alliance and the Bundeswehr the central sector. It is necessary to discuss this division of labor with Washington.

ARREST OF GDR ESPIONAGE SUSPECTS CONFIRMED

LD202316 Hamburg DPA in German 1906 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Karlsruhe/Essen (DPA)--The Federal Prosecutor's Office tonight confirmed the arrest of three GDR espionage suspects. In reply to an inquiry, a spokesman said in Karlsruhe that arrest warrants had been issued last Friday against the three men, aged 35, 36 and 42. The spokesman was confirming a report in tomorrow's issue of NEUE RUHR-NEUE RHEINZEITUNG. Only last week the arrest was reported of a total of four suspected East bloc agents, three of whom are suspected of spying on armaments for the GDR. The fourth was a 42-year-old man with German and Romanian citizenship who is alleged to have worked for the Romanian intelligence service.

The three most recent arrests concern two separate cases of espionage. Two detainees, for whom an arrest warrant was issued last Friday, are strongly suspected of having entered the Federal Republic by order of the GDR Ministry for State Security [MFS] in order to involve a federal citizen in intelligence work for the MFS. One of them is probably a paid MFS official. He possessed a forged West German passport. The third detainee, who entered the Federal Republic from the GDR like the other two, is strongly suspected of seeking to establish intelligence connection on behalf of the MFS. When arrested he produced a provisional Berlin identity paper, which was a "complete fake." The Federal Prosecutor's Office did not disclose the names of the arrested persons or any other details.

INDIAN OCEAN FLEET REDEPLOYED CLOSER TO PERSIAN GULF

LD201543 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] In view of developments in the Iranian-Iraqi conflict and the threat to oil supplies, France has modified the deployment of its war fleet in the Indian Ocean by strengthening its permanent presence north of the Equator.

At present four French warships are cruising in the Sea of Oman south of the Tropic of Cancer between the 22d and 23d parallels, off the coasts of Muscat and Oman. They are the missile-launching squadron escort vessel Bouvet, two corvettes and the refueling tanker La Charente, also serving as command and communications vessel.

The ships of the French fleet in the Indian Ocean normally keep farther to the south, either in port at Djibouti at lat. 11-12 N., or around Reunion Island, on the 21st parallel So. Compared with their usual position off Djibouti, their new position takes them almost 2,500 km from their patrol area and considerably nearer to the Gulf of Oman, which is connected to the [Persian] Gulf by the Strait of Hormuz.

The ships are in the zone permanently to collect intelligence on the naval situation from the Sea of Oman and, if necessary, to take part in surveillance of tanker traffic.

The missile-launching frigate Sufren has left Toulon to relieve squadron escort vessel La Galissonniere which, however, will not leave the Indian Ocean before the beginning of December. At the same time the corvette Amiral-Charner will reach this zone to replace one of the four corvettes there.

Normally most of the French ships cruise in the Gulf of Aden, the Red Sea and the southern Indian Ocean when not in port.

ALBANIAN MINISTERS VISIT; TIES WITH FRANCE SEEN EXPANDING

LD200921 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] On 13 October, Albanian Foreign Minister Nesti Nase was received by his French colleague, Mr Francois-Poncet. It is the first time that a Franco-Albanian talk at this level has taken place. It lasted 1 hour, in a "cordial athmosphere," it was stated at the Quai d'Orsay, and concerned the international situation (Tirana keeping to a strictly nonaligned policy) and bilateral relations which the two ministers agreed to develop.

Mr Nase, who stopped in Paris on his way home from the United Nations, was invited to visit France in 1973 and 1974 but did not reply. Last year, however, he had a talk with Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Stirn at the United Nations and with Mr Andreani, Quai d'Orsay director for European Affairs, in Tirana.

Furthermore, Albanian Deputy Foreign Minister Ksenofon Nushi is to pay an official visit to France from 20-22 October at Mr Stirn's invitation. His presence in Paris will coincide with that of Mr Kondo, chairman of the Albanian National Committee for Culture, and the Albanian National Ballet Company which will appear at the Theatre des Champs Elysees.

Forty-three Albanian scholarship holders have been in France since October 1979. Even though still on a small scale, Franco-Albanian trade relations have developed considerably since French exports to Albania (mainly equipment worth Fr14 million) increased 56.6 percent last year and Albanian exports to France (chromium and tobacco worth Fr26 million) 73 percent.

CAPE VERDE PRIME MINISTER ARRIVES FOR 2-DAY VISIT

AB201424 Paris AFP in English 1418 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 20 Oct (AFP)--Cape Verde Prime Minister Major Pedro Pires arrived here today from Lisbon for a two-day official visit to France. During his stay he will have talks with French Prime Minister Raymond Bare and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Olivier Stirn.

Economic Cooperation to Increase

AB210842 Paris AFP in English 0653 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 21 Oct (AFP)--France and the Cape Verde island, the former Portuguese Atlantic colony off the coast of west Africa, pledged here last night to strengthen their economic cooperation. The intention was expressed during a dinner given by French Deputy Foreign Minister Olivier Stirn for visiting Cape Verde Premier Pedro Pires.

Mr Stirn said France's policy in Africa was to develop ties with English, Arab and Portuguese speaking states as well with the French-speaking countries which were once French colonies. Prime Minister Pires noted France's historic role in the continent, but pledged his country's policy of non-alignment. He said the world situation was worrying.

Today, Mr Pires is to confer with French Premier Raymond Barre. Tomorrow and Thursday, he and French Cooperation Minister Robert Galley will attend meetings of the joint Franco-Cape Verde cooperation commission.

FRANCOIS-PONCET PLANNED VISIT TO ROK POSTPONED

LD201359 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Oct 80 p 9

[Text] Mr Francois-Poncet's planned visit to Seoul has been postponed. A spokesman for the French Embassy to South Korea stated on 14 October that the visit has been deferred to a later, as yet "undecided date."

No date for Mr Francois-Poncet's visit has ever been announced officially in Paris but it was to take place on 20 October (that is, after the president's return from his visit to Beijing) and was unofficially announced as such in Seoul. The French Government does not conceal the fact that it wants to develop its political, cultural and economic relations with Seoul (an agreement on the sale of two nuclear power stations is at stake) but no date for the planned visit, the first by any French foreign minister, has ever been definitely determined because of the domestic situation in Korea. In any case, the French minister does not want to go to Seoul until he receives assurances that Kim Tae-chung, a member of the opposition who has been sentenced to death, will not be executed. A first plan for a visit by Mr Francois-Poncet last year was postponed after President Pak's assassination.

MARCHAIS INTERVIEWED ON BULGARIA VISIT, CSCE MEETING

AU131620 Sofia RABOTNICHESKO DELO in Bulgarian 9 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Paris correspondent Stefana Bildireva interview in Paris with Georges Marchais, secretary general of the French Communist Party, after his return from a vacation in Bulgaria; date not given]

[Text] Question: During your visit to Bulgaria you met our leaders and visited various places. What are your impressions of Bulgaria at this state of our country's development?

Answer: It is true tnat during my recent visit to your country I visited several towns and villages, and I had many meetings and talks. This gave me the opportunity to appreciate once more the importance of the economic, social and cultural progress of socialist Bulgaria during the last few years. In certain fields I find these achievements remarkable, I must say. In this context I am thinking of your agriculture, for example, and also your industrial upsurge. These are the most remarkable achievements of your country in the last 10 years, especially in such advanced sectors as computer technology and electronics. In evaluating these achievements my impressions are particularly strong when I compare the situation of your country with that of other neighboring countries which started at the same point.

What I saw in your country is undoubtedly a state where there is no economic crisis, as we know it in the capitalist countries, a country without unemployment--to put it briefly a country in full upsurge, where greater efficiency in labor is being sought and where the authorities are searching for a better satisfaction of their people's material as well as intellectual needs.

We must state that the realistic approach with which people in Bulgaria are treating the prospects of socioeconomic development, as well as the constant care devoted to the intensification of socialist democracy in all sectors of social life were of particular interest to me.

I know that the forthcoming months will be devoted to a great discussion in your country concerning the preparations for the 12th BCP congress. On this occasion, permit me to renew my wishes to the Bulgarian communists that they may be successful in the tasks they set for themselves.

Question: In your talks with Comrade Todor Zhivkov you discussed the problems of peace and detente. You stressed that real opportunities exist for efficient action against the arms race. What are the goals of the French Communist Party on the eve of the Madrid meeting?

Answer: Actually, during my meeting with Comrade Zhivkov I had an opportunity to dwell on the problems of peace, detente and disarmament, problems which more than ever play a role of primary importance on the international scene.

Our party, which at its last congress stressed the great significance of this issue, intends to persist in its efforts so that, together with all peaceloving men and women throughout the world, it may contribute to progress along the path of disarmament. This task is all the more urgent and important if we take into consideration the fact that imperialism is doing everything in its power to renew rearmament and to undermine the foundations of detente, as well as to provoke tension on our continent in this manner. This is why we recently multiplied our proposals and worked out important initiatives together with other political and social forces. The goal is more particularly to oppose the deployment of new U.S. missiles in Europe, as well as to prevent the production of a neutron bomb by France.

Because of this I personally addressed the president of the French Republic on several occasions with concrete proposals, stating that we should develop French initiatives for disarmament. Together with our Polish comrade we also became the initiators of a meeting of European communist parties in Paris, whose results call for other initiatives.

It is obvious that at the threshold of the Madrid meeting all these problems assume an extreme topicality. I intend to intensify even more the struggle on these questions of vital importance.

The Madrid meeting must become an important stage along the path of consolidating political detente and must open the path of military detente. We already have expressed the demand that France should take the initiative for convening a European conference on questions of disarmament and on rearmament. We have called the French people to join together on the largest scale, so that our country may become the initiator of bold actions and courageous proposals.

We will have the opportunity in the near future to develop these initiatives. This will become more possible particularly during the UN week devoted to disarmament. We wish this week to become a true starting point for informing the public, and we will demand that the French Government take concrete initiatives on this subject. We welcome the good cooperation between the BCP and the PCF on the questions of disarmament and peace, and we intend to decisively persist in this cooperation.

LE MONDE ON SAFETY OF IRAQI NUCLEAR REACTOR

LD200945 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Oct 80 p 38

[Unattributed report: "Is the French Enriched Uranium Supplied to Iraq Still Guarded by the French?"]

[Text] LIBERATION writes this Friday, 10 October, that 12 kg of enriched uranium supplied to Iraq by France has been "abandoned by French technicians to the Iraqis' discretion."

The supply of highly enriched uranium for the small Isis reactor ("critical model"), which has a power of 800 kilowatts, and the Osirak research reactor built by France for Iraq has never been officially confirmed.

Questioned on this subject by a senator, Mr Francois-Poncet merely replied that the many research reactors functioning in the world are fed by highly enriched uranium (especially American uranium); that Iraq, which has signed the Nonproliferation Treaty (unlike Israel), accepts monitoring by the Vienna International Atomic Energy Agency and that "all the necessary precautions" have been taken by France (notably by the presence of French technicians at the Iraqi nuclear center) to ensure that the French uranium is only used for the reactors and could not be removed to build a nuclear bomb.

According to unofficial but reliable information Isis functioned for 30 minutes at full power, which implies that a charge of 12 to 13 kgs (apparently in the form of metallic enriched uranium) was indeed supplied to Iraq.

The question is how this charge has been guarded since the air attack on the Iraqi nuclear center at (Tammuz) near Baghdad on 30 September by aircraft which have not been accurately identified. After the attack the AEC [French Atomic Energy Commission] indicated that volunteer French technicians had stayed to keep watch on the plant. On Thursday, 9 October, the Quai d'Orsay specified that of almost 5,000 French citizens working in Iraq before the conflict 878 were still there on 8 October, 631 of them in the Baghdad region.

LIBERATION also published the facsimile of internal correspondence carried out by Technicatome, a subsidiary of the AEC, working with Iraq, indicating that a document entitled "Israeli Boycott" was to be regarded as "contractual" with Iraq. This document does not seem to relate to a ban on French Jewish technicians but a pledge by Technicatome not to work with Israel or the Israelis.

However, there can be no doubt that many agreements reached between French enterprises and Arab countries contain provisions ostracizing French Jews, in violation of the antiracist law of 1 July 1972. Moreover Iraq is apparently not the most intolerant Arab country in this respect.

Saudi Arabia is apparently much more intolerant. A prime minister's directive of July 1977 aimed at moderating the effects of this law in "France's economic interest" was canceled by the Council of State on 18 April 1980. It was resumed in a different form by a directive dated 9 May which is at present being examined by the Council of State.

LE FIGARO VIEWS EFFECT ON GDR OF POLISH EVENTS

LD210933 Paris LE FIGARO in French 16 Oct 80 p 4

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Moscow Is Afraid That the Polish 'Sickness' Could Spread to the GDR"]

[Text] The sudden tension between the two Germanies created as a result of the GDR's recent decisions and its principal leader Honecker's speech has apparently surprised the Bonn government, even though nothing unexpected has occurred. In fact, everything stems from the Polish crisis. It has been written in these very columns in this context that in the Soviet Union's view, the future of East Germany is dependent on that of Poland; it is the entire system established in 1945 which could well be challenged; it is the fundamental result of the Soviet victory--that is, the Russian political and military presence in central Europe--that is threatened. You only need glance at the map to realize this: Without the "hinterland" constituted by Polish territory, the "forward" line of the socialist camp--that is, the GDR--would be isolated and subjected to the contagion of events in Poland, and the future of its regime would become very uncertain.

In fact, the events which have occurred in Warsaw since the concessions made to the Gdansk strikers and Gierek's replacement by Kania have shown that the Polish crisis has not been resolved. The threat thus posed to the Soviet positions has not disappeared. It could be foreseeen that Moscow would think about ways to protect itself from them. It is quite likely that the Soviet leaders themselves do not know whether they will have to intervene militarily to preserve the Polish communist regime and it is quite probable that they foresee the dangers which would result from such an intervention. In fact, they cannot even be certain that their intervention would achieve its objectives if it were to encounter armed resistance in the field. Everything indicates that they have to rest content with letting the Polish Government act in its own way while continually warning and admonishing it and waiting for an opportunity to regain control over the situation.

A Feared Contagion

Meanwhile, however, it is the contagiousness of the events in Poland that they fear most, especially where its consequences would be most serious, namely in the GDR. Preventing this contagion is now their aim and this explains the decisions adopted by Honecker. Since the signing of the "Basic Treaty"--the cornerstone of Chancellor Brandt's "Ostpolitik"--between the two Germanies on 21 December 1972, inter-German exchanges have considerably increased. Both states deemed it to their advantage to develop their economic relations and neither wished to call them into question. From the political viewpoint, however, the most significant factor was the fact that FRG citizens had the right to visit their families in the GDR--in 1979, 3.5 million West Germans visited East Germany as a result. If you recall that the GDR has only 17 million inhabitants you will realize that the majority of its population is in direct and regular contact with FRG nationals. And if you add to this the fact that GDR citizens mostly listen to Western radio stations you will realize to what extent they can be impregnated with everything that originates in the West.

The Polish example has made the Soviet leaders decide that they must act--in their present state of mind, they cannot put up with a situation which, they fear, could lead to the German communist state's destabilization. By demanding DM23 instead of DM6 from every FRG national visiting his family in the East, they intend to avert this danger in a drastic manner.

In fact, this decision was most probably made by the Soviets. The Honecker government's general political line was indeed completely different. That government advocated a speedier normalization of relations among European countries and readily cited its dealings with the FRG as an example of what should be done between East and West.

The demands which it has just revived are of a ritualistic nature but the fact that they were not satisfied in 1972 did not prevent a rapprochement between the two German states. The "Basic Treaty" has left two problems unresolved: the East and West Germans' nationality and the nature of Bonn-East Berlin relations. The two governments had acknowledged that there is one German nation and there are two German states. However, the FRG, whose constitution stipulates that there is only one German people, was unwilling to recognize that East Germans have a distinct nationality. This is what Honecker demands that it should do. Similarly, in order not to condone the country's division officially, the Bonn government decided that each German state should maintain in the other not an embassy but a "standige vertretung" (permanent mission) in the same way as they do in the case of international organizations. But Honecker now demands that the general rule governing international relations be henceforth observed.

Obviously, none of all this is of essential importance. What is important to the Soviet Union is to put an end to any risk of political "contagion" in East Germany, and this is why its relations with the West must strictly be reduced. At the very most it can be said that it is regrettable that Chancellor Schmidt postponed his planned meeting with Honecker for fear of criticisms directed against him by his election rivals. He could have warned his interlocutor against the dangers to inter-German relations inherent in any change in the policy pursued hitherto. And no one knows whether such warnings would not have had some effect.

It is clear that the course now being pursued is contrary to everything that was envisaged at the Helsinki conference and was to be improved at the Madrid conference, which was supposed to be a continuation of the Helsinki conference. Maybe the Soviet leaders became less interested in the latter conference since the Western governments warned them that they first of all wanted to discuss Afghanistan there.

Diplomatic Weapons

All this would appear to confirm the thesis that, contrary to what has been written so often, the Helsinki agreements have provided West Europeans with diplomatic weapons and are an embarrassment only to Eastern governments, and that any increase in exchanges under the auspices of detente--especially when they imply a free circulation of people and, consequently, ideas--is always dangerous to closed societies and favorable to free societies. At present, however, the most important thing for the Soviet Union is preventing a disintegration of its zone of influence in Eastern Europe--in its foreign policy, this imperative surpasses everything else in importance.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTS UNDER SECRETARIES; TO PRESENT POLICIES

AU210859 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 21 Oct (ANSA)--The new Italian Government will go before the Parliament Wednesday todeliver its policy statement. Arnaldo Forlani's four-party coalition can count on a comfortable majority of 90 votes in the House and 60 in the Senate.

Forlani held his first cabinet meeting here last night to appoint undersecretaries to the 26 ministries of his newly-installed administration. The first appointment was that of Luciano Radi as undersecretary to the Premier's Office. He was immediately sworn into office and put to work as secretary of the meeting. The total number of undersecretaries appointed was 57, the same number as in the previous administration. Of this total, 31 were Christian Democrats (DC), 16 were Socialists (PSI), 6 were Social Democrats (PSDI) and 4 were Republicans (PRI). There were no Social Democrats in the previous government so that a redistribution of the posts was necessary. The DC lost three spots to the PSDI, the Socialists 2 and the Republicans 1.

The following is the list of undersecretaries:

-Luciano Radi: Premier's Office (DC deputy)
-Pier Giorgio Bressani: Information (DC deputy)
-Francesco Mazzola: Security Services (DC deputy)
-Francesco Quattrone: Public Administration (DC deputy)
-Luigi Giglia: Southern Development (DC deputy)
-Costantino Belluscio: Foreign Affairs (PSDI deputy)
-Libero Della Briotta: Foreign Affairs (PSI senator)
-Aristide Gunnella: Foreign Affairs (PRI deputy)
Edoardo Speranza: Foreign Affairs (DC deputy)
-Marino Corder: Interior (DC deputy)
-Giuseppe Di Vagno: Interior (PSDI deputy)
-Angelo Maria Sanza: Interior (DC deputy)
-Giuseppe Gargani: Justice (DC deputy)
-Domenico Lombardi: Justice (DC senator)
-Francesco Spinelli: Justice (PSI senator)
-Antonino Drago: Education (DC deputy)
-Franca Falcucci: Education (DC senator)
-Claudio Lenoci: Education (PSI deputy)
-Giacomo Mazzoli: Education (DC senator)
-Francesco Fossa: Public Works (PSI senator)
-Giorgio Santuz: Public Works (DC deputy)
-Mario Campagnoli: Agriculture (DC deputy)
-Fabio Fabbri: Agriculture (PSI senator)
-Anselmo Martoni: Agriculture (PSDI senator)
-Antonio Caldoro: Transport (PSI deputy)
-Giusi Roccamonte: Transport (PSDI senator)
-Elio Tiriolo: Transport (DC senator)
-Lucio Abis: Budget (DC senator)
-Giuseppe Amadei: Finance (PSDI deputy)
-Francesco Colucci: Finance (PSI deputy)
-Mario Gargano: Finance (DC deputy)
-Carlo Fracanzani: Treasury (DC deputy)
-Calogero Mannino: Treasury (DC deputy)
-Giuseppe Pisanu: Treasury (DC deputy
-Angelo Tiraboschi: Treasury (PSI deputy)
-Claudio Venanzetti: Treasury (PRI senator)
-Pasquale Bandiera: Defense (PRI deputy)

- Amerigo Petrucci: Defense (DC deputy)
- Martino Scovacricchi: Defense (PSDI deputy)
- Giorgio Bogi: Postal/Telecommunications (PRI deputy)
- Pino Leccisi: Postal/Telecommunications (DC deputy)
- Gaspare Saladino: Postal/Telecommunications (PSI deputy)
- Bruno Corti: Industry (PSDI deputy)
- Maria Magnani Noya: Industry (PSI deputy)
- Francesco Rebecchini: Industry (DC senator)
- Angelo Castelli: Labor (DC senator)
- Giuseppe Miroglio: Labor (DC senator)
- Sisinio Zito: Labor (PSI senator)
- Baldassare Armato: Foreign Trade (DC deputy)
- Roberto Palleschi: Foreign Trade (PSI deputy)
- Giuseppe Caroli: Merchant Marine (DC deputy)
- Giovanni Nonne: Merchant Marine (PSI deputy)
- Giuseppe Dal Maso: State Participation (DC deputy)
- Giuseppe Tocco: State Participation (PSI deputy)
- Bruno Orsini: Health (DC deputy)
- Enrico Quaranta: Tourism (PSI senator)
- Rolando Picchioni: Cultural Heritage (DC deputy)

There were 9 new DC undersecretaries, including 58-year-old Radi, appointed to the Premier's office. Radi also directs the DC daily IL POPOLO.

Those who are no longer undersecretaries in the new government are: Azzaro, Ciccardini, Fontana, Giacometti, Ianniello, Vito Napoli, Perrone, Pisoni, Pumilia, Tantalo, Tambroni and Zamberletti.

All but two of the socialist undersecretaries were reconfirmed (those out are Conte and Monsellato). Among the Republicans, only Robaldo is out of the new government, while the remaining four were all reconfirmed. Among the new undersecretaries 39 are deputies and 18 are senators.

HIGH GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS ATTEND LONGO FUNERAL

SOMALI FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS WITH COLOMBO IN ROME

AU201556 Rome ANSA in English 1545 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 20 Oct (ANSA)--Somali foreign Minister Jama Barre met here today with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo for talks on the situation in the Horn of Africa and Somalia's oil supply difficulties as a result of the fighting between Iraq and Iran.

According to official sources, the two ministers also discussed bilateral relations between Italy and the East African state.

MADRID CSCE PREPARATORY MEETING 'TOTALLY PARALYZED'

LD172233 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 17 Oct 80

[TExt] The situation at the preparatory meeting for the Madrid conference after 6 weeks of meetings is one of total paralysis because the positions taken by the Western and Communist countries are irreconcilable regarding the subject of the timetable and program for the debates.

At today's session there was another disagreement between the two blocs when the Western countries rejected a Polish proposal setting 5 March next year as the approximate concluding date for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, which will begin in Madrid on 11 November. The Polish delegation also insisted that the participating countries should formally renounce the possibility of resubmitting at any point in the main conference subjects which have already been previously debated. The proposal was rejected for the Western countries during the speech by British representative Michael Taite.

CABINET NAMES MELIA AS GOVERNOR OF CATALONIA

LD181226 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Text] The official state gazette today published the appointment of Josep Melia--hitherto secretary of state for information--as governor general of Catalonia, a post which was assigned to him at the meeting of the Council of Ministers yesterday. The official state gazette also reports the dismissal of Gen Saenz de Santa Maria as the government's special representative for security in the provinces of Guipuzcoa, Alava and Vizcaya. Gen Saenz de Santa Maria will continue to carry out his duties as inspector general of the national police, a post which he held simultaneously with that of special representative in the Basque country. Last week Marcelino Oreja Aguirre was appointed governor general of the Basque country with the rank of minister.

Military Appointments

LD172306 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Summary] At today's Cabinet meeting Secretary of State for Information Josep Melia was appointed the new governor general of Catalonia. At the same time the cabinet agreed on the dismissal of the government's special delegate in the Basque country, Gen Saenz de Santa Maria. The Cabinet also appointed Army Lt Gen Luis Alvarez Rodriguez president of the Supreme Military Tribunal and Army Lt Gen Luis Polanco Mejorada was appointed captain general of the Sixth Military Region.

SUSPECTED TERRORISTS ARRESTED IN SEVILLE

[Summary] Police in Seville, with assistance from police forces in Madrid and Cadiz, have arrested 20 people on suspicion of terrorism, including those believed to be responsible for the planting of devices looking like bombs with republican flags attached, which were found in a number of places in Cadiz in September.

Seville Police Chief (Raimundo Maestro) said that these arrests represent the smashing of three organizations in Andalusia: the Assembly for the Release of Anti-Fascist Prisoners, the Democratic Organization of Anti-Fascist Students, and the Committee for Rescuing the Spanish Communist Party-Reconstituted. All these organizations are sponsored by the Spanish Communist Party-Reconstituted [PCE-R]. Those arrested had direct links with GRAPO [1 October Armed Revolutionary Group], via Juan Martin Luna, who broke out of Zamora prison last December. All those arrested are between 20 and 22 years of age, and the PCE-R was engaged in recruiting young people to form GRAPO armed groups.

House searches connected with the arrests have brought to light propaganda, typewriters, offset printing equipment and information about the structure of the three organizations. Police believe that they have nipped in the bud a GRAPO recruitment drive aimed at stepping up terrorist activity.

DENMARK

SOGAARD EXPLAINS THINKING ON DEFENSE SPENDING

LD171303 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 13 Oct 80 p 6

[Danish Defense Minister Poul Sogaard "debate" article: "Evaluate Defense on Basis of Reality--Not on Unrealized Goals"]

[Text] Many things, based not on the facts but on strength targets envisaged in 1973--which were never realized--are being spoken about defense. The armed forces look somewhat different in 1980 from the way they did in 1973.

The armed forces are also characterized by new technology, which is more effective than the technology we had in the past. On the other hand new types of weapons are more expensive and require more than the present cost-of-living-adjustment index has been able to permit. If we add to this longer holidays, reductions in working hours, safety requirements and the limitations imposed by reductions in the overall economic framework that have hit all ministries, it becomes excessively difficult to reconcile targets and funds.

For this reason the departure point for today's debate is not the armed forces as they were envisaged in 1973. The subsequent budgetary framework has not been sufficient for the ambitions voiced then.

With the government's proposal for a new defense bill my object is that targets and funds will be in better agreement throughout the whole period during which a multiparty defense settlement is to run, in this case for the next 4 years.

The departure point was therefore framework legislation for such a period, when strength targets will be fixed in a supplementary document or a report. Thus once a year during this period it will be possible to make a political evaluation of the status of the defense forces for the past year on the basis of reports from the defense high command. In connection with the continuous security appraisal the following year's framework for personnel, materials and activities can be fixed.

The primary goal of the defense forces should be to prevent war and to preserve the country's sovereignty. In cooperation with our NATO partners we will make our efforts credible.

Our position at the exit from the Baltic to the open seas makes surveillance and warning activities and the maintenance of our sovereignty important tasks--not only for ourselves but also for our partners.

With a system of measures for dealing with crises adapted to our needs we must be able in given situations to make careful adjustments in our reactions to stimuli, and neither over- nor underreact.

In this connection surveillance and warning activities are of crucial importance for combat-readiness arrangements, for example for mobilization, minelaying and possibly reinforcements. For this reason the government attaches great importance in its proposal to the consideration that surveillance and warning activities are given a prominent and positive place among the activities that the defense forces are to carry out. It is chiefly the daily activities of the navy, air force and intelligence service that are important here, while at the same time it must be possible for the home guard to function properly throughout the country.

Even though much interest is concentrated on surveillance and warning activities, the defense forces must also be able to counter an attack until we can receive help from our NATO partners.

If the proposal is implemented, there will be a real increase in the effectiveness of surveillance and warning at sea. There would be more surveillance vessels at sea, and at the same time four new naval helicopters would be acquired.

The proposal makes no change in the number of minelayers. In the period 1983-1987 alone there would perhaps be a slightly smaller number of submarines.

Coastal radar coverage and the navy's system of control and command would be improved. Our corvettes and motor torpedo boats are among the most modern in the world and together with our two modernized frigates form the backbone of sea defenses. Together they are of immense combat value in our defense against invasion, not least because of their armament. In the air force the F-16 and Draken aircraft, together with the F-104's, will form the backbone. According to the proposal the air force will also have its capacity for surveillance and warning activities improved through the development of defenses against low-flying aircraft combined with the so-called AWACS system, which can maintain surveillance over very large areas from the air. In addition the F-16 has improved the air force's combat capacity.

The army will continue to consist of field and local defense units. Three brigades will be maintained on Jutland, while on Sjaelland there will be two combat units, each with its own command. This will mean that it will still be possible to counter invasion attempts in more than one location. Added anti-tank weapons will be acquired and the Centurion tanks will be modernized. No change will be made in the home guard's role--it will continue to be equipped with modern materiel.

All three service branches will also acquire further stocks of ammunition and mines, and air defenses with new missile batteries for the protection of reinforcement units will be established. At the same time the acquisition of new trucks and new signals materials and the modernization of the army's mobile artillery will commence.

Having said all this, it must also be said that there will be reductions in the standing organization of the defense forces. This will happen first and foremost through the closing of superfluous barracks, the rationalization of workshops, depots and so forth. But there will also be a reduction in the numbers of actual combat units. A number of ships and aircraft are expected to be withdrawn from service, but for several of them there will first be investigations into whether it is realistic to prolong their life; this will, for example, affect the ships of the Sealion class and the F-104 aircraft.

Reductions in personnel are not as dramatic as certain sources have painted them. Between 1981 and 1985 the reduction for peacetime forces will be 4.4 percent and for combat forces 7.5 percent.

I have of course not given any precise figures here for the number of aircraft, ships and so forth that we will have under the terms of the next defense agreement, but I think that I have pointed out that we are in no way talking of dramatic cuts, a defeatist attitude or defense forces unable to fulfill their tasks, which many non-socialist newspapers, for example, have suggested.

With continued price and wage increases based on the cost-of-living index built into the defense budget the Danish defense forces have a positive future. Acceptable level of defense capability will continue to form a part of Danish security policy.

CP CHAIRMAN COMMENTS ON SUPPORT FOR KOIVISTO

LD201044 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] The chairman of the Finnish Communist Party, Aarne Saarinen, has said that the Communist Party cannot in the future give support to Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto in the 1984 presidential elections.

In an interview with the Helsinki Swedish-language daily HUFVUDSTADSBLADET, Mr Saarinen pointed to a connection between the popularity of Mr Koivisto and what he consiered a growing drift to the political right. Mr Saarinen also said that there are foreign policy reasons to support the view that a united leftwing front cannot be created to back Dr Koivisto.

But Koivisto as presidential candidate for the elections in 1984 hit the headlines on Friday as the main Social Democratic daily in Finland wrote that he would be the most likely Social Democratic candiate for the presidential elections to be held in 1984. Chairman Saarinen of the Communist Party holds the view that President Kekkonen's term of office could be extended beyond 1984. That view has also been endorsed by the conservative chairman Ilkka Suominen, reports the Finnish news agency.

MINISTERS' IRAQI VISIT POSTPONED; TRIP TO GREECE STILL ON

LD210845 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 16 Oct 80 p 9

[Norsk Telegram Byraa report: "Norwegian Visit to Iraq Postponed"]

[Text] Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund has postponed his visit to Iraq at the request of the Iraqi authorities. Foreign ministry press spokesman Geir told Norsk Telegram Byraa [NTC] that the Iraqi UN ambassador contacted his Norwegian counterpart, Ole Aalgaard, and asked for a postponement.

The visit to Iraq was originally to have taken place 27-29 October, but according to information given to Norsk Telegram Byraa the war in the area around the Persian Gulf is the direct reason for the postponement. The Iraqi government will return to the question of a visit at a later date, it was said.

Trade Minister Reiulf Steen was to have visited Iraq at the end of September, but the visit was postponed until December at the request of the Iraqis. It is not certain at this time whether this visit will take place as planned.

Frydenlund's visit to Greece will however take place according to plan. Frydenlund will leave for an official visit to Greece on 30 October and return on 3 November. This visit was to have taken place in April this year, but was postponed because of illness.

NICOSIA GOVERNMENT COMMENT ON GREECE'S NATO REENTRY

NC201215 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Answering a question on Greece's reintegration into the military wing of NATO, the government spokesman in Nicosia has stated that the reintegration is an internal affair of the Greek Government and that the Cyprus Government cannot have any involvement in it. The spokesman added: As for Greece's interest in Cyprus, this has been reaffirmed repeatedly and the Cyprus Government knows that, whatever its position in various international organizations may be, Greece's interest in Cyprus remains always unabated. The spokesman went on: The Cyprus Government believes that with Greece's reintegration into NATO Greece's interest in Cyprus will not be affected in any way and its support will continue. Answering a question on reports that Greece's reintegration is linked with a Cyprus solution, the government spokesman said that the Cyprus Government does not have any such information.

GOVERNMENT CRITICIZES TURKISH PROPOSALS ON VAROSHA

NC191107 Nicosia I MAKHI in Greek 19 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Government circles yesterday refrained from commenting on a report in Istanbul's HURRIYET that the proposals submitted by the Turks at the negotiating table provided for the return to Famagusta of only 20,000-30,000 Greeks. Political observers consider the government's silence imperative to avoid a tense atmosphere that would have unfavorable repercussions on the course of the talks. However, foreign independent political observers and diplomatic circles in Nicosai have not hesitated to stress that the Turkish proposals on Famagusta--if they are as presented by HURRIYET--cannot be at all constructive, because:

A) The number of Famagustan refugees is almost twice the number proposed by the Turks.
B) The Waldheim formula, on the basis of which the talks are being conducted, speaks explicitly about resettlement of the Greeks in Famagusta under a UN, not a "Turkish Cypriot", regime.
C) The same Waldheim formula does not provide for any concessions from the Greek side to the Turkish Cypriot side in return for the resettlement of the Greeks in Famagusta.

According to reliable Turkish Cypriot sources, there are various disagreements between the Turkish Cypriot leaders and Turkey's military leaders--who are now ruling the country--over the stance of the Turkish Cypriot side at the inter-Cypriot talks. The purposeof Denktas' visit to Ankara in the next few days is to discuss these disagreements. According to the same sources, the Ankara military leaders will urge Denktas not to take any initiative in the Cyprus issue without the approval of the Turkish Government, which will have absolute responsibility for handling the issue.

Pertinent reports say that the Ankara military leaders have promised Western quarters to maintain a conciliatory stand in the Cyprus issue, a fact that would also be conducive to both the restoration of Greek-Turkish relations and to enabling Greece's reintegration with the military wing of NATO. The same reports finally say that Western quarters are following the Cyprus issue and Greek-Turkish relations closely, and that they are in constant contact with both Athens and Ankara.

Ankara Reports Talks' Recess

TA201039 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] UN Secretary General's Special Envoy to Cyprus Hugo Gobbi has announced that Cyprus Developments are being assessed. Gobbi met today with the Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the intercommunal talks, Umit Suleyman Onan. Replying to a Turkish Radio and Television correspondent's questions after the meeting, which lasted over 90 minutes, Gobbi said he is assessing the Cyprus problem as a whole. Gobbi added that no difficulties arose during the talks.

In his statement, Onan said that an assessment of the situation was made during the meeting with Gobbi, who visited him on the occasion of Bairam, Gobbi had met with Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhi on Saturday. The intercommunal talks, which were recessed due to Bairam, will be resumed on Friday, 31 October.

I SIMERINI CLAIMS AKEL SUPPORT FOR MIKHAILIDHIS

NC190927 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 19 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] According to our information, Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis, president of the House of Representatives and leader of the New Democratic Front (NEDIPA), has held a new meeting with the AKEL leaders with whom it [the new party] appears to have reached some tacit agreements. Specifically, we are informed that the AKEL leaders have promised to render minimum support to Mr Mikhailidhis to help him remain in office as House President until the end of his term.

It was not learned, however, whether the AKEL leaders would support Mikhailidhis' party NEDIPA and if so, in which manner. At the same time, it seems that NEDIPA also enjoys the tacit support of Archbishop Khrisostomos, with whom Al. Mikhailidhis also had a series of consultations prior to announcing his new party. The archbishop's support, and that of the church in general, for Mikhailidhis' party also becomes evident from the fact that Deputies N. Vasiliadhis, the accountant of the Paphos bishopric, and Ambizas, whose relations with the "Elion" enterprises are well-known, have joined the party.

In the meantime, we are informed that behind the scenes there is an escalation in the strife between President Kiprianou and Mikhailidhis. This strife is expected to reach serious dimensions within the next few days, should Mr Kiprianou take the radical measures he is considering with regard to church property. Finally, according to our information, the "third" movement has now abandoned efforts to establish a new political party following a series of meetings held by Patsalidhis, Tasos Papadhopoulos, Fr. Kolotas and Lellos Dhimitriadhis. The latest of these meetings was held at Dhimitriadhis' residence.

KIPRIANOU SCHEDULED VISIT TO INDIA REDUCED TO 2 DAYS

NC171301 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 17 Oct 80

[Text] President Kiprianou will pay an official visit to India next week where he will hold talks with Indian President Reddy and Prime Minister Gandhi. Presider Kiprianou will exchange views with the Indian leaders on the Cyprus issue and the development of bilateral relations and cooperation. He will also discuss matters of particular importance to the nonaligned movement in general and Cyprus in particular, in accordance with the obligation he undertook during his recent visit to Belgrade. The president's visit had initially been scheduled for an 8-day period so he would have the opportunity to visit various areas. However, in view of [internal] developments, it was decided to limit the visit to only 2 days. Kiprianou will leave for New Delhi at 2300 on 22 October and will return on 25 October.

CZECHOSLOVAK PREMIER STROUGAL BEGINS 3-DAY OFFICIAL VISIT

Schedule Announced

AT181300 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Text] Czechoslovak Prime Minister Dr Lubomir Strougal is expected in Athens on a 3-day official visit at 1400 Monday on an invitation from Prime Minister Rallis. At the airport, Strougal will be welcomed by Prime Minister Rallis, accompanied by members of the cabinet and other officials. The two prime ministers will have their first talk on Monday afternoon at the Foreign Ministry after Strougal lays a wreath at the unknown warrior's tomb.

On Tuesday, Strougal will visit various antiquity sites and at 0900 Wednesday he will resume his talks with Greek officials. At 1030 Wednesday the Czechoslovak prime minister will be received by President of the Republic Karamanlis. A total of four agreements between Greece and Czechoslovakia will be signed at 1130 at the Foreign Ministry. At 1230 on Wednesday the two prime ministers will hold a press conference for Greek and foreign press representatives. Strougal will depart Athens for Prague at 1615.

Arrival in Athens

AT201404 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Shortly after 1400, Premier of Czechoslovakia Dr Lubomir Strougal arrived in Athens on a 3-day official visit. Strougal was welcomed at Ellinikon Airport by Prime Minister Rallis, heading the members of the Ministerial Council; Vice Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies Bournias; the leadership of the armed forces headed by chief of the National Defense General Staff General Gratsios; Czechoslovak Ambassador in Athens Zantovsky together with senior personnel of the embassy; Greek Ambassador in Prague Mavromikhalis; and other officials. Honors were presented by a detachment of pilots. Strougal inspected the military detachment, greeted the officials and then left for Athens accompanied by Prime Minister Rallis.

The first talk between the two premiers will be held this afternoon at 1700 at the Foreign Ministry. Prior to the talks, Strougal will lay a wreath at the tomb of the unknown soldier.

MINISTERIAL COUNCIL ISSUES STATEMENT ON RETURN TO NATO

AT202013 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] This evening at 1930, the Ministerial Council convened in a plenary session under the chairmanship of the prime minister. After the Ministerial Council's meeting the following statement was issued:

The Ministerial Council unanimously approved Greece's return to the NATO military wing on the basis of the latest proposals by General Rogers. These proposals were simultaneously submitted to the alliance's Defense Planning Committee and were accepted at today's morning meeting.

The government believes that Greece's return to the alliance's military wing will strengthen our international position and our country's defense capability; for this reason, it considers it a positive event. Our return is taking place under conditions which Greece has considered acceptable and of which our country's military leadership, which bore the brunt of the negotiations, unanimously approved.

The viewpoint of the official opposition--that concessions have been made on issues of national sovereignty--is entirely unfounded. The arrangements that were decided upon do not refer to issues of operational control in the national area which now, as in the past, remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of the national armed forces. Regarding the international area, the decisions that were made are considered to be absolutely satisfactory. The government has fully briefed the political leaders on issues connected with its decision. It will proceed with a debate in the Chamber with regard to the vote of confidence it has demanded--a debate which will provide the opportunity for all viewpoints to be heard and which will fully enlighten the Greek people.

The policy which the government has followed over the last 4 years on this issue has been consistent and steady. We have explained why our return to NATO--since our withdrawal in 1974 did not achieve all the results we expected--had to take place under conditions that naturally should be acceptable to us. As soon as these conditions were secured, we proceeded to the decisionmaking process. The government, more generally, believes that Greece's presence as a full member of the EC has created favorable prerequisites for our economic development. Now with our return to NATO we will also strengthen our defense during a period of international unrest and instability. These developments open good prospects for the future and the government is certain that this concept is shared by the majority of Greek people.

It is the opposition's right to disagree. When parliamentary elections are held at the end of next year and, in the completely improbable case that the opposition wins them, it will be up to them to withdraw from the defense alliance, thus disregarding the country's security. Meanwhile, the government is acting responsibly and decisively within the framework of its jurisdiction and constitutional practice.

CHAMBER TO DEBATE DECISION TO RETURN TO NATO

AT202016 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] The debate on the government's foreign policy and the vote of confidence in the government will begin in the Chamber the evening after tomorrow.

A special agenda has already been published in accordance with a letter that was sent to the president of the Chamber by Prime Minister Rallis. In this letter, read to the Chamber this evening, the following was noted: The government wishes to bring to the Chamber for debate the issue of foreign policy in general and to ask for the national representatives' vote of confidence. I request, the prime minister says, that you brief the body on this issue. In accordance with Article 64, paragraph 4 of the Constitution, the debate in the Chamber on this issue will last 3 days, that is, until Saturday midnight at the latest.

PARTIES, INDIVIDUALS REACT TO DECISION TO REJOIN NATO

Democratic Socialist Party

AT201458 Athens TA NEA in Greek 20 Oct 80 p 7

[Statement by Democratic Socialist Party--KODESO--Chairman I. Pesmazoglou on Greece's return to NATO]

[Text] This issue is of critical, national importance and dictates an immediate discussion in the Chamber. In addition to the more general issues of the correlation of armed forces in the area and the continuing unacceptable anomaly in Cyprus, any settlement with NATO is linked with the critical issue of affirming that the responsibility for security in the Aegean belongs to the Greek Armed Forces.

The Democratic Socialist Party reiterates its position that Greece's relationship with the Atlantic alliance should not be taken for granted and is solidly and inevitably linked with the protection of our national rights.

Democratic Center Union Comments

AT201523 Athens TA NEA in Greek 20 Oct 80 p 7

[Statement by Democratic Center Union Chairman I. Zigdhis on Greece's return to NATO]

[Text] On the eve of the signing of this new Zurich-type agreement, the calamitous consequences of which will not be limited to Cyprus but will extend to the Greek state whose very existence they will shake, the Democratic Center Union:

A) Once again stresses the government's immense responsibility for the downhill slide of this conscious policy of national treason;
B) Demands the immediate convening of the Chamber in order for it to be briefed; and
C) Reserves the right to express its final judgment on the "agreement" after the Democratic Center Union's complete briefing, which should be based on official texts.

However, we are compelled to stress that we have already been fully vindicated in our charges of collusion among the governments of Athens, Washington and Ankara at the expense of the Greek people on the day following the meeting of Mitsotakis, Muskie and Erkmen in Ankara last June during the NATO meeting. We have also been vindicated in our revelations that the agreement making Greece a Turkish satellite was concluded at that time, and the entire subsequent comedy about allegedly tough negotiations was aimed at deceiving the Greek people to accept their condemnation into subjugation as a diplomatic triumph of their government in its "struggle" to defend their alleged national rights...!

However, any Greek with a minumum of brains would wonder: What greater evil can an enemy perpetrate toward our national independence and territorial integrity than an alliance in which we are accepted only if we accept from the outset the sacrifice of these two benefits in favor of an "ally" and the alliance as a whole?

The judgment of a false parliamentary majority on these issues is not final. This judgment belongs to the Greek people and to history, something which the current government of Greece, which "through bad luck" is the country's government, seems to forget.

ELEVTHEROTIPIA Reaction

AT201529 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 20 Oct 80 p 1

[From the "Opinions" column: "Shame":]

[Text] So we are returning to the beautiful and sacred NATO family, with both legs.

Starting tomorrow or after tomorrow we shall sit at the same military table with the other partners of the alliance and, naturally, with the Turks. We shall sit with the Turks who have imposed on their people an undisguisedly hated fascist regime, with the Turks who have not ceased to threaten our national integrity and claim our islands and seas, with the Turks who are occupying 38 percent of Cyprus and have condemned 200,000 of our brothers to be refugees.

The average Greek citizen wonders: Is this return not a shame for all of us? What do we seek among the crows of fascism and the hawks of imperialism?

KKE (Exterior) Statement

AT201418 Athens TA NEA in Greek 20 Oct 80 p 7

[Statement by KKE (Exterior) Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis]

[Text] After a 2-day silence, Prime Minister Rallis was forced to confirm the fact that the government has accepted the Rogers plan regarding Greece's return to the NATO military wing and announced that, with regard to this important subject, the issuance of a government decision, which he linked with a vote of confidence in the Chamber, was sufficient. Such a procedure aims to deceive the Greek people. Return to the military wing of NATO, an action that undermines national independence, security and defense, cannot be legalized through approval by a parliamentary majority expressing the minority of people, especially when the people have not given such authority to any party in the Chamber. With their overwhelming, pan-Hellenic demonstrations yesterday and today, which even the state mass media was forced to admit, our people issued their verdict: "We do not want to join NATO."

Since the government persists in returning to the military wing of NATO, the only thing it is entitled and obligated to do is to proceed with the immediate holding of elections; then we shall see how our people will judge acts of national treason.

GOVERNMENT NOTES POSITIVE WORLD REACTION TO NATO RETURN

AT202022 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Officials in Ankara expressed satisfaction with Greece's return to NATO while a spokesman of the Foreign Office expressed the British Government's satisfaction. In a statement, President Carter described Greece's return to NATO as a great step for the defense of Western Europe's southern wing. Finally, a government spokesman in Nicosia stated tonight that Greece's return is an internal affair of the Greek Government. He added that Greece's concern for Cyprus has been repeatedly confirmed and the Cyprus Government believes that Greece's return to NATO in no way will influence its concern for Cyprus, and that Greece's support will continue.

GOVERNMENT INITIALS TRADE ACCOUNT PROTOCOL WITH ROMANIA

FOREIGN MINISTRY FAVORS GREECE'S RETURN TO NATO

TA201644 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] NATO's Defense Planning Committee has ratified Greece's return to the military wing of the organization. A statement issued today by the Foreign Ministry's Information Directorate General says that under current international circumstances this development is compatible with Turkish interests.

A statement was made by NATO General Secretary Joseph Luns regarding Greece's return to NATO's military flank. The statement says that the NATO Defense Planning Committee ratified the plan on Greece's return to NATO's military wing. As a result, all procedures concerning this move have been completed.

The Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General's statement on this issue is as follows: As announced by the NATO general secretary during today's meeting, NATO's Defense Planning Committee has ratified Greece's return to NATO's military wing in accordance with a proposal--promoted by the NATO European Supreme Command for more than 2 years--which was adopted by NATO and Greece.

This proposal takes into consideration Turkey's views and the agreement envisages an intermediary arrangement. The views of Turkey and Greece on NATO command and control arrangements will be finalized later between the relevant military authorities, and principles aimed at coordinating military actions in an effective way will be determined when necessary. According to the agreement, Turkey's interests will be completely safeguarded in future work to be conducted between the concerned military authorities.

With the return of Greece to NATO's military flank, the gap in NATO's southern flank is being filled in and solidarity within NATO is being intensified. Under present international circumstances, this development is compatible with Turkish interests.

FOREIGN MINISTER RETURNS FROM EC COMMITTEE MEETING

TA201757 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen who attended the Council of Europe Ministerial Committee meetings in Strasbourg returned to Turkey at 1630 today. In a statement to the Turkish Radio and TV Administration [TRT] at Istanbul Yesilkoy Airport, Turkmen said the Council of Europe was closely interested in Turkish developments. Noting that the issues of terrorism and visas were discussed at the meetings, the foreign minister stated that he talked about the developments in Turkey during his address to the Ministerial Committee. He said he told the Committee that the Turkish Government was working on a series of measures to eliminate the reasons that led to the visa requirements. Turkmen added: I hope that the Council of Europe Ministerial Committee will eventually make an assessment in line with our (?views).

Ilter Turkmen said he called on the European states that had not yet imposed visa requirements upon the Turks not to do so and he appealed to the countries that had already imposed visa requirements to reverse their decision as soon as possible. In addition, the foreign minister said he stressed to the Ministerial Committee members that Turkish public opinion was extremely sensitive about the visa issue. Foreign Minister Turkmen then returned to Ankara by air.

HURRIYET SUPPORTS 'VAROSHA' PROPOSAL INTRODUCED AT CYPRUS TALKS

NC210818 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 16 Oct 80 p 3

[By Ziay Akcapar]

[Text] At the second round of intercommunual talks held yesterday, Turkish Cypriot negotiator Umit Onan submitted "an interim solution formula" which envisages the immediate return of 20,000 to 30,000 Greek Cypriots to Varosha, a tourist resort. At the conference table, Umit Onan stated that the Varosha issue is being evaluated in conjunction with the section of the Denktas-Kiprianou agreement on principles which envisages "the adoption of practical measures toward creating mutual confidence and cooperation between the Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot communities."

According to reports which have leaked out of the "Varosha bargaining," which is being conducted in great secrecy, the Turkish Cypriot negotiator has stated that the Turkish Cypriot side is ready to extend every assistance to about 30,000 Greek Cypriots who would like to return to the town of Varosha and operate the facilities there. According to the "interim solution formula" submitted by Onan, the Greek Cypriot refugees will return to the town and to the work centers under the surveillance of the UN peace force until the final status of Varosha is determined through negotiations. Until a settlement is reached, they will be subject to the TFSC laws and under the assurance of the Turkish Cypriot security force (Turkish Cypriot Army) and the Turkish Cypriot police.

In cases of dispute, the Greek Cypriot refugees will benefit from all the rights accorded Turkish Cypriot citizens of the TFSC before the Turkish Cypriot courts. They will also enjoy equal rights from the municipal services of the town without any discrimination whatsoever. Moreoever, Greek Cypriot businessmen will avail themselves of all the incentive measure provided by the TFSC authorities for the profitable exploitation of the hotel space in the area, which is estimated to include about 15,000 beds.

In order that the interim solution formula may take effect immediately, Turkish Cypriot negotiator Umit Onan suggested that in accordance with Article 6 of the Denktas-Kiprianou agreement, the economic embargo imposed on the Turkish Cypriot side should be lifted, the Turkish Cypriot side should be given its share of the foreign aid and credits which are granted to Cyprus, and the $8 million belonging to the Turkish Cypriot banks currently held up in the Greek Cypriot Central Bank should be released.

The interim solution formula also stipulates the removal of the international restrictions imposed on Ercan Airport and Famagusta harbor and the joint management of the international airport of Nicosia by the Greek and Turkish Cypriots.

At the first round of talks on the subject of Varosha, the Greek Cypriot side had asked for the Famagusta harbor and its vicinity, a formula which compels the Turkish Cypriots to confine themselves within the walls of the old town. Following the submission of the interim solution formula, the second session of the second round of talks has been adjourned to Wednesday, 29 October, due to the Bairam holidays.

VOTCP CRITICIZES TALKS WITH U.S. ON DEFENSE PROJECTS

TA180914 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Station commentary: "Our People Do Not Approve Any of the Agreements Signed With the U.S. and Western imperialists"]

[Text] The junta is engaged in talks with U.S. imperialists in order to obtain armaments. These talks are being held within the framework of the bilateral slavery agreements which could not be brought to the assemblies for discussion for fear of the reaction by the people's anti-imperialist forces. The junta generals under the cover of their bayonets are posing as heroes before the public. It is clear that they owe their bravery to their U.S. masters as well as the NATO ringleaders and the EEC monopolies.

Hiding behind their bayonets, the junta generals are secretly and gradually implementing the bilateral slavery agreements. The implementation of the slavery agreements inflicts grave blows on our people and country. Our soil has been transformed into the death base of U.S. imperialism. What are the junta generals expecting to receive for this treachery? They expect to receive armaments and (?to build) a war industry. This piling of arms will further involve our country's economy in more difficult impasses. It will place our economy on a military track.

It is military spending amounting to 40 percent of the budget that has led the country to destruction and not incidents of violence and anarchy. Led by imperialists, the junta is following a path that leads to destruction. The collaborationists--who have failed to export traditional export goods such as cotton and tobacco--are now planning again under the influence of the imperialists to build a war industry and to export arms.

Our people do not want guns, tanks or missiles. They do not want instruments for destruction. They want bread and work as well as liberty and peace. If the pro-American junta generals believe that by dissolving the parliament, eliminating the Constitution and resorting to violence they can crush the struggle being waged by our people, they will be proved wrong.

The toppling of Foreign Minister Erkmen who pursued the subservient policies of the Demirel government was the result of the reflection of the anti-imperialist popular forces in the assemblies. In line with nationwide demonstrations against the bilateral slavery agreements, a majority was formed in the parliament composed of patriots and members of the RPP, the NSP and certain independent deputies. It is in a bid to prevent these developments that the imperialist masters called on the junta to act.

Believing that by the force of bayonets they can subdue the people, the junta generals are secretly and progressively implementing the bilateral slavery agreements. Our people do not and will not support any of the agreements signed by the junta generals with the U.S. imperialists and the imperialist monopolies.

As resistance against economic policies dependent on imperialism and against the laying of the burden of the economic crisis on the people are daily growing all over the country, open resistance against the imperialistic slavery agreements will drive the junta generals into a corner. The unity of democratic forces, anti-imperialist and patriotic circles against the junta generals shall destroy these antipeople policies which are against national interests.

The Turkish Communist Party appeals to all national and democratic forces to unite against the junta generals who are the tool of imperialism working against the people and the homeland. We are against militarism and the war industry. We want democracy and peace. We are fighting for national and economic independence.

INTERNATIONAL DRUG RING HEAD ARRESTED; RING SMASHED

AU141830 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 14 Oct 80 p 8

[Special DIE PRESSE report by Peter Zehrer]

[Summary] On 8 October, Austrian police arrested 50-year-old Canadian citizen Peter John Newall, the head of an international drug ring, in Taxenbach near Salzburg. Simultaneously, another 20 members of the ring were arrested in numerous other countries including Great Britain, Australia, Holland, New Zealand, Cyprus, United States, Italy and the FRG. The organization was completely smashed. Newall, his wife and his 27-year-old son Peter had come to Austria on 22 November 1979. Acting upon information from Canadian police, Austrian police placed the family under surveillance. It was established that Peter John Newall's organization operated on all continents, with his wife acting as "treasurer" and his son Peter as his right-hand man, while 10 "major lieutenants" were in charge of regional operations in various parts of the world.

According to Austrian police, it is not believed that the gang supplied any drugs to the Austrian scene, as this would have meant an unnecessary risk for its operation.

FORMER HEALTH MINISTER LEODOLTER VISITS PRC

AU201207 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 18 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Beijing--Former Health Minister Dr Ingrid Leodolter, who is visiting the PRC, has been received for a talk in Beijing by Vice Premier Mrs Chen Muhua, member of the CCP Politburo. During the talk, described as friendly by XINHUA, Mrs Chen outlined the primary aims of the Chinese health and family policy.

The talk was also attended by Chu Tunan, vice president of the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Foreign Countries, and by Wolfgang Wolte, Austrian ambassador to the PRC. Mrs Leodolter also visited Shanghai and Guangzhou.

[Unattributed report: "Alfred Dallinger Is New Minister for Social Administration: Swearing-in by the Federal President"]

[Excerpt] In the presence of Federal Chancellor Dr Bruno Kreisky, Federal President Dr Rudolf Kirchschlaeger yesterday swore in Alfred Dallinger as new federal minister for social administration. The swearing-in formula was read by Cabinet Director Dr Weihs.

PORTUGAL

SOARES REPORTEDLY TO LEAVE PORTUGAL UNTIL AFTER ELECTIONS

NC201130 Paris AFP in English 1125 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Lisbon, 20 Oct (AFP)--Portuguese opposition leader Mario Soares, who stepped down "temporarily" as Socialist Party secretary last night, will leave Portugal soon and not return until after December's presidential elections, a reliable source said here today.

Mr Soares announced his decision at a stormy party meeting last night after losing a motion to withdraw party support for the re-election of President Antonio Ramalho Eanes.

Meanwhile numerous Socialist activists were understood today to be preparing to collect the support necessary to put the former premier forward as a presidential candidate.

An early reaction came from the Social-Democrats, members of Francisco Sa Carneiro's centrist government coalition. A spokesman said today that Mr Soares' decision could be permanent if President Eanes were re-elected, adding that the Socialist Party had "preferred the president to their own secretary-general."

A spokesman for General Eanes said today that the president was following the Socialist Party crisis "with concern" but had no plans to withdraw from the December 7 elections.

The spokesman said that though the loss of Mr Soares' personal support could have "some repercussions" on the elections, the incumbent president's candidacy was "national, independent and (?apart) from all political parties."

Mr Soares decided to withdraw his backing of President Eanes after the latter came out in support of a shift in socialist policy and union with Mr Sa Carneiro in a "centrist-social democratic bloc."

The Socialist secretary felt this position broke an agreement reached before Portugal's Ocotber 5 elections--which considerably strengthened Mr Sa Carneiro--to support each other against the ruling centrist government.

EEC MINISTERS TO SET UP OIL REVENUE RECYCLING FUND

LD211235 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 21 Oct 80 p 4

[Alan Osborn disptach: "EEC Accord on Oil Money Fund"]

[Text] Luxembourg--Finance ministers of the nine EEC countries yesterday agreed in principle to set up a fund worth roughly 4,200 million pounds sterling to recycle the revenue of the main oil-producing countries.

The money would be used to assist Common Market countries like Italy and Ireland, which are badly hit by the oil price increases, and West Germany and Holland which want to keep the fund to a minimum.

For Britain, Chancellor of the Exchanquer Sir Geoffrey Howe, said last night that the compromise figure was "reasonable."

The proposal is to be developed by the EEC's monetary committee and submitted to finance ministers for formal approval at their next meeting in November.

The new fund would succeed a much smaller and far more restricted cycle mechanism set up several years ago and which was only ever used by Ireland and Italy. Access to the new fund would be much easier and less conditional.

The idea is for the Common Market collectively to borrow from the major oil producers either through the Market or directly and re-lend the proceeds to member countries encountering balance of payments problems arising out of oil price increases.

WEU 'REVITALIZATION' PLAN PROPOSED

LD091325 Paris LE MONDE in French 9 Oct 80 p 7

[Unattributed report: "A Report on 'Revitalizing" the Western European Union Has Been Adopted by Its Political Committee:]

[Text] The question of "revitalizing" the Western European Union [WEU], the only competent European organization in the defense sphere, which includes all EEC countries except Denmark and Ireland, reached a new state on 7 October. Its Assembly's Political Committee adopted a report written by Mr Von Hassel.

The former FRG defense minister (Christian Democratic Union) requests in it that certain reforms--relating to the participation of defense ministers in the WEU Council, the opening of the WEU to all EC members and relations with the Community Assembly--be reconsidered.

Mr Von Hassel's report was adopted by 12 votes to 2. RPR Parliament members, among others, voted for it. (Former RPR Minister) Baumel stated that this was an important vote. It shows, he said, that, in view of American uncertainties, the Europeans believe that Europe must constitute an autonomous entity in the defense sphere. At any rate, this vote in favor of "revitalizing" the WEU has confirmed a change in the FRG's attitude which had hitherto had reservations about an organization which it deemed discriminatory.

The Von Hassel report will be submitted to the WEU Assembly in December and, if adopted, will have to be submitted to the governments concerned for approval.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON WARSAW PACT MEETINGS COMMUNIQUE

LD211618 Hamburg DPA in German 1518 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 21 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher believes that the recent GDR measures to reduce contacts are not compatible with the final communique of the meeting of the Warsaw Pact foreign ministers. Genscher told the FDP National Executive and parliamentary party in Bonn today that the desire, expressed in the communique, to continue the policy of detente and cooperation in Europe on the basis of the Helsinki Final Act and the treaties must be proved in practice. The GDR measures should be raised at the review conference of the European security conference in Madrid.

Genscher noted "with interest" that the Warsaw communique, in dealing with the military aspects of security, declared its readiness for concrete measures and, specifically, the extension of confidence-building measures. The significance which the Warsaw Pact states attached to the American-Soviet talks on medium-range weapons, which began recently, was also welcomed. These negotiations had come about because the Federal Government and the Western alliance insisted on the equal importance of both parts of NATO's decision in December 1979 to modernize its nuclear medium-range missiles and its offer to negotiate with Moscow.

NEGOTIATOR ASKS GDR TO RESCIND CURRENCY REGULATIONS

LD211628 Hamburg DPA in German 1432 gmt 21 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 21 Oct (DPA)--Following an interruption of several months, negotiations with the GDR on scientific and technical cooperation resumed in Bonn today. The Federal Research Ministry announced after the meeting that Bonn's chief negotiator, State Secretary Hans-Hilger Haunschild, had opened the discussion by noting the GDR's increase in the minimum exchange requirement for Western visitors to his East Berlin counterpart, State Secretary Wolfgang Leupold.

Haunschild stressed that the Federal Government regarded the massive increase in the exchange amounts for visitors to the GDR as a "serious setback for efforts towards detente" and for a normalization of relations and the improvement of cooperation between the two German states. It stood in clear contradiction to the underlying political basis of mutual relations. Haunschild asked Leupold to communicate to the GDR Government the Federal Government's wish that the unilateral measures be rescinded.

The problems mentioned by Haunschild at the beginning of the 25th round of negotiations were described in Bonn as an "unusual opening" for meetings which normally stick closely to practical topics, but was obviously considered appropriate in view of the current political developments. Nothing is yet known about the reaction of the East German side to the talks. The meeting lasted 2 hours.

GOVERNMENT SEEN FACING 'SHAMBLES' OF DETENTE POLICY

[Fritz Ullrich Fack editorial: "Rapprochement Without Change"]

[Text] Stunned and humiliated, the Federal Government faces the shambles of its Ostpolitik. Moreover, Honecker had some people maliciously call out to the Federal Government that he waited with his delimitation measures until after 5 October so as not to jeopardize the election victory. And monotonously comes the answer of a helpless and perplexed policy: Detente must not be jeopardized. There is no alternative to it. Anything but a violation of treaties. We will proceed as before.

In the offing there will be a test by means of an historical example, namely whether the thesis works that a change (of the communist system) can be had through a rapprochement (of the West with the East). This has been the ideological basis of the policy which has been pursued for 10 years now and which is now so obviously drifting toward a reef. The case of Poland will show what the multitude of treaties and promises of Helsinki are worth, what good the gigantic capital transfer from West to East (DM110 billion in 9 years), the technical assistance, the economic contacts, the variety of financial advantages--reaped above all by the GDR--do the West politically.

There has been ample rapprochement, really. What is now at issue is the change, or more properly, the question of whether an internal change spontaneously brought about, like the one in Poland, will be allowed to last. And anyone who can read the handwriting on the wall knows the answer in advance: For various reasons the empire is still temporizing, but it is preparing to solve the Polish problem to suit its own ends. They will invade the country only in an extreme emergency, but pressure and intimidation, the unveiled threat of the sharp weapon of "proletarian internationalism" against allegedly counter-revolutionary developments will henceforth hang over Poland like the sword of Damocles and will not fail to have its effect. Preparations are in progress.

The Soviet Union may indeed feel invited to act. There is "no alternative" to detente policy, as the people in this country have been told to the point of nausea. After the Afghanistan disaster detente by necessity was even declared divisible in order to save the dogma. This lack of an alternative is political nonsense, to be sure, and the East is just about to demonstrate this on its own part. Yet to the inventors of the "change through rapprochement" the rigid adherence to the credo definitely makes sense. They are stuck politically. A change in course would force them to admit that the policy they have pursued to date has been wrong.

Logically the error lies in the fact that rapprochement is possible indeed whereas change on the other side is impossible for reasons inherent in the system. The great internal pressure within these systems inevitably leads to explosive consequences even in the event of change in careful doses, but above all it leads to the impairment of the power and existence of the ruling oligarchies. Detente policy after the pattern of "change through rapprochement" is doomed to failure in a veritably tragic albeit predictable way, because the more permanently it loosens the power structures of the opposite side, the more merciless is the resistance of the rulers. This is a policy with a built-in self-destruction in the event of success--in any event, for as long as a Politburo still exists in Moscow.

This is impossible for the Bonn government to admit for one simple reason: The belief in the option of the impossible is the basis of its political power. Millions hope that things may turn out to be as they have always been told they would. They want to believe that "there is no alternative to detente," that everything that has been pleadingly repeated to them over and over again like a litany for 10 years was correct. They want Afghanistan to be forgotten, to be treated as a special case, they want the danger of Islamic fundamentalism to be employed as an excuse for the invasion, that the chancellor go to Moscow and that he manifest publicly with satisfaction the conformity of his views with those of Honecker. They want the meeting on Werbellinsee and the "thousand talks." And they are aghast when the old brutal will for oppression breaks through again suddenly on the other side, when from one day to the next--from 5 October to 6 October--all that ceases to exist which allegedly was still valid political currency only yesterday.

In this country and also elsewhere in Western Europe people will wait in vain for the admission that this policy is based on the logical error that in the very event of success it is doomed to failure. Perhaps the other side is so shocked by the Polish events that it will continue its strategy of turning away from and showing aloofness toward the West for an extended period of time and not just for the forthcoming period when the Polish will for freedom will be beaten down.

But this is not probable, considering the great material advantages of detente policy to Moscow and, on the other hand, its veritable narcotic effect on the peoples of Western Europe. It will be sufficient to make an approach again after a suitable pause, and all illusions will bloom again. Illusions are the basis of internal political power for those who cultivate them, care for them and disseminate them.

DIE WELT: BONN MUST REACT TO GDR CENSORSHIP

DW211309 Bonn DIE WELT in German 21 Oct 80 p 6

[Commentary signed Kem.: "Antenna Raiders"]

[Text] The cold delimitation rage of the SED--how else could it be--has also activated the antenna raiders of the Unity Party. A purposeful campaign is intended to inflict ill repute on the Western channel and on all those who avail themselves of the free information of this medium. This complements the functionares' attack against the hitherto largely free reporting by West German journalists on the Christian communities in the SED republic. The prohibition of reporting on the autumn meeting of the land synod of the Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Saxony clearly violates the letter and spirit of the Basic Treaty. The guardians of delimitation refer to a "generosity" hitherto exercised which they now plan to discontinue.

The Federal Government has every reason--and it is obligated--to cause a clamor, for similarly to the exorbitant entry fees to the "GDR" and to East Berlin, this affects the substance of Bonn's policy on Germany which had to be paid for so dearly. Whoever once verbosely and justly claimed one of the most important bonds for the cohesion of the nation must not arouse the impression of being prepared to accept a waiver now. The political price which the "GDR" would have to pay at the CSCE followup meeting or elsewhere cannot be demanded sotto voce. The Federal Government wishes to remain "capable of dialogue." If this is not to amount to good behavior it can, after all, only mean the clear and credible maintenance of its own position.

PAPER CALLS FOR WAGE RATE PARTNERS' RESPONSIBILITY

[Commentary signed Vr.: "Cyclic Autumn"]

[Text] The period of frost is just ahead. The latest forecast from the Economic Ministry indicates that many favorable preconditions indeed must coincide if even a slight growth is to be achieved in the economy next year. For quite some time it has been heard from research institutes and bussinesses that a further decrease in economic development and a slackening of business must be anticipated. Thus we see happening what had to be expected for quite some time already. The immense increase in the costs of energy has diverted a broad stream of purchasing power to the crude oil-extracting countries. This demand is lost to the domestic economy.

These days voices can be heard from many sides warning against counteracting the consequences of the concomitant structural change, namely, a further growing unemployment rate, with new, expensive structural programs. The state budgets, which have been plunged into a desolate situation anyway, would be even more burdened by that, but above all the stability of the currency policy pursued above all by the Federal Bank has achieved a situation where the inflation rate decreased last year. The more stable the monetary value remains in the future the easier will it be for the economy to halt the downhill race in which it finds itself. If an employment policy promoting inflation were now added to the careless budget policy all hopes that the government would cope with every difficulty looming ahead might as well be forgotten.

The Federal Bank and the research institutes time and again emphasized the decisive role of wage policy in amazing unanimity. The trade union leaders object to this responsibility. They would like to stay on a course of expansion in their field unswervingly, leaving the responsibility for full employment to the government and to the companies. But in wage policy, too, the hour of truth has come. Anyone fixing factors which are as important for the development of the economy as are wages must also tolerate being included in the overall economic responsibility. Not only the government but also the wage-rate partners must now do what is reasonable. It is up to them whether the economy after a gentle slide will soon find its way up again or whether it will drift toward the abyss.

WAYS OF STIMULATING ECONOMIC GROWTH VIEWED

[Editorial by Hans D. Barbier, Bonn: "Stagnation Instead of Growth"]

[Text] There is no point in quarreling over the error in estimation of one-half percent for real economic growth. Basically one-half percent heralds stagnation; this is no more than an item to note, perhaps a sign of hope in the tableau of the overall economic forecast. This means, beyond the formal vocabulary of the economic forecasters, that there will be neither more nor less for consumption and distribution next year than before.

The Federal Government was well advised not to wait for the series of expert opinions but to let the citizens have its own assessment of the situation as early on as possible. With the array of figures from the Economic Ministry, Graf Lambsdorff does not indicate any catastrophe even though it is obvious that in the Federal Republic the social conflict potential remained small only because a nearly permanent growth served as a conflict defuser. Nor can the forecasts of a stagnating gross national product be interpreted as an intentionally painted gloomy picture in line, perhaps, with a moderation appeal to the wage-rate partners. Anyone trying to survey the great economic aggregates, ranging from the exports to the order situation in the construction sector, will hardly find any freely gushing sources of growth.

What is behind the expected stagnation is the (not unjustified) hope that things will pick up again the later part of 1981. If the trend in incoming orders and in industrial production remains what it is now the people in the Federal Republic would even have to reckon temporarily in effect with losses in prosperity. On the whole, and this also applies to the forecasts of employment and prices, we may say that the table made up by the economics minister reflects a sense of perspective. It is a different question as to how long the government can uphold its thesis that there is no need for taking any economic development action. Actually this, too, is no longer an issue for people are already animatedly discussing the options of economic development policy for tomorrow.

All that is necessary is properly interpreting the partially coded messages. Naturally the president of the Association of Germany Industry and Commerce, Otto Wolff von Amerongen, in his controversial Ulm speech did not wish to exclude the concern over employment from the sphere of economic policy responsibility. What he intended to say in truth was which instruments of employment policy he wanted to see used and which he did not. Just like all other economists Wolff would like to see the priorities of state economic and growth policy set even more strongly on encouragement and promotion of private investments. This means no state spending programs but a generous depreciation regulation for research, abbreviation of the depreciation periods for the purpose of converting technical progress into new products and processes, as well as the further reduction of the taxes other than those connected with income for the purpose of promoting capital accumulation in the enterprises. If this is done, we may anticipate Wolff to go on thinking without any objection. There would not be any call for further state expenditures for ensuring employment.

If we add to this idea a glance at the precarious financial situation of the state we suddenly find ourselves in the coalition negotiations between the SPD and the FDP. By fixing the financial-economic orientation factor of a maximum new ceiling for indebtedness or the increase in expenditures at 4 percent, the Free Democrats at the same time are ensuring for themselves a favorable starting position for the race over a contingency program. The government will be pushed into such a program if and when the economy shows seriously recessive features in the winter months. Anyone wanting to cover such a program of props with additional state expenditures, as quite a few Social Democrats do, inevitably will end up in a conflict with the objective of budget consolidation. Since for this reason a spending program cannot be very well prepared now it cannot be applied in a contingency plan from one day to the next, either. Yet what could be activated on a short-term basis would be the instruments of the law on stability: depreciation privileges and tax reductions. This would not involve any announcement effect, and the conflict with the objective of budget consolidation would not be as obvious.

The fact that the Free Democrats have the better starting position for their philosophy of exerting influence on the economic development via private investments must not necessarily overstrain the coalition negotiations on economic development policy. If a program becomes necessary there would not be any sense in proceeding in a one-track way after this or that unadultered doctrine. A combination of measures would be obvious: In the event of reduced tax revenues the government could fully exploit the planned spending, that is to say, it could consciously accept greater indebtedness in line with deficit spending; aside from that it could consider giving the fatigued circulation an injection of the remedies of the good old law on stability. Anyone wishing to stage a coalition quarrel over this probably is tempted to unleash it for other reasons.

EGYPTIAN TELEPHONE MODERNIZATION--Munich, 20 Oct (DPA)--An international consortium led by Siemens (Berlin and Munich) has received an Egyptian order worth DM600 million for the modernization of the Egyptian telephone and telecommunications network. The order forms part of a five-year modernization project running from 1979 to 1984 with a total value of DM3.5 billion. The French Thomson CSF and Siemens, Austria, are the other members of the consortium. Egypt's antiquated telephone network was built by the British 35 years ago. MARCHAIS SPEAKS ON PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY

[Apparent text of closing speech delivered by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais at the PCF national conference in Nanterre on 12 October: "An Exciting Battle"]

[Text] Comrades, nothing is more dear to us in our party than frankness and fraternity. We are not accustomed to either fighting among ourselves or being self-satisfied. We serve the workers and France and nothing more. Therefore allow me simply to thank you for your confidence and to thank the whole party which you represent.

Your choice is an act of confidence, not really of confidence in a man but in a battle.

The 1981 presidential election is already characterized by an event which distinguishes it from previous presidential elections. It is in fact the first time that our party has chosen to put forward a Communist candidate with the job of fighting the battle along the lines of the new prospects for social change set out by our 22d and 23d congresses.

The task with which you are entrusting me, therefore, is an important one. It imposes great duties on me. You have the right to be demanding, as have all working men and women. Together with you--I repeat together with you--I will do everything I can to ensure that the presidential election battle makes it possible to move toward the satisfaction of the needs and aspirations of the world of labor and young people and toward the solution of the nation's great problems.

For Justice

Many people are wondering what the future holds:

It should be clear to all that when the intersts of the working men and women and the future of the country are at stake, it is possible to compromise in the battle against exploiting capital, against its political power and against the man who leads it. I will never compromise with Valery Giscard d'Estaing, any more than with any of capital's other politicians, since he is now the number one enemy for the working class, democracy and France's progress.

The ardent battle we are waging is primarily a battle for justice.

The employer class is securing vast wealth and accumulating the means of indulging in luxury and waste while millions and millions of exploited people are exhausted and deprived. No, this injustice and all the resulting inequalities are not a curse or a law of nature. They are merely the inhumane law of an outmoded society.

We reject unemployment, job insecurity, slavery at work, poverty-level wages and iniquitous incomes differerences.

Offering work to all by creating millions of new jobs; immediately giving permanent status to trainees, free-lance workers, auxiliaries, temporary staff, and workers not protected by collective rules and conventions; immediately granting a true fifth week of paid vacation and reducing the working week to a maximum of 35 hours; giving all young people modern training and a trade; fundamentally changing the working conditions for unskilled workers, workers and white collar workers; quickly raising the minimum wage to Fr 4,000 per month, introducing taxes on fortunes and capital and reducing the wage hierarchy to a ratio of one to four, protecting the incomes of small farmers: These are some of the simple and strong objectives dear to my heart.

Similarly, I am strongly attached to the immediate struggle against inequities in health care, housing, education, living conditions and in retirement.

Yes, France's greatest ill is injustice. Let us attack it on all fronts!

For Freedom

At the same time the battle we are waging is the battle for freedom.

Justice and freedom are indivisible. Today liberating French men and women essentially means transforming working men's and women's conditions.

We have a vast view of freedom. I do not separate the wind of freedom which was the spirit of the great French Revolution in 1789 and the wind of liberation which is the spirit of the socialist revolutions of our century. We are struggling simultaneously for all individual and collective freedoms, for economic and social rights, for the right to education and culture, for participation by working men and women in the affairs of the enterprise, the commune, the region and the nation. We are struggling for women's liberation, to achieve their equality in all spheres to obtain respect for their dignity and to end backward thinking. We are struggling to give young men and women the right to obtain the means of building a new life in keeping with their time and their dreams.

For Solidarity

The battle we are waging is also the battle for solidarity.

We are fighting for solidarity in France, where we must establish new human relationships between people, combining freedom and responsibility, progress and order, democracy and security.

We are fighting for solidarity beyond our borders, where France must take action to reduce the gap separating the poor peoples from the richer peoples, to help overcome famine, poverty, and illiteracy. I was shocked by what I saw in Africa, Asia and Latin America and I say that man's respect for man depends on this fight. A human being whether black, yellow or white has the right to be treated as an equal. That is the meaning of my battle for a new world system.

Furthermore we are fighting for solidarity at the world level where France must exert its full influence in favor of disarmament, detente, cooperation and peace.

For a National Revival

This battle which we are waging is the battle for a national revival on a new scale

France can only do what is necessary for freedom, justice and solidarity if it makes use of all its advantages. You do not get anything for nothing. The advantage and the status which France will obtain by changing as justice and freedom require implies sweeping changes. The path of recovery is an uphill one. We can only make progress by a vast development effort on new bases and consequently by liberating the country from capital's dictatorship.

We must ensure that the great sources of common wealth are exploited and managed not for the profit of a few but for the benefit of all. The concentrations of private interests which hang over the lives of the workers and over state policy must be eliminated once and for all by nationalization.

We must determine to create, invent and produce French products, protect and develop French agriculture, viticulture, fishing and stock raising. There must be a tough policy to end the profiteer's privileges, and all the nation's sons and daughters must be able to live, work, receive health care, extend their culture and raise their children in serenity and dignity.

France can only succeed in this original and noble task and can only set an example in its social achievements and its contribution to mankind's general progress by asserting its independence. Our task is to achieve a France again in full control of its economy, politics and defense, a nonaligned France, confident and proud.

In relation to today's crisis, this battle has a name: It is the battle for change. It is the battle to achieve the union of all the forces which, in their diversity, want change. We are determining and will determine our course in all circumstances according to this. You have made me the candidate of change.

My Weapon Will Be Truth

I am setting myself a clear line of conduct for this battle. My weapon will be truth. With you I will make every effort to ensure that people are informed, can discuss and make their decision on the basis of the facts.

When French men and women are experiencing such difficulties, when the country is facing such serious problems, when young people are in such confusion, citizens have the right to demand something other than the derisory spectacle presented by politicians, something other than evasion, alliances, quarrels, and U.S.-style extravagance and electioneering excesses. We are not cut from that cloth! We call on working men and women and young people to reject petty politics in all its forms because it is delaying change.

That is why I solemnly propose that all parties and all candidates should accept a real and dignified debate on the essential issues. Whatever their reply I will abide by that debate. Struggle and honesty are our only means.

We Need You, Comrade

When you go back to the factory or the office, when you return to your city or village, tell your comrades, your colleagues at work, all those who are suffering, struggling and hoping, what we have done here. Tell them that the battle is hard, but tell them also that it is well worth fighting and that it must be fought now, that it is the path of progress and dignity. History teaches us the difficulty of great human tasks, but history has never marched as quickly in the world as in the 20th century, never before has it justified invincible hope so much. Struggle is the path of efficacy.

Do not waste a minute, take part in all struggles, encourage them, support them, give backing to working men and women and young people everywhere. At the same time open the debate on change with them. In each struggle help them to discover the necessary conditions for achieving change, the possibilities which exist for opening up a new path for our country, the democratic path to socialism for France.

The Key to Change

In this battle we need you.

Our party is the melting pot in which a single will is drawn from diverse experiences, varied feelings and different generations, to serve as best we can the interests of the working class, all the workers and the nation. Therefore let us all join battle, each making the best contribution he can.

And let us rally all those men and women who, although having different professions, ideas and temperaments and coming from different regions, nonetheless want to unite their forces in a clear and combative way to win the battle for change.

Clearly put forward this novel idea in order to unite these men, women and young people: A stronger PCF is the key to change. Be sure to tell them that the greatest misfortune for France and the French people has been for the PCF to have been kept out of the administration of public affairs for so many years. If the PCF does not increase its strength and influence, if it does not obtain a place in keeping with that, the working class, the workers and the people will merely experience the continuation of their problems and disillusion. If, on the other hand, working men and women and young people decide to give it this growing support and this vital place, then the workers and France will be justified in cherishing great hopes.

What a responsibility you and I have! But what an exciting battle!

[Unattributed report: "I Am the Anti-Giscard Candidate"]

[Text] Georges Marchais was the guest on French Television Channel One's current affairs program yesterday evening after the national conference which appointed him PCF candidate for the presidential election, The PCF secretary general answered several questions. The following is a summary of the main points of that interview.

To a question on the significance of his appointment by the national conference, he stated in particular: "I have been chosen unanimously as candidate by the national conference. This choice was made according to the democratic rules in force in the party. I regard myself as the candidate of all Communists and I call on them all to take part in the forthcoming campaign. Democracy requires that, once decisions have been made, everybody works to apply them."

To the question: "Who will be your main adversary?" The secretary general reaffirmed, as he did in his closing speech to the national conference: My main opponent is Giscard d'Estaing. It is he who is in the Elysee and it is his policy which is causing suffering to the workers and to France. I am the anti-Giscard candidate."

Then Patrice Duhamel turned to the problem posed by the PS attitude and the statements made yesterday by F. Mitterrand, G. Marchais asserted: [PCF Politburo member] Charles Fiterman submitted a report on the political situation and naturally took account of the experience of recent years.

"This afternoon I made a solemn proposal to all parties and candidates: to have a dignified debate on the essence of the problems facing the French people and the country. F. Mitterrand does not seem to feel that this proposal applies to him. Perhaps he has decided not to stand. In any event he seems to fear this debate."

Asked whether he is "the only anti-Giscard candidate," he replied: That is correct. That is probably why F. Mitterrand is refusing this debate on employment, inflation, and the deep crisis affecting the nation. Is the crisis inevitable? Is a different policy possible? That is the only debate which concerns me. It clearly does not interest F. Mitterrand. I can understand that. It is impossible to wait for the election to come around. We must wage and extend the struggles. Which party is to be found in this sphere? Who is standing by the Manufrance workers, the Destival miners and all those who are struggling? The Communists.

"Similarly on the international plane, the PS is clearly sliding toward Valery Giscard d'Estaing's stances.

"You see, people want to debate the problems of employment, housing, health care, and major international issues.... That is what interests them."

Then, to a question on the PCF candidate's attitude on the second round and the possibility of his standing down, Georges Marchais replied in particular: "The question is inappropriate at the moment. I will answer it on the night of the first round if the question still applies. The Communist voters and the many people who could become Communist voters have no doubt that the PCF is the resolute opponent of Giscard d'Estaing's policy and that the PCF is proposing practical solutions to steer the country out of the crisis."

Finally, the last question related to the percentage which the PCF candidate aims to obtain.

In this connection G. Marchais said: "No percentage has been predicted. We must obtain as many votes as possible for the PCF candidate. Experience has shown that the PCF is not strong enough. The PCF must be given its rightful place in the nation. The workers party must be given the strength which will enable it to move toward changes."

Comments on 'New Strategy'

LD211409 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Oct 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Strengthening the PCF Is the Precondition for Change"]

[Excerpts] The television program "Cards on the Table" on which Georges Marchais was the guest on Monday evening [13 October] sparked off numerous reactions and commentaries in the press yesterday.

When Alain Duhamel asked him whether the PCF has abandoned the union policy, Georges Marchais replied that, on the contrary, "it is precisely because we want to create the conditions for a new union, making real change possible," that the PCF is forcefully raising the question of its place in the country. "We are not going to repeat union! Union! Union! Elections! in a parrot-like fashion." We need "another path which takes account of the experience of government policy, PS policy and the world's evolution." This is the best way of "winning," and the "duration of the process depends on the workers."

Georges Marchais gave an account of the economic and social policy followed by Giscard d'Estaing, who "has not failed" but has followed a policy in keeping with the interests of his class.

Questioned on Francois Mitterrand's candidacy, Marchais pointed out that the real question is not that of the candidate's name but of the proposals and program he upholds. The fundamental problem facing the French people is how to overcome the crisis. He pointed in particular to the fate which young people are experiencing.

Georges Marchais then stressed that his two interlocutors drew a strange conclusion from the analysis of the PS line made by the PCF: "You say it is the PCF which is in the wrong," and he remarked that some people pretend to regret that the PCF is not like the PCI and PCE.

Georges Marchais then simply demonstrated that in Spain the Socialist Party regards the PCE as its main adversary, while in Italy the PSI prefers alliance with the DC to agreement with the PCI.

Georges Marchais then answered several questions which hinted that, by putting forward a candidate, the PCF is playing into the ruling right's hands.

He pointed out that for the past 30 years, with the right alone in government, then the PS alone, then the right and the PS and finally the right alone once again, things have gone from bad to worse in the country.

He added: "For those who want change, the only question is how to establish a balance of forces which will force the implementation of a different policy."

The question of an agreement with the PS was then raised. Georges Marchais said that the reply is to be found in the report which Charles Fiterman submitted to the PCF national conference. He recalled the analysis which the report makes of PS policy, from which it can be concluded that the conditions for an agreement between the PCF and PS do not exist at present. He added that this report shows it rather unlikely that the right conditions for such an agreement will be created between now and 27 April.

Georges Marchais pointed out that the Communists' consideration of the experience of several decades had led them to adopt a new strategy for winning, changing and defeating the government. With regard to standing down he added: "I say that the automatic formula is outdated. Experience has demonstrated that." The essential problem is "the implementation of a new policy for change."

PCF PARIS BUREAU CRITICIZES REMARKS BY DISSENTING COUNCILORS

LD211039 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 18 Oct 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "Censure From Militants in the Capital"]

[Text] The following is a statement issued by the PCF Paris federal bureau:

The bourgeois media are making a fuss about the statements made on Thursday by Paris Communist councilors Henri Fiszbin, Francoise Durand, Michel Ferignac, Jean Gager and Jean-Jacques Rosat.

These councilors state that since they have been denied the opportunity of expressing their views to the national conference they feel released from the obligation to join the presidential election battle.

There is a basic inaccuracy here: As party members and members of leadership bodies they were not denied any opportunity to express their viewpoints. Henri Fiszbin and Francoise Durand, who are Federal Committee members, even took part in the Federal Committee meeting which appointed the Paris delegation to the conference.

Furthermore their approach is not new although it is being escalated. For months some of them have been refusing to take any part in any work as leaders or elected representatives and all have been refusing to take part in the struggle to implement the 23d congress policy, not to mention the public statements some of them have made against the party's policy. This has prompted censure from Paris Communists.

The party's national conference, democratically convened, as our rules require, and fully in keeping with the 23d congress line, laid down the lines to be followed in the presidential election campaign and appointed the party's candidate: Georges Marchais.

It is unacceptable that elected Communist representatives should reject this battle, obligingly giving political means of struggle to the bourgeoisie, thereby using their mandate against their party's innovating policy.

Over the past year, in an in-depth political discussion the Paris Federal Committee and Communists have done all they can to enable these Communists, even if they were to maintain their disagreement, to play a full part in the struggle and in exercising responsibilities.

It must be noted that they have taken no account of that and are hardening their attitude, allowing the government and the bourgeoisie to use them for their fundamental goal: to weaken the party whose influence is the workers' guarantee for the present and for any progress toward change.

The Communists, in Paris as throughout the country, are continuing to implement the policy laid down by the 23d congress. They are confidently joining the battle to take the cause of change as far as possible by voting for the party candidate: Georges Marchais.

PCF JOURNALIST HITS LEADERSHIP REJECTION OF LEFTWING UNION

LD220859 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Oct 80 p 8

[Text] Maurice Goldring, a member of the Communist weekly REVOLUTION's editorial staff, has sent us the following text:

The delegates' seats were still warm. Barely 24 hours had passed since the PCF national conference. The 1,300 delegates were not deemed worthy to hear this astonishing remark which was reserved for television: "Automatically standing down is an outdated formula." Thus, in the most disgraceful circumstances, in reply to a journalist's question, outside the official bodies and outside any debate or discussion, it was revealed what the nature of the PCF campaign will be over the next 6 months: We must resign ourselves to the PS' swing to the right, stop fighting from positions which make it possible to reach agreements favorable to the workers' interests and rally our forces for a later date.

With only 6 months to go to an election whose importance does not escape anybody, we are abandoning a simple rule whose main merit is not the length of time it has been observed. It is the only rule which makes it possible to defeat the right. This is a formidable gift to the present government. It is a terrible blow to the people's support for the PCF whose unitary tenacity and capacity for intervention in struggles are so highly valued by the masses.

The 23d congress had set the party the objective of rebuilding the union on new bases by union at the grass roots level, the workers' active intervention being the only guarantee of clear and respected political agreements. Despite some interpretations which harked back to outmoded sectarianism, the main point had been safeguarded and attachment to the leftwing union reaffirmed.

Georges Marchais' book and his speech at the L'HUMANITE festival marked a deviation from that line. This deviation was confirmed by Charles Fiterman's report to the national conference. A political agreement is impossible with "the PS' current policy." "And, at the present time it does not seem likely that this situation will change between now and 26 April next year. Therefore seeking it would mean going up a blind alley." Therefore we must no longer fight fiercely for what is described elsewhere as the "necessary precondition for the success of our battle." Understand that if you can. However, nowhere in this report do we find the crucial remark made by Georges Marchais in the "Cards on the Table" program.

It is impossible to hold to such disastrous resignation. We must return to what is our policy, our common property. A political line is not a document which can be changed according to circumstances. We cannot continue to call on the workers and party members to limit their political outlook in this way and to leave the party leadership to settle the major issues at will in television programs. Each individual's commitment has been undermined. It is with real anguish that PCF members listen to television speeches: What new question will they be incapable of answering the next day on the shop floor and in their offices?

Do not ask me to confuse a policy with those who do not apply it, unless we are to consider that automatic respect for a political line by the party's leadership is an outdated formula.

L'HUMANITE ON CEAUSESCU COMMENTS ON POLAND

LD211129 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 18 Oct 80 p 7

[Unattributed report: "Poland: No Interference"]

[Text] Romanian Communist Party First Secretary Nicolae Ceausescu has just stated to the party Central Committee in Bucharest that he does not wish to interfere in Poland's internal affairs. That did not prevent him from stating: "If appropriate action had been taken in time and if a firm line had been adopted against antisocialist elements and forces, the events we have witnessed would not have taken place." Despite stylistic care the judgement made by Nicolae Ceausescu is more like a recipe given from outside and after the event than like mere reflection. Does it not contradict the Romanian leaders' avowed intention to reject--quite rightly--any interference in their own affairs?

Poland is passing through a complicated period. The Polish United Workers Party is facing up to mistakes and the train of difficulties they have brought. The Poles want to continue along the path of dialogue and the development of socialist democracy. They want to and can settle their own problems themselves. Care must be taken not to define solutions in their place.

POLLS PUT GISCARD AHEAD IN FIRST BALLOT VOTING

LD211519 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Oct 80 p 9

[Text] LE FIGARO of 17 October publishes a SOFRES opinion poll on how people intend to vote in the presidential election. The poll was carried out from 2-8 October and included 1,000 people. In the first round Giscard d'Estaing would obtain 32 percent if Mr Rocard (24 percent) is candidate and 34 percent if Mitterrand (19 percent) is candidate. In both cases Chirac and Debre would obtain 12 percent and 5 percent respectively. The outgoing president scores best (41 percent) in the hypothetical case of neither Mr Chirac or Mr Rocard running. In Mr Debre's absence, Mr Chirac obtains 15 percent of the intended votes. In all cases Mr Giscard d'Estaing would obtain 52 percent against Mr Rocard (48 percent) and 57 percent against Mr Mitterrand (43 percent). Of the people questioned 45 percent had not definitely decided who to vote for.

Young Voters Favor PS

LD210955 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Oct 80 p 11

[Text] In its 18 October edition, TELE 7 JOURS publishes the results of an opinion poll on the presidential election carried out by SOFRES on the basis of a population sample of 600 voters in the 18-28 year age group who, because of their age, have never voted in a presidential election. This inquiry was carried out from 11-18 September 1980.

Assuming that Francois Mitterrand was the Socialist candidate, voters in this age group would make Valery Gicard d'Estaing head the list in the first round with 26 percent of the votes, compared with 20 percent for Georges Marchias, 18 percent for Mitterrand, 13 percent for Brice Lalonde (candidate of the ecological movement) and 8 percent for Jacques Chirac. In the event of Michel Rocard being the candidate, Giscard d'Estaing would remain first in the list in the first round (25 percent of votes) before Rocard (23 percent), Marchais (21 percent), Lalonde (9 percent) and Chirac (7 percent). In the second round Mitterrand would win with 51 percent of the votes against 49 percent for Giscard d'Estaing. Rocard would win more easily--58 percent of votes against 42 percent for the outgoing president.

PSI, PSDI ISSUE JOINT 'STATEMENT OF INTENT'

LD201223 Rome AVANTI! in Italian 8 Oct 80 p 1

["Text" of 7 October PSI-Italian Social Democratic Party (PSDI) "Statement of Intent"]

[Text] From their renewed adherence to the values and experiences of West European socialism and from their shared commitment within the Socialist International and the European Parliament, in several local administrations and in trade union action, the PSI and PSDI delegations draw the essential reasons for emphasizing the necessity and importance of establishing a frank, friendly and continuing consultation on the major issues of foreign and domestic policy and of seeking agreed solutions to those problems.

This decision does not eliminate the reasons for the two parties' political and organizational autonomy. Instead it reflects the need for links and an understanding which must be capable of being extended to all the forces that share a joint leftwing, socialist, freedom-loving and democratic inspiration. The social, cultural and electoral evolution that has assigned a growing scope and role to the socialist, freedom-loving and democratic forces must be met with convincing, gradual and consistent political responses from the parties concerned.

Shared links, understanding and initiatives between the PSI and PSDI and with other forces must be given a more general context of understanding and dialogue among all the democratic forces, first and foremost among those that have deep and broad representation in the labor world. The Socialists and Social Democrats are profoundly aware of the need to continue actively in the task of creative reconciliation between Christian and socialist values under the banner of a shared assessment of men's and women's rights and freedoms and in confirmation of the secular approach to politics and the state and to facilitate the trade unions' autonomous and unitary development, their full participation in the major economic and social policy options and the building of a real industry democracy. With respect to the PCI, so that it will regain ground and so that the process of revision and international autonomy on which the Italian left's future so greatly depends will develop consistently, so that political, program[illegible]ministrative convergences can be attempted and developed in parliament, the tra[illegible] unions and local administrations, so that we can surmount the present rigid counterpositions, which are not the least important cause accentuating the factors of ungovernability, both parties are fully aware of the importance ofcreating new conditions for constructive prospects to emerge in relations among all the Italian leftwing forces.

With regard to the DC, both party delegations confirm their desire to resume a policy of guaranteed cooperation based on foundations of honesty and equal status and within recognition of fundamental respective roles and the principles of rotation. Such cooperation cannot rule out different and distinct roles within the flexible system of our country's local government, let alone the old and new reasons for honest democratic rivalry.

In the quest for possible forms of solidarity among all the democratic forces and in the desire to define the terms of honest cooperation with the DC within the majority and the government, with the PRI's essential contribution and democratic participation, the two party delegations believe, in view of the country's crisis, that the requirements of regenerating and reforming the institutions and of reforming the state are as necessary as the requirements of governability and stability. Parliament's credibility is shaken by the string of crises, the atmosphere of splittism and precariousness which restricts its legislative capacity and devalues its leadership role. A major alliance and a major reform are to be hoped for, so that the democratic institutions will be enabled to function, to deal with the many crises afflicting Italy and to assist the emergence of elements of freedom, vigor and progress.

The delegations discussed the need to adapt the response from state justice to the two-fold attack of the two branches of terrorism, with their worrisome international links; to help define an emergency economic policy and a form of planning that will consistently tackle the industrial, financial and monetary problems, in the light of the fundamental necessities of safeguarding the real value of incomes and defending and expanding employment through a better organization of the labor market agreed and negotiated with the trade union movement.

A consistent egalitarian standard must govern effective economic, social and pay policies; a large-scale active commitment to housing, a more valid protection of the elderly and incisive intervention in the old and new poor and deprived areas characterize the activity of the socialist and social democratic parties in parliament and throughout the country; the reorganization of agricultural structures is necessary partly also in relation to the proposals to expand the EC; the effort aimed at giving specific form to the principles of social justice must become systematic; an extraordinary commitment to savings and the quest for alternative sources must motivate the national energy plan; research, investment and credit policies must have the aim of reducing and rectifying our scientific and technological lag; a careful and strict policy on the natural and historical environment must protect and make the most of the vast heritage constituted by Italy's territory and culture.

The socialist and social democratic parties consider inalienable and undelayable a consistent plan for interventions in southern Italy capable of uniting and coordinating the efforts of public and private enterprises, remedial action in urban areas and the prompt introduction of major infrastructures, opportunities for expanding tourism and improvement of the tertiary sector and the major social services.

The delegations also discussed problems connected with the referendums proposed by the Radical Party, publishing reform and the need for a framework law on the mass media.

The delegations confirmed both parties' commitment to building the EEC edifice, as the result of the contribution of all European states and peoples. Within the framework of security guaranteed by the Atlantic Alliance, the PSI and PSDI support and encourage Italy's active role in the quest for dialogue and the organization of peace.

There is now a need--partly moral--that can no longer be postponed for Italy to bridge the accumulated gap and make a specific contribution to remove, as far as it can, the persistent causes of underdevelopment in the third and fourth worlds, and particularly in countries to which it is bound by long-standing friendship. In this action the PSI and PSDI will urge parliament and the government to insure that Italy contributes its own commitment to that of those fighting to vanquish famine in the world, to assert and uphold the people's rights and human rights against all forms of domination and oppression.

The delegations agreed to submit to their respective party bodies an examination of ways and means to extend and develop cooperation and opportunities for extending to other forces the invitation to take the opportunity to define joint initiatives, while acknowledging separate roles and differing parliamentary stances.

During the proceedings the delegations welcomed the election success of the social democratic-liberal coalition of the SPD and Comrade Schmidt, which guarantees an essential factor of continuity in the process of detente and security. The PSI and PSDI also welcome the confirmation of the Portuguese Socialist Party's robust strength in the general election.

KIPRIANOU'S PARTY DISCUSSES FORTHCOMING ELECTIONS

NC212047 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] The Democratic Party has announced that it will contest the next parliamentary elections with determination. A relevant statement says the party's Political Bureau, which held a meeting tonight under the chairmanship of its president, Kiprianou, discussed organizational matters and decided to establish the necessary organs for the expansion of the party as well as to undertake preparations for the forthcoming parliamentary elections.

AKEL STATEMENT ON UPCOMING PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS

NC220716 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 22 Oct 80 p 1

[Resolution by the AKEL Central Committee Plenum]

[Text] Last Monday the AKEL Central Committee and the Central Control Committee met in connection with the question: "The coming parliamentary elections." AKEL Secretary General E. Papaioannou gave an introductory address on the Political Bureau document. The meeting was chaired by Deputy Secretary General A. Fandis. A statement by the party's Central Committee says:

"Following a detailed discussion, the plenum arrived at a unanimous decision in connection with the main goals confronting the party and the people with regard to the upcoming parliamentary elections. The main aim is the election of a new House whose majority will be democratic, who will support the approved and declared line and policy for a Cyprus solution and who will be more sensitive toward the approach and solution of the economic, social and other burning problems of the people.

"The plenum also decided that during the parliamentary elections AKEL should run independently and nominate candidates for all seats. Being firmly devoted to the line of patriotic unity and cooperation, AKEL will cooperate after the elections--both inside and outside the House--with all those political forces that agree with the declared line and policy for a Cyprus solution, and will struggle aginst the policy of the extreme rightwing [Democratic] Rally, which expresses the interests of the most reactionary circles of the economic oligarchy, which has connections with international monopolies and with imperialist circles and which politicizes the coupists and supports a NATOite solution to the Cyprus problem as well as an antipeople's solution to the working people's problems.

"The plenum stressed that the supreme interests of the Cypriot people and of our cause dictate and make imperative that the upcoming parliamentary elections be held within a calm, civilized atmosphere with exemplary democratic order and normality.

"The plenum also arrived at decisions on the setting up of the elections machinery and the preparation of the party and the movement for the parliamentary elections."

ATAKOL COMMENTS ON GREECE'S RETURN TO NATO

TA211348 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Kenan Atakol, foreign affairs, defense and tourism minister of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, has said that Greece's return to NATO's military wing would not affect the Cyprus issue. According to a report by the Turkish Radio and Television news center in Lefkosa [Nicosia] Atakol added that the Cyprus problem concerned the two communities living on the island and that it could only be solved through intercommunal talks between them. Recalling that the Turkish Cypriot community was waging a struggle to live freely on its land, Atakol said that the community would never make any concessions to its determination to continue this struggle.

CZECHOSLOVAK PREMIER STROUGAL CONTINUES OFFICIAL VISIT

Confers With Rallis

AT202029 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Text] Greek-Czechoslovak talks began at the Foreign Ministry at 1730 and a full-scale conference was held to examine bilateral and international issues. Shortly before the conference, Prime Minister Rallis had a private talk with his Czechoslovak counterpart, Strougal, who arrived in Athens at noon on a 3-day official visit.

At the 2-hour conference--which will be repeated on Wednesday--in addition to Prime Minister Rallis, the Greek side was represented by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, Minister of Industry Manos, Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis, Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry Theodhoroupoulos, and Ambassador in Prague Mavromikhalis. In addition to Premier Strougal, the Czechoslovak side was represented by Minister for Foreign Trade Barcak, Minister of Metallurgy and Heavy Engineering Gerle, First Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs Knizka, and Ambassador in Athens Zantovsky.

The Wednesday conference will examine details on the greater development of commercial and economic relations between the two countries.

Remarks at Banquet

AT211508 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0500 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Warm toasts for the constant development of relations between Greece and Czechoslovakia in all fields were exchanged yesterday by the premiers of the two countries, Rallis and Strougal, during a formal dinner given by the Greek prime minister.

Addressing the Czechoslovak premier, Rallis stressed that Greece is satisfied to note that the systematic effort, which essentially began 6 years ago, to develop relations between the two countries is producing results. This effort, he said, has extended to all sectors of our relations.

Rallis then referred to the development of commercial exchanges between the two countries and to the progress of their cooperation in the economic field. He stressed that Strougal's presence in Athens provides an opportunity for signing agreements on industrial and technical cooperation, and consular, medical, and legal assistance, in addition to the economic agreements.

Then the Greek prime minister referred to the international situation and stressed that the two countries have declared their faith in the principles which should govern relations among countries in international life. These principles include the UN Charter, the Helsinki Final Act and the principles of independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, noninterference in the internal affairs of other countries, avoidance of force or the threat or use of force, and the peaceful solution of differences. Rallis then stressed that many of these principles are currently being openly violated in various parts of the world in a way that disturbs international detente and peace. At this point he referred to the Cyprus tragedy and the blatant violation of the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of this nonaligned country.

Concluding, Rallis expressed the hope that the meeting in Madrid would perhaps provide an opportunity for efforts to be made toward salvaging what can be salvaged from international detente.

In reply, Czechoslovak Prime Minister Strougal--after conveying the greeting of the Czechoslovak people, their government and President of the Republic Husak--referred to Greece's contributions to international civilization. Continuing, he stressed that the two countries have recently found a common language and that their meetings are taking place increasingly more frequently. We want to further develop, he stressed, the high-level political dialogue which was begun last October by then prime minister and current President of the Republic Karamanlis, which corresponds fully with the interests of both countries and all of Europe. Already last year, Strougal went on to say, we agreed with President Karamanlis that no effort in the interest of detente would be in vain because it would serve the splendid aim of human survival.

Continuing, he referred to the international situation and stressed that obstacles have increased but that they are not insurmountable, especially if the dominant principle is to solve problems through negotiations on the basis of equality and [word indistinct] security.

Finally he expressed the conviction that the visit and talks he had had in Athens will give new impetus to Greek-Czechoslovak relations.

RADIO NOTES CARTER STATEMENT ON RETURN TO NATO

AT211513 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] AFP reports from New York President Carter's statement that, after Greece's return to military NATO, the next problem to be solved will be the Cyprus issue.

Speaking yesterday in New York at a preelection gathering of Greek Americans, President Carter stated that Greece's return to NATO does not merely constitute a great event for Greece and the European countries but also for the United States. The next step, added the U.S. President, will be to solve the Cyprus problem and restore human rights in Cyprus.

PAPANDREOU DISPUTES LEGALITY OF RETURN TO NATO

AT211529 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 21 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Statement by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou]

[Text] Greece's return to the NATO military structure was ratified by the Defense Planning Committee in record time--a time that surpasses every previous record. Consequently it is difficult to avoid concluding--even among Greeks with the best of faith--that this involves a contrivance, a contrivance at the expense of the Greek people's dignity.

Yesterday I stated that the government should submit the new agreement to the Chamber for ratification by three-fifths of the entire number of deputies--in accordance with Article 28, paragraph 2 of the Constitution. The provisions of the Constitution are so clear that they do not lend themselves to dispute. If the new agreement for return to military NATO is not ratified by the Chamber, it will become void.

The prime minister's claim--according to which Chamber approval is not needed because withdrawal from NATO (in August 1974) was not ratified by the Chamber--is entirely unfounded. Article 28, paragraph 2 of the Constitution does not require approval by the Chamber for abrogation of a treaty, it only requires ratification [of a treaty] because according to the Constitution, a treaty recognizes (transfers) jurisdiction to organs of an international body.

Furthermore, the prime minister claims that "our return, which is taking place within the same legal framework envisaged by the alliance's charter, does not need legislative approval." This, however, concerns regulations which govern the alliance--not regulations that govern the Creek state. Certainly the prime minister knows that although "international agreements... prevail over any provision of law to the contrary" they certainly do not prevail over constitutional provisions.

Consequently, an immense constitutional issue emerges--an issue of substantive and formal violation of the Constitution by the Rallis government which is not protected by the process of a vote of confidence.

The president of the republic must not remain indifferent. His responsibilities--according to the Constitution--include his obligation to note to the government possible violations of the Constitution, and to judge whether or not reason exists for him to exercise his authority.

These are the facts regarding the formal constitutional issue. In addition to this, the political issue exists, of course. The current Parliament does not have the necessary popular support to ratify a treaty that is so critical for the nation. As I stressed yesterday, PASOK will shoulder the responsibility, when it assumes the national government, to put the agreement to the judgment of the new Chamber.

NEWSPAPERS' 21 OCTOBER COMMENTS ON RETURN TO NATO

MESIMVRINI Article

AT211731 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 21 Oct 80 p 1

[Unattributed article: "The Substance"]

[Text] National rights were not conceded and are not being conceded with the new agreement nor, or course, will they be conceded during the negotiations, circles who are very well informed on the agreement yesterday stressed to MESIMVRINI.

Greece--the circles clarified--is returning to the NATO military structure on the basis of all existing texts of the Defense Planning Committee which were in force prior to the withdrawal in 1974.

Only as many arrangements as are necessary will now be made because of the establishment of a new NATO (air) headquarters in Larisa under a Greek commander who, in cooperation with the corresponding--Turkish--commander of the Izmir headquarters and with the commander of the southern area's air forces (AFSOUTH), will specify all the necessary details for coordinating the alliance's air operations.

The same sources added that nowhere in the agreement does the issue of national airspace borders in the Aegean arise. According to Greek law (presidential decree of 1932) the national airspace is 10 nautical miles (as compared to 6 for seaspace). The limitation of airspace to 6 miles will take place only when instances of NATO exercises are concerned.

Flights in the international airspace--it is further clarified--cannot be precluded for any country under the express prerequisite that regulations of the ICAO [International Civil Aviation Organization] and national laws are adhered to. Greece implements this principle.

Furthermore, in accordance with the same reports, until negotiations between Greece and Turkey on the settlement of outstanding issues in the Aegean area reach agreement, command will be exercised by the headquarters of the NATO southern wing in Naples (CINCSOUTH).

I VRADHINI Article

AT211854 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 21 Oct 80 pp 1-2

[From the "Evening" column: "Satisfaction"]

[Text] As of yesterday, Greece again became linked to the Atlantic alliance's wing from which it had withdrawn 6 years ago. This development could only generate more general satisfaction; satisfaction for the majority of Greek people, satisfaction for the alliance and its member countries, and satisfaction for our neighboring Balkan countries, one that naturally will not be manifested publicly....

For the majority of Greek people, return to NATO means the strengthening of our country's defense capability and, consequently, of the feeling of security in difficult moments. As clouds have massed on the international horizon since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the crisis in Poland and the war between Iran and Iraq, the nonaligned countries have felt that they are being threatened more--and seek protection. It was inconceivable for Greece to follow a different road.

Of course the "Atilla" invasion of Cyprus caused our withdrawal in 1974 and the fact is that 40 percent of Cyprus is still under Turkish occupation; yet our nonreturn to the alliance's unified military structure would not now serve the Cyprus cause but would weaken the country's defense capability and international position.

For these reasons the governments of K. Karamanlis sought a return to NATO which until the day before yesterday had collided with a Turkish veto. Turkey had wanted to use this opportunity to achieve some arrangements it had demanded many years before the Greek withdrawal. The alliance's efforts to sidestep this obstacle--originally through General Haig's efforts and subsequently through those of his successor--failed to produce results. However, General Robert Rogers finally proved that there are military people who do not lack diplomatic virtue....

His proposals, which were accepted by both Greece and Turkey and led to yesterday's exceptionally significant development, have not yet become public knowledge. However, we have every reason to rely on the assurance of Prime Minister Rallis that no sovereign right of our country has been damaged in view of the conditions that have been guaranteed. Operational control over the national area remains under the exclusive responsibility of the national armed forces and the decisions which have been made regarding the international area are considered absolutely satisfactory.

Under such circumstances and with acceptable conditions, the majority of the public, like the government, considers return to NATO a positive event. After all, we had been seeking this return for years and Ankara was the one who had objected until recently, despite the fact that return to NATO would serve Turkey's more general interests—since without Greece the alliance's southeastern wing would be dissolved and Turkey would be isolated.

However, we shall not dwell on the fact that the Greek viewpoint finally prevailed and that Ankara had to withdraw its veto because we believe that, in the wake of developments that have greatly increased unrest in an especially critical area, logic and the assessment of more general interests have prevailed.

One should claim short-sightedness or Don Quixotism if one ignores these developments. This is precisely the case of the PASOK chairman who preaches a nonaligned policy when the independence and integrity of the nonaligned countries is being violated, hit, endangered and threatened more than ever before.... The position of the hardline people of the KKE, who want a nonaligned policy as the first stage of Greece's transfer to the Warsaw Pact, at least has some logic. But what is Papandreou aiming at with his utopia in favor of the nonaligned? Does he aim to strengthen Turkey at the expense of Greece which Turkey wants to be like a lone reed in a field when winds are raging?

This is basically why yesterday's return has caused satisfaction for the majority of Greek people and, regardless of the number of communist attempts to activate the youth, regardless of any sophistry that PASOK may put forth in interpreting the constitution, this favorable impression will not be clouded or changed.

It is not necessary to analyze in detail the reasons for the alliance's satisfaction. Greece's return restores the cohesion of the NATO southeastern wing at a critical period, and it is easy to hail this development in the manner that it has been hailed. Should we add that our neighboring Balkan countries, which since yesterday have felt more secure, are hailing this in a similar manner although their satisfaction cannot be expressed publicly?

[Editorial: "Critical Questions: How We Withdrew and Why We Are Returning to NATO"]

[Text] On 14 August 1974, then prime minister and current President of the Republic Konstandinos Karamanlis decided to withdraw Greece from the NATO military wing. He made that decision when Turkey resumed hostilities in Cyprus and was beginning its second attack that concluded with the occupation of 38 percent of the Megalonisos' soil. The official announcement said that the Atlantic alliance's "proved inability" to avert the Turkish attack was the reason why Greece was withdrawing from the NATO military wing.

The then prime minister and current president of the republic also said that "only if the reasons which had forced Greece to thus define its position toward the Atlantic alliance were eliminated" could Greece "reexamine its position toward the alliance."

On 16 October 1975 the then prime minister and current president of the republic announced that the government had decided to conclude a "special relationship" with the Atlantic alliance, a relationship that would be "similar" to France's precedent and which would provide that "in peacetime the country's armed forces would fall exclusively under national command."

On Saturday the Greek Government accepted a plan that envisages "return" to the NATO military wing in accordance with the status and arrangements that were in force in the past. It was precisely this expression--that is, of "return" under the "arrangements" of the past--that the ministerial council judged yesterday to be "absolutely satisfactory."

Certain important questions which do not concern the conditions of the agreement (which the public still does not know officially) but its substance arise from the enumeration of these facts.

What has happened since 1974 so that "the reasons have been eliminated" upon which the then prime minister and current president of republic based his decision to withdraw from the NATO military wing? Have the Turkish troops been withdrawn from the Megalonisos? Have the Turks ceased occupying 38 percent of Cyprus soil?

However, there is a second question: What remains of the "special relationship" which the current president of the republic mentioned when he announced that he was seeking return to the NATO military wing since President Carter is stating that Greece "will fully return to the NATO military structure"? What does "special relationship" now mean when the return is taking place under the status and arrangements that were in force (in the best of cases) in 1974? Will the Greek armed forces "fall exclusively under national command" as the then prime minister and current president of the republic had stated or will only a part of the Greek armed forces remain "under national command"?

In addition to all the texts that were signed, and in addition to what will be announced this week in the Chamber, one last question remains: Have other commitments been undertaken and have other promises been given to NATO so that Saturday's agreement could be achieved? That is, in addition to the documents are there other kinds of tacit agreements which will be implemented in the weeks and months to come? And, specifically, has any promise been given regarding the limitation of Greek airspace in the Aegean from 10 to 6 miles?

One need not be an opponent of the current government, a leftist, a communist or "neutralist" to ask these simple questions. They are dictated by common sense.

I KATHIMERINI Editorial

AT211827 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 21 Oct 80 p 5

[Editorial: "The Worst Solution...."]

[Text] Unfortunately or fortunately, things have not changed since Aristotle's time: Politics continues to be an art of the feasible and this "feasible" usually is related more to objective reality and less to our subjective reactions and evaluations, to our wishes and our sentiments. Naturally it does not always include all of our expectations, nor does it satisfy all of our goals. Its great strength lies elsewhere: That it is the only...feasible thing.

The issue of our return to the NATO military wing seems to lie somewhere there.

The problem of our relations with the NATO military wing is sufficiently old: Precisely as old as the Turkish military occupation of more than one-third of Cyprus. The Greek people have tasted sufficient bitterness since then: Precisely as much as has been created by the injustice which they constantly feel they are enduring not toward the things that are asked of them--those would be very many--nor toward the things they have given--those would be even more--but toward those things that are basically due them, not in the name of the past but of the very specific present and the rather clearly apparent future.

But we have said it: Nobody, except for Cervantes' hero, has been able to overcome the feasible. What diversifies things and circumstances--naturally people, too--is when one understands the limits of this "feasible"; before the failure, through some rudimentary perspicacity or, after the failure, following a painful collision with the wall.... It is somewhere there, in the very realistic area between elementary perspicacity and painful collision that the limits are outlined and the possibilities and potentials of a foreign policy are assessed....

After all, in addition to other things, the communist parties of Western Europe express their reality in their position toward NATO since all of them either tolerate or accept their countries' participation in the Atlantic alliance; the Italian Communist Party has actually declared that it considers participation as an element of international balance.

The current international reality within which every foreign policy is forced to operate can be understood even from newspaper headlines. Yet one could have a more authoritative witness, the UN Organization which, in its report on the UN day of disarmament to be celebrated the day after tomorrow, tells us about two picturesque details of the idyllic reality which dominates our plant: Existing weapons of mass destruction can kill all the inhabitants of our planet not once but 10 times and, one more detail--the weight of the explosive material which currently corresponds to every man on earth is greater than the weight of all his corresponding foodstuffs.

The debate the day after tomorrow in the Chamber on the terms of our return will confirm, we hope, the government announcement that through our return to the NATO military wing our defense capability will become stronger, our military interests will be protected more effectively, our international position will be enhanced, and our capabilities in supporting Cyprus will be multiplied.

In a world like the one described by the aforementioned UN report, with a war going on at this hour in the most sensitive part of the world--the Persian Gulf--and with the spirit of Helsinki increasingly and more openly being elbowed from the surface of our planet, unfortunately very few margins for sentimentality remain and even fewer margins for choices....

ELEVTHEROS KOSMOS EDITORIAL

AT211911 Athens ELEVTHEROS KOSMOS in Greek 21 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial by S. Konstandopoulos: "Gentlemen, While There Is Still Time, Pack Up Your Wives and Children.... You Have No Choice"]

[Text] The government has accepted the Rogers plan on Greece's return to NATO. The report was published in the Sunday newspapers. It had not stemmed from an official source. People waited to hear from the radio and television a confirmation or denial. However, the mass media was silent. Only at midnight on Saturday were a few words said about demonstrations. The government's tongue was only untied at 2100. The government spoke. It did not do so on its own initiative. Papandreou had addressed a message to the people and this forced the government to abandon silence.

The government's behavior attests to many things. First, it shows contempt for the public. The prime minister should have informed the people. He should have told them of the content of the Rogers plan and explained why he accepted it. Second, the government's position denotes fear. It was an act of political cowardice. The government shudders at the repercussions of its action both among people who have declared themselves against return to NATO and among those of us who want to return but without national humiliation and the sacrifice of national rights.

Third, the way in which the government handled the issue attests to a feeling of guilt. Obviously the government understands that it has done something bad and would like to avoid the bitter cup of discussion and censure.

Making a virtue of necessity, Rallis was forced to reply to A. Papandreou. He informed us, therefore, that Greece's defense will be strengthened with its return to NATO. Consequently, withdrawal from the Atlantic alliance had weakened our country's defense capability. The prime minister added one more argument. Greece—he said—by returning to the NATO military wing, will be in a position to help Cyprus more effectively. This means that by withdrawing from NATO we had reduced our abilities to support the Megalonisos. Conclusion: The ingenious foreign policy of Karamanlis on the one hand had reduced the strength of Greece's national defense while the area around us was burning up; on the other, it deprived suffering Cyprus of even more serious help.

What should we discuss now? And with whom? The man responsible for this dramatic 1974-80 adventure has sought refuge in the presidency of the republic. He is wrong if he thinks that his role as supreme ruler eliminates his responsibilities as prime minister. The responsibilities exist and sanctions will be imposed. There should be no doubt about this. The people who compose the leading circle of New Democracy (from which Karamanlis is not absent) can do themselves only one service; pack up their wives and children and go home because, if they insist on holding onto power despite the obvious contrary will of the people, the solution we are currently suggesting will later appear idyllic to them.

The regime which the Karamanlis policy has shaped is irreparably ruined, incompetent and sinful. PASOK does not represent anything better. Should Greece remain in the current situation, then Papandreou will arrive as a typhoon against which there will be no defense. Neither Karamanlis nor Papandreou. What then? A government of national need composed of personalities outside Parliament in accordance with P. Garoufalias' timely proposal. Anything else would deteriorate the internal crisis that is undermining the country's foundations.

INDUSTRIAL COOPERATION PROTOCOL SIGNED WITH SYRIA

AT180945 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0500 GMT 18 Oct 80

[Text] The signing of a protocol on industrial cooperation closed the second meeting of the Greek-Syrian Committee in Damascus.

The great development in transportation between the two countries, particularly after establishment of the Volos-Tartus ferry link, was specially stressed during the meeting. At the same time a new railway ferry link between Volos and Latakia is being speeded up. This second link will be an additional great step to assist commerce and transportation between the two countries. It was agreed to set up a special committee of experts which will solve arising problems in an effort to guarantee operation of the second ferry link by the end of the year.

Greek Minister Without Portfolio Dhimas, who led the Greek delegation to the Damascus meeting was also received by Syrian Prime Minister al-Kasm and Deputy Prime Minister for Economic Affairs Qaddurah. He signed the protocol along with Minister of State for Planning Affairs Yasin. He also conferred with the Syrian ministers of transport, industry, communications, health and tourism.

FOREIGN MINISTER ON GREECE'S REINTEGRATION INTO NATO

TA211626 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that Greece's return to NATO's military wing was due to Turkey's conciliatory attitude. In a statement to the national press agency on the ratification of Greece's return to NATO's military flank by the alliance's Defense Planning Committee yesterday, Turkmen said: Under the present international circumstances Greece's reintegration into NATO is plessing to all. This is a development that other NATO countries have desired for a long time. Further arrangements will be undertaken by the military committees of the two countries. Greece's return to NATO's military wing is due to Turkey's conciliatory attitude. This development has caused pleasure in Turkey, Greece as well as in other NATO countries.

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY TO SUPPLY TURKISH OIL NEEDS

TA220825 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] It has been announced that the International Energy Agency will supply crude oil to Turkey in the event of a crude oil shortage due to the war between Iran and Iraq. The administrative council of the agency, which includes 21 Western member countries—among them Turkey—met in Paris yesterday and decided upon the oil consumption strategy to be pursued during the Iran-Iraq war.

In a statement to reporters after the meeting, Administrative Council Chairman Niels Ersboell said that work has started to insure that the 1 million tons of crude oil Turkey needs until the end of the year is supplied by the agency. He added that the decision to supply oil to Turkey was made as a result of an unofficial agreement and that it had nothing to do with the agency's security distribution plan.

The agency also decided against spot market purchases during the Iran-Iraq war and the use of existing oil reserves. Proposals to be submitted to the ministerial meeting to convene at the beginning of December concerning oil imports for 1981 and consumption and reserves strategy were also determined during yesterday's meeting.

ONE TERRORIST KILLED, OTHERS CAPTURED IN ANTALYA

TA191830 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Oct 80

[Text] Gendarmes shot to death one terrorist and captured another one in Antalya. Both were being sought for killing three people and for their involvement in various robberies and anarchistic incidents. According to an announcement from the press and public relations department of the Antalya Martial Law Deputy Command, the gendarmes and the terrorists engaged in an armed clash in Antalya 2 days ago. Ahmet Yuksel was shot to death and Recep Unveren was captured. The terrorists were carrying 3 guns, 3 clips, a pair of field glasses and 331 rounds of ammunition.

Two other terrorists captured in Antalya's Gazipasa district were carrying 5 pistols, 9 clips and 263 rounds of ammunition.

VOTCP DENOUNCES U.S.-TURKISH DEFENSE INDUSTRY AGREEMENT

TA210941 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Station commentary]

[Text Dear listeners, the Turkish-U.S. talks on the establishment of a war industry included in the bilateral slavery agreement have ended in Ankara. A statement issued at the end of the meetings said that agreement was reached on seven projects including problems such as the production of explosives and various types of missiles and the modernization of tanks and aircraft.

The military junta, which has approved Pentagon plans for a war industry in Turkey, has announced that the seven projects will be financed by the United States and that this foreign financing will amount to $300 to 400 million. Furthermore, it is reported that the financing will be based on Pentagon formulas and plans.

Dear listeners, it is not too early to guess the formulas to be submitted by the Pentagon because such plans have already been prepared in Washington. In an article on 27 September, Orsan Oymen referred to a meeting held at the U.S. State Department and to these plans. Turkey's strategic role in the Middle East within the framework of the bilateral slavery agreement was discussed at the meeting. Dangerous moves such as the use of U.S. bases on Turkish territory for NATO goals and the expansion of the former NATO sphere on influence to include the oil region in the Middle East were also discussed at that meeting.

Even then the Pentagon had insisted that Turkey assume new responsibilities in the Middle East in exchange for the establishment of the war industry requested by the junta and the financing of related projects. U.S. State Department experts expressed this view as follows: Turkey should be ready to assume more responsibilities in the Middle East in order to obtain more loans. In his article published in HURRIYET on 6 October, Oktay Eksi referred to these facts. As we stated earlier, the U.S. imperialists are open on the issue. They tell the junta: We will extend money to you, and you will be our gendarme in the Middle East. The junta has expressed its readiness to become the gendarme of imperialism to obtain a few dollars from imperialist money establishments.

Negotiations in Ankara for the establishment of a war industry within the framework of the bilateral slavery agreement confirm these facts. Attempts by the junta to establish a war industry are tantamount to a step-by-step implementation of the bilateral slavery agreement, which the Demirel government did not dare ratify in the assemblies because of the determined opposition of the anti-imperialist forces. The junta, backed by U.S. imperialism and NATO, is trying to bully the people with bayonets. The junta is trying to channel the collapsing economy into the war field and to set it on militarist rails. Furthermore, the military junta is telling tales about tank exports once a war industry is established. Who is to believe these tank export tales by those who are incapable of exporting our traditional agricultural products?

The step-by-step implementation of the bilateral slavery agreement signed with the United States is tantamount to Turkey's involvement in imperialist adventures in the Middle East. During the U.S. military adventure against Iran, Washington made extensive use of its military bases on our territory, based on the articles of the bilateral slavery agreement. The Carter Administration, which is trying to profit from the war between Iran and Iraq, is now allocating new duties to Turkey in its Middle East plans. While stating that the United States is ready to intervene in the oilfields, the Carter Administration is constantly reminding the junta of Turkey's strategic role in the region.

Dear listeners, all these developments show that in the hands of the junta the bilateral slavery agreement constitutes a greater danger to regional peace and security. Therefore, the unity of all patriotic forces against the junta, which is a tool of the imperialist plot, has become more urgent.

Last year, only 70,000 tons of Austrian grain were exported to Poland. This year, 240,000 tons of wheat, 60,000 tons of rye and 5,000 tons of durum wheat will be supplied by Austria, worth in terms of domestic prices 1.04 billion schillings, and in terms of world market prices 834 million schillings. LE SOIR REPORT ON PROSPECTS FOR NEW GOVERNMENT

[Jacques Van Solinge report: "Martens IV TAkes Off: Fasten Your Seat Belts!"]

[Excerpts] Mr Wilfried Martens is about to move on to his fourth stint as prime minister since arriving at 16 Rue de la Loi in April 1979. He will now turn to the job of forming his team. The task may not be as easy as some optimists from the previous government think--optimists who can only foresee most portfolios remaining the same.

As all the indications suggested, the next Belgian Government will be composed of the Socialists and Social Christians alone, in other words 140 out of 212 seats in the Chamber and 125 out of 181 in the Senate. Therefore the country's two big political families are once more face to face with each other. It was around 0400 hours that the Christian People's Party (CVP], the Socialist Party French [PSB] and Flemish [BSP] wings and the Social Christian Party [PSC] finally reached agreement.

The main protagonists, obviously desperately tired, restricted themselves to a few laconic remarks.

PSC President Paul Vanden Boeynants said: "It would be untrue to tell you that there were no problems. However, we have reached an honorable and realistic compromise."

BSP President Karel Van Miert said: "I believe that our agreement is a valid basis for a government."

PSB President Andre Cools said: "There is never any justification for being completely satisfied, because no agreement is ever perfect."

Wilfried Martens, prime minister-designate and virtually prime minister, said: "I have the honor and pleasure to announce that we have reached an agreement on the formation of a government program. We have agreed on an ambitious program. I hope that after Sunday's congress the government will be able to start work in good conditions and that it will last until 1983."

The negotiation's participants did not say much about the final terms of the agreement, which is to be presented to the two houses of parliament next Wednesday. It was understood that all the details on the pact reached between Social Christians and Socialists would be revealed at 1600 this Thursday.

It is the last few hundred meters which seem longest to a long-distance runner. The same is true of political negotiations, especially if these negotiations are between interlocutors who, like the CVP, PSC, and PSB and BSP, are so used to having to compromise that they no longer know whether they should embrace or throw mud at each other.

NUCLEAR FUEL--Imatran Voima [state power company] has almost completed the talks concerning the transport of the used fuel of the Loviisa-1 nuclear power station to the Soviet Union. The talks which have been conducted in Leningrad for the whole of last week have progressed so far that only some matters connected with the technical responsibility for the transport have not yet been agreed on, according to Imatran Voima. The agreement will be signed in the first half of next year. An agreement on the return of the used fuel was reached in principle with the Soviet Atomenergeksport when the Loviisa nuclear plant was purchased. According to the plans, the first consignment of used fuel from Loviisa-1 will be transported by rail to the Soviet Union towards the end of next year. The nuclear waste transports of the Loviisa-2 plant, which is now becoming operative, will become of topical interest in 4 years' time, according to Imatran Voima. MADRID RADIO ON U.S.-SOVIET DISPUTE OVER EC CSCE PROPOSAL

[Text] New differences have arisen between the United States and the Soviet Union in the discussions at the preparatory meeting for the Madrid conference. This time the disagreement between the two superpowers involves the proposal introduced yesterday by Luxembourg on behalf of the EC countries and Portugal. While the United States, through its delegation head, Kampelman, said that this document was a good contribution to the work of the conference, the Soviet side issued a note describing the proposal as negative.

The Soviet comment said that the document introduced by the Community countries and Portugal unfortunately does not advance matters and has nothing to do with the main matters under consideration at the preparatory meeting. An American spokesman described the Soviet response as very negative and as a harsh attack on the Portuguese and EC countries' initiative.

GOVERNMENT REJECTS GDR PROTEST ON TV PROGRAMMING

LD222222 Hamburg DPA in German 2032 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 22 Oct (DPA)--A spokesman of the Federal Government confirmed on Wednesday evening that the GDR has protested to the chancellor's office against the planned extension of the joint morning program of the ARD and ZDF television companies. The Federal Government has, according to the spokesman, rejected the protest.

Networks Surprised by GDR Reaction

LD222010 Hamburg DPA in German 1912 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Excerpts] Berlin, 22 Oct (DPA)--According to the GDR ADN agency the GDR on Wednesday protested to the Bonn chancellor's office "against renewed attempts to interfere in the GDR from the FRG side."

The actions referred to by ADN are likely to be the announced transmission of the morning programs over all transmitters from 1 January 1981. Since the joint morning program put out by ARD and ZDF has for years been carried by all transmitters close to the border and can be received in the GDR, ARD and ZDF reportedly were at a loss to understand the sharp GDR reaction. The switch mainly concerns television viewers in the Federal Republic who cannot at present receive the morning program.

DIE WELT NOTES BLOC INTEREST IN ECONOMIC ESPIONAGE

DW221102 Bonn DIE WELT in German 22 Oct 80 p 6

[Commentary signed W.K.: "Tilisser's Heirs"]

[Text] Economic and scientific espionage by the Soviet intelligence service has a tradition. Largely unknown in the West, Petersburg Bolshevik Meyer Tilisser, a revolutionary comrade of Lenin, received instructions in 1922 to organize scouting Western research and industrial production including all technical know-how.

The increase in the number of those involved indicates to German security authorities the significance economic espionage has gained since then. New counterintelligence methods have exposed numerous Eastern spies lately. It was reported yesterday that the counterintelligence service succeeded in arresting three illegally infiltrated agent recruiters for the "GDR" intelligence service alone over the past weekend. A few days earlier the office for the protection of the constitution had exposed four industrial spies.

Not everything the East steals can be turned to direct economic advantage; there are precision equipment and microapparatuses which cannot be copied in the state enterprises. But enough is lost so that experts estimate that the damage runs into hundreds of millions a year for the Federal Republic alone. Not only loss of license fees are involved, but also loss of business--for instance, if the East throws a product, albeit badly manufactured, onto the market at dumping prices but ahead of the competition. Be it out of concern for "labor peace" or fear of "snooping" charges or whatever--many factories still do not take the Guillaumes [convicted GDR spy] blueprint seriously enough. And it is not just to their detriment that this happens.

GISCARD RETURNS FROM PRC, SAYS OBJECTIVES OF TRIP ACHIEVED

NC221043 Paris AFP in English 1023 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 22 Oct (AFP)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing returned here today from an official week-long visit to China, and said he had achieved his three main objectives. These were developing top-level relations between French and Chinese officials in view of China's increasing role in world affairs, promoting trade between the two countries, and encouraging scientific and cultural exchanges, he said in an airport statement.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing met many leading Chinese in Beijing, notably the force behind China's current modernization drive, party Vice-Chairman Deng Xiaoping. He also toured several provincial towns, attending the opening of the first French consulate-general in China in the eastern industrial city of Shanghai. In addition, Mr Giscard d'Estaing paid a two-day private visit to the Tibetan capital Lhasa, becoming the first Western leader to do so since before World War II.

DEFENSE MINISTRY ON PARTICIPATION IN ALLIED GULF NAVAL PRESENCE

[Jacques Isnard report: "Allied Navies Have Held Technical Consultations on Oil Traffic Security"]

[Text] Technical consultations at the local headquarters level have taken place among the allied navies in the Gulf and the Indian Ocean during the Iranian-Iraqi conflict to forestall any possible threats to oil traffic. A reliable Defense Ministry source admitted this in Paris after the decision to strengthen the French fleet in the area by sending the missile-launching submarine Suffren and the fleet escort vessel Amiral-Charner.

These exchanges of information in the field relate to the movements of ships and the preparation of crisis plans to meet the various possibilities raised by the development of the situation. Bilateral exchanges of information are taking place between the United States and France, the United States and Britain and the United States and Australia. However, there is no permanent coordination body at the political level since France cannot, for instance, agree to set up a Western naval force in the Indian Ocean, the Gulf of Oman or the Gulf which would resemble NATO's multinational "task forces" in other maritime zones.

In this region the United States is principally maintaining two aircraft carriers accompanied by their escort vessels and support ships, an amphibious group including Marines not to mention the four Boeing-747 AWACS aircraft based in Saudi Arabia but covering a very wide area thanks to their long-distance electronic listening and command systems. Britain is planning to send two more ships to the region at the end of this month and they will be added to the two missile-launching escort vessels already present.

The Defense Ministry stresses the fact that the French fleet, of which four or five are already cruising permanently not far from the Gulf of Oman, are in this region for the protection of merchant vessels under the national flag and to ensure the security of oil supplies. Around 60 percent of European oil passes through the Strait of Hormuz which separates the Persian Gulf from the Gulf of Oman.

Despite this technical cooperation only last week the French naval command--the local commander is Rear Adm Philippe Lejeune--complained that the United States is not always giving prior warning of the movements of some of its ships.

These incidents are making the British think that if, by misfortune, it was necessary to mount a large-scale emergency inter-allied operation, the enterprise would experience difficulties in the first few hours, especially since such an operation could only be successfully carried out if a request for intervention were first made to the Western navies by one of the countries in the region.

AGREEMENT ON EQUIPPING AND TRAINING SAUDI NAVY CONCLUDED

LD230931 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Oct 80 p 16

[Jacques Isnard article: "France Will Supply Six Warships and Dauphin Helicopters Armed With Antiship Missiles to Saudi Arabia"]

[Text] In the face of a relative stagnation in the sales of arms abroad at the beginning of 1980, Mr Hibon forecast last February that the current year would be either a "navy blue year" or a total loss. This was a reference to the fact that an increase in expected orders for naval equipment from several Near East countries was to make up for an observed drop in the sales of ground and air weapons. At that time, three countries were especially interested: Iraq, Qatar and Saudi Arabia, which wanted to strengthen their navies by diversifying their suppliers.

While negotiations with Baghdad have been continuing, France has brought to a satisfactory conclusion, despite keen competition from Italy, its talks with Qatar and Saudi Arabia.

The agreement with Qatar, concluded in September, provides for the delivery of three "Combattante" type patrol vessels equipped with Exocet surface-to-surface missiles with range exceeding 40 km.

With Saudi Arabia the contract is much more ambitious since it provides for the supply to Riyadh of a "held in hand navy," an expression similar to that of "keys in hand plant." The Paris-Riyadh agreement, which is worth Fr14.4 billion (with fixed and final prices, whereas the contract with Qatar, which amounts to Fr1.5 billion, provides for a revision of prices according to inflation) and which is to be extended over 4 years, not only provides for a delivery of warships but also stipulates that the French Navy will train Saudi personnel and, initially, give logistic support.

It is mainly a question of France supplying four 2,000-ton frigates and two squadron replenishment tankers comparable to the Durance, which displaces 17,000 tons fully loaded.

The Saudi frigates will be armed with Otomat surface-to-surface missiles (whose range is some 160 km) produced by a private company--Matra. Furthermore, Saudi Arabia has decided to purchase from the National Aerospace Industrial Company [SNIAS] some Dauphin helicopters armed with AS-15 antiship missiles developed by the same company. AS-15 missiles, whose range exceeds 15 km, are all-weather light missiles designed to attack surface targets of any tonnage from such slow-moving launchers as helicopters for instance. In this case, Dauphin helicopters have an additional advantage: They can be used for detecting and identifying targets for ships equipped with Otomat missiles and for retargeting these missiles in flight.

Political Will

Five of the Saudi ships will be built in private Mediterranean shipyards and the sixth in a state arsenal. This naval program, whose code name is "Sawari," should provide 8.4 million hours' work for the shipyards concerned, to which must be added 1 million hours' research time and some 10 million hours' work for the French companies concerned (SNIAS, Matra and Thomson PCFS) as a whole.

A service company called NAFCO will be formed under French Navy control to help the Saudi Navy, which is now only 1,000 men strong. It will be responsible for personnel training either in France or locally and for logistic support. The French Navy will be given the task of training several hundred Saudis and will send several dozen specialists to Saudi Arabia.

It is believed at the Defense Ministry that the Riyadh agreement is a token of Saudi Arabia's political will to further intensify its military cooperation with Paris.

The Saudis have already purchased from France ground equipment (light and medium tanks, 155 mm howitzers, antitank helicopters and Crotale antiaircraft missiles) worth some Fr12 billion (including 3 billion for technical assistance).

The financial rewards of cooperation with the navy are more or less equal to those in the land sphere.

These negotiations, which were started when Yvon Bourges was defense minister, can be traced back to the relations regularly maintained with Riyadh by the International Affairs Directorate (LE MONDE note: The International Affairs Directorate, which has been managed for the past 3 years by Gerard Hibon, who was previously foreign affairs adviser in Mr Bourges' office when Mr Bourges was defense minister, employs 80 civilian administrators, armament engineers and officers. Arms exports, which provide employment for 100,000 workers in the arms industry, represent on average in terms of deliveries some 5 percent of France's total exports and 20 percent of the exports of equipment goods) and to the recently initiated cooperation between the Navy General Staff and the Navy Constructions Technical Directorate (DTCN), which comes under the general delegation for armaments.

It would even be possible to take the view that, without the willing support for this operation of the national Navy General Staff, the Saudi contract would ultimately not have been so big. In fact, the French Navy has not purchased any Otomat missiles for its own use, and this domestic market reference is often required by foreign customers who hope in this way to benefit from a guarantee or a label (LE MONDE note: Saudi Arabia has become the sixth foreign purchaser of Otomat missiles; a total of 450 such missiles have now been sold). However, in response to wishes expressed by the Matra company, the national navy agreed to install Otomat missiles on board the escort vessel Le Basque with a view to testing these missiles.

Furthermore, the French naval presence in Djibouti, the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean has provided an indirect opportunity for French equipment demonstration tours for the benefit of certain customers in that part of the world.

As a result, France has been able to supply coastal defense batteries with Otomat missiles to Egypt and Libya, and Exocet surface-to-surface missiles to Oman and Abu Dhabi in the Gulf. Negotiations have also taken place with a view to supplying some Exocet missiles to Bahrain and Kuwait.

L'HUMANITE HITS 'ANTI-SOVIET' GISCARD REMARKS IN PRC

[Yves Moreau editorial: "France's Self-Effacement"]

[Text] The first few days of Mr Giscard d'Estaing's visit to China have provided food for significant comment. For instance, Hersant's LE FIGARO and the Socialist LE MATIN, more in unison than ever, carried similar headlines yesterday. "Beijing: Europe Is in Danger," LE FIGARO wrote. And LE MATIN: "The Chinese to Giscard: Beware of the Russians."

LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS above all welcomed the remarks made by the French head of state: "At last, tough talking," it wrote ecstatically, and it added: "The Beijing statements morally redeem the trip to Warsaw."

Are these newspapers exaggerating? Not really. It is true that, looking beyond their stylistic precautions, Giscard d'Estaing and Chinese Prime Minister Zhao Ziyang are voicing identical ideas: We see the same overdramatization of the international situation, the same anti-Vietnamese allusions to Kampuchea and anti-Soviet allusions to Afghanistan. The French president's remarks reflect a hostility scarcely less openly avowed than that of his hosts. Finally we see the same emphasis on European integration.

However, the Elysean eloquence, much more than the Chinese, is aimed at disguising the root of the matter under a pile of words. This is the aim of the Giscardian couplets pretending to deplore "Europe's self-effacement" and to advocate "a multipolar world avoiding bloc confrontation."

Indeed we know that the present government's whole policy looks toward Bonn, in other words toward Washington's main vassal. Indeed the Elysee only views "Europe's assertion"--this is the term which Mr Giscard d'Estaing preferred to independence in Beijing--in the framework of Atlanticism.

He is therefore constantly intensifying Europe's and France's self-effacement. Multipolarity brandished by the architects of this real national resignation is merely a snare.

For those who refuse to be ensnared, there are what Giscard d'Estaing himself called "convergent concerns" between the Paris and Beijing governments.

They relate in particular to the alleged Soviet "threat"--a bugaboo which Zhao Ziyang brandished not without finding an echo from his visitor, to the great satisfaction of all those who are trying to justify reviving the arms race.

The ostracism which refused socialist China recognition of its international rights for a long time was scandalous, but for a visit like Mr Giscard d'Estaing's visit to China to have negative aspects is equally lamentable.

A different policy would have an entirely different view of Franco-Chinese cooperation--a constructive view in keeping with the great role which France could play in a world which is changing in the right direction. This role is defined by Georges Marchais in Hope for the Present, closely connecting the struggle for peace and disarmament with the struggle to overcome the blocs and to work to build a new international order.

By restoring our country's authority this new policy, unlike Giscard's approach, would have a fruitful significance for Franco-Chinese friendship.

PS' ROCARD ISSUES STATEMENT ON INTENTION TO RUN FOR PRESIDENCY

LD221717 Paris LE MATIN in French 20 Oct 80 p 2

["Text" of statement made by French Socialist Party National Secretary Michel Rocard at Conflans-Sainte-Honorine on 19 October: "I Have Decided To Propose to Socialists That I Become Their Candidate"]

[Text] In 6 months' time you will elect a new president of the republic. It will be a very important election for all of us, men and women, and for our country since it will commit us for 7 years. Furthermore, it will be the first time since the head of state has been elected by universal suffrage that this election will be held in the same way as in other great democracies. We will have enough time to take stock of the results achieved by the outgoing president and jointly determine the objectives which we would like our country to pursue. It will also be an important stage for our institutions' stability because we will see whether they really provide for alternation. That is democracy. I have decided here at Conflans-Sainte-Honorine today to propose to Socialists that I become their candidate for the presidency of the republic.

Why today? Because the Socialist Party is a democratic party all of whose members vote to nominate their candidate and because this nomination procedure is starting today. Therefore, the time has come both for Socialists and public opinion as a whole to learn exactly and unequivocally where they stand. Consequently the time has come for any candidate to declare himself since determination is a precondition for success.

Therefore my Socialist federation--the Yvelines federation--is being asked to consider the matter and put forward my candidacy in accordance with our rules and my commitments.

Seven years ago Mr Giscard d'Estaing promised us change without risks. And the world has changed, but it has changed without France. And France has changed, but it has changed without the French people. Where change could have led to increased prosperity, longer leisure time and better understanding among people, the French people have only come up against unemployment, a deterioration in their living standards and the decaying of their communes and regions. The most underprivileged people's meager security guarantees have been eroded whereas powerful people have been able to pay for their medical treatment and their kind of justice. It is also a serious matter that this inability to foresee and organize the future has gone hand in hand with the abandonment of the role which a great past mapped out for our country.

France is not merely a diplomatic, military and economic power. France also carried a 200-year old message proclaiming freedom, equality and fraternity. What I, a Socialist, propose to the French people is that France of the eighties should put new life into this message by building a socialism of freedom, justice and responsibility, a socialism of self-management.

I propose to the French people that we jointly achieve power in order to jointly become France's rulers--workers in their enterprises, citizens in their communes and regions in the state.

I propose to eradicate the profound inequalities which corrode and dishonor our society. I propose to make use of people's intelligence and determination with a view to creating employment through the development of new activities and a more effective division of work which has become scarce. This must be a major objective of a contractual and decentralized planning.

I propose that the French people learn to live together, better than now, and that negotiations, agreements and contracts determine our income and working conditions and facilitate our daily life. I propose that in the face of the two big blocs, increasing dangers and the Third World's drama, France's action in Europe and the world become clearer, firmer and more generous and independent in order to create new bonds of solidarity and new balances.

Only fear of the future has kept the present president and the forces which he represents in power.

I call on all Socialists to rally round our first secretary. For the past 9 years Francois Mitterrand has been able to keep us together. Tomorrow, as leader of the party, he will again be able to point to the path to be followed. For my part, I will assume in full the responsibilities which my decision to ask for the French people's confidence implies.

I call on these generations of men and women who have done their best for the past 30 years without seeing their hopes fulfilled to implement the Socialists' great plan which the workers movement's and the social forces' action has already outlined. In view of the fact that we are passing through difficult times and must preserve the existing fragile area of democracy and freedom, I appeal to all of you, men and women, neither to fear the future nor to accept defeat as unavoidable but, on the contrary, to release imaginative energies which alone can ensure both our security and change. I feel confident we will do this together.

FORLANI PRESENTS 'PROGRAM OF GOVERNMENT' TO PARLIAMENT

LD222346 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Report by Angelo Haber]

[Text] Prime Minister Forlani has just finished presenting his program of government to the Chamber of Deputies. His speech was received with warm applause from representatives of the four coalition parties. Here are the final words of the Prime Minister: [Begin Forlani recording] These, dear colleagues, are the considerations which induce the government to ask for your vote of confidence. Concluding this presentation of the new government to the chambers of Parliament, in view of what has been said and the commitments undertaken, it is natural that the thoughts should go on your behalf and on mine to all those who, whether members of the armed forces or civilians, serve our country at the points which are most exposed and where dedication and sacrifice are most required; to all citizens who, despite the difficulties, have not given up believing in Italy and in its future. [end recording]

The program set out by Forlani was a summary of commitments concerning administrative, economic and foreign policy. The background to the work of the government was defined by Forlani as a dark period, with a high rate of risk, especially in the international field. Much time was given to the problems of the administration of justice and the defense of law and order, with particular reference to the struggle against terrorism, organized crime and the Mafia. On 30 April of next year, Forlani said, the new code of penal procedure must be issued; meanwhile timely measures must be adopted regarding alternatives to prison sentences, and the new pay scale for the judiciary. Forlani referred to the need to carry out judicial reforms, prison reforms, to modernize the civil and penal laws, and to implement to the full the reform of the forces of law and order. Finally, he reaffirmed the commitment regarded as urgent by this government--as by the previous ones--to reorganize the Prime Minister's office and to reform the Civil Service.

Forlani was very detailed in his statement on the relations between the central government and the local autonomous administrations. He stressed the need to conclude negotiations on the Concordat and to regulate information, first of all through the new bill on the reform of publishing and norms for private radio and tv stations.

Economy: This undoubtedly is the point on which the country must concentrate its attention and efforts--from the energy problems which require economy measures from all citizens and investments for alternative sources, to the tough battle against inflation which will create a burden for all individual citizens and for the economy of the whole community. Despite the existing margins of uncertainty due to variations in the price of oil and the exchange rate of the main currencies, there are, according to Forlani, sufficient possibilities for success, as proved by the positive data which emerge from a negative general picture. "We are not," Forlani said, "A community sitting inert awaiting the point of zero growth." According to the government, the conditions for success are strict control of currency exchanges and containment of all internal source of inflation, an inflation which is accentuated by the upward growth of individual wages. Forlani did not neglect a problem which is of special interest to the Radical Party--that of the handicapped, and he made a number of pledges. As for pensions, he said gradual steps must be taken for a redistribution of funds to benefit the weakest sectors.

Forlani dealt in depth with that part of his program which concerns foreign policy, indicating all points of crisis and possibilities of positive intervention. One of these is undoubtedly the problem of missiles in Europe. In this respect, Forlani said Italy will strive for the success of the present negotiations in Geneva.

There remains the political situation which the government intends to determine through its own activity. "We want to be measured by the facts and we also wish to measure others by the facts," Forlani said. It is to the country's general advantage to seek a serious and coherent relationship which would allow us to achieve, notwithstanding everyone's different roles, convergent and coresponsible commitments toward the necessary goal of greater national cohesion. Forlani called for a favorable vote from the Liberals, and referring to the opposition, he said the government's attitude will follow the criteria of respect and will for a dialogue.

The debate will begin tomorrow and will be concluded in the Chamber of Deputies on Saturday morning with the deputies' vote. The debate on the Senate will begin on Monday 27 October.

CRAXI ASKS 'GUARANTEES' BEFORE RENEWING PSI'S COMMITMENT

LD221451 Rome AVANTI in Italian 4 Oct 80 pp 2-3

["Text" of PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi report at 3 October Central Committee meeting in Rome: "Craxi's Report"]

[Excerpts] The thing that strikes me most about the first steps taken during his government crisis is a certain tendency to underestimate its seriousness, a certain irresponsibility in the apparent effort to identify and seek a formula as an element for resolving a crisis which is the result of many negative factors and many contradictions that have accumulated during the course of time. Though normally an optimist, I will not conceal the fact that at the moment I am somewhat pessimistic about the possibility of providing a satisfactory solution to the crisis--satisfactory to everyone, not just to the DC.

There has been an accumulation of many negative factors, which we can identify by briefly reviewing both the events of the past few days and the history of the past few months. This is the history of what L'UNITA this morning calls a "monster," which has disappeared without prompting regrets, namely the government with strong socialist representation which some months ago shouldered the responsibility of tackling first the political vacuum and then the crisis factors and then guaranteeing a minimum of governability.

Naturally, one must never oversimplify matters: Several different factors can affect a secret ballot. First, there can be an atmosphere that encourages defections, there can be errors, there can be what we might call personal reaons, and there are the political reasons. To tell the truth I understand them only in part. Because if it was a matter of removing the Cossiga government, then there was no problem, inasmuch as it was known that the government set itself a limited role and, therefore, that when various conditions were satisfied it would be possible to analyze a new situation. It was probably a question of economic interests, economic interests that were considered to have been harmed. This is an analysis that must be carried out rather more carefully to discover whether any group had a particular interest in exerting pressure on Parliament and on what we might call diversely-motivated [eterodiretti] elements in order to accelerate the government's downfall. Be that as it may, it seemed to me an act of real political stupidity and, from the institutional viewpoint, a further blow to the credibility of the system. The operation stemmed mainly from the DC, which provided the majority of the rebel votes, an area which should probably be deemed larger than it seems.

Those who associated themselves with this operation are not instruments of the PCI, as is being claimed and as Berlinguer believes, but instruments of the DC's internal struggles, and the operation is only really logical in relation to the DC's own problems. We are therefore dealing with a crisis that is difficult to resolve because relations have stiffened even further in a poisoned political atmosphere. The past months should have been used to create the conditions for an evolution of and progress beyond the present framework. This work has not been carried out. There is a new state of mistrust among the parties. I believe that the first issue that we must raise and that must concern us is the issue of guarantees.

Following consultations, we will assess whether the proposals made to us contain elements of guarantee which we consider sufficient for us to renew the party's commitment--guarantees regarding the repetition of episodes of this kind, guarantees regarding balances, guarantees of political conduct, in a socioeconomic situation of crisis which is also developing in a context of increased rigidity and extremely problematical tensions; and guarantees of governability extending beyond mere totals of parliamentary votes.

We could not have failed to postpone the congress. There was very little time left. I believe that we could now hold the congress at the usual time in March, so we can begin all preliminary work for the congress in January. A number of provincial and all, or almost all, the regional congresses must be held, so by the usual time in March we should be able to hold the national congress. It's an ill wind that blows no good. The postponement will enable us to secure further political data and a more complete political picture; perhaps we will be able to assess whether the situation is stabilizing and in which direction it might evolve.

I am thinking about the solution of the political problem of the legislative term. Unlike all other European democracies (excepting Belgium and perhaps the Netherlands) we are a country which, instead of guaranteeing the executive 4, 5 or even 7 years of life, forms a different government every year and now even every 6 months. Nevertheless, a debate must begin in an attempt at least to improve stability. The eighth legislative term has another 4 years to run. It has only just started and this is already the third attempt. Obviously since we have to enter such a difficult phase, we cannot leave the party's situation as it is. For some time the party leadership has been in a state of anguish. There exists a situation which nobody, including myself, can be asked to endure. The Central Committee can now--as it had in any case hoped to in accordance with a decision taken some months ago--elect a new Directorate and examine the issue of a collegial Secretariat or executive body. It is necessary, as we have already said and declared, to surmount the so-called diarchy that is now working and has long been damaging. There must be no dramas, no dramatization of the decisions that have to be taken, in accordance with democratic rules and full respect for the representational rights of all political groups and tendencies which aspire to be represented within the party's political leadership. No challenges regarding legitimacy must be raised, because they would be unfounded, since there is in any case very broad consensus within the Central Committee and I am justified in believing that there is even broader consensus in the party's grass roots. In this way, we can proceed to the election of a new Directorate. Then we will deal with the political problems connected with resolving the crisis and the problems regarding our approach to the congress, and we shall see what are the possibile terms of an internal situation, politically united or convergent on certain essential points, on what is to be done. A dialectic in any case cannot fail to be strengthened through the comparison of lines and stances between majority and minority.

I can understand the emergence of apprehensions and the increase in obstacles raised by others in connection with our growth and the expectations created in the country. I cannot understand those within the party who are so obsessed by their splittist attitude as to hope not for the party's victories but for its defeats, not for progress but stagnation. Be that as it may, even in a very difficult situation we must continue along a straight path. It is possible to stumble even on a straight path, but having picked ourselves up we must continue along the same path. The party must be aware that it has before it a great future which is valid not just for some of us or even just for all of us, but our country's democracy and labor world. We ask for a mandate not to subject the party to submissive concessions, which we will not make, but to prepare ourselves better for even the harshest battles. I am asking that this mandate to tackle the crisis be entrusted to the party's new Directorate.

SIGNORILE URGES PSI TO HAVE 'POSITIVE' RELATIONS WITH PCI

LD220943 Rome AVANTI in Italian 5-6 Oct 80 p 18

[Article by former PSI Deputy Secretary Claudio Signorile: "Political Reasons for Disagreement Among Socialists"]

[Text] The PSI Central Committee meeting [on 3 October] formally marked the end of a political cooperation which had already been in a state of crisis for several months and which was its most effective at the Turin congress and in the subsequent management of party policy.

I said in Turin that the alliance which led to the congress majority between the left and the autonomists was not an automatic superimposition by numbers but an attempt to achieve a political and cultural synthesis between two historical components of the PSI's life, by extricating autonomy from the danger of lapsing into socialist arrogance and therefore stubbornness and by extricating the alternative from the PCI's domination and therefore the danger of a tendency toward forming a leftwing front or of a utopian attitude.

The synthesis achieved in Turin made autonomy and the alternative the essential aspects of a political strategy destined to leave its mark on Italian society, emphasizing and strengthening the PSI's leading role, its political centrality in a democracy socially ready for rotational solutions but politically incapable of creating the historical forms and political and institutional tools for it.

It was an ambitious and long-term plan which in my opinion is still valid and in relation to which we must assess our present options and conduct. But what tasks and what kind of role is the PSI setting itself now, in line with the Turin policy and strategy? At its 41st congress the PSI opted for the socialist blueprint for the alternative, as the permanent characteristic of its presence within Italian society, and the quest for effective solidarity among the democratic parties, as an immediate answer to a crisis situation that was squeezing the country. It was the time of the two-way dialogue between the DC and PCI, of a bipolarism that seemed to be affecting and involving the whole of Italian society, setting an artificial associative and arbitrational arrangement against its natural social and political pluralism. In other words it was necessary to reopen the way to a broader and freer political dialectic, thus preventing some of the country's vital energies from being restrained and stifled. [paragraph continues]

It was inevitable that the Socialists would act to create a breakthrough, and they did so—admittedly sometimes with excessive energy and determination and with an exaggerated assessment of the danger of a stable bipolar DC-PCI relationship—by seeking allies and using the Radicals' electoral backing, as they did at the latest elections, but nevertheless basically getting results and regaining for the PSI a real space—not subordinate or conceded—in society and the political system.

The task involved rebuilding not only the PSI's image but also its capacity for political struggle, its links with sectors of society open to regenerating political balances that seemed untouchable; it involved reinvigorating the links with a culture that felt restless and nervous because it was deprived of specific outlets in its permanent striving toward specific values and of regeneration.

The party was essentially united in this task, with the normal variety of opinions that could always be reconciled through political syntheses. Not everything that was proposed was achieved, but some things certainly do constitute a positive reality which we can look at calmly.

The political cooperation which I mentioned entered a state of crisis in the second phase of this plan, which began when the rebuilding of the PSI's autonomous and original role finally became a irreversible reality. The problems that emerged gradually proved to be such as to affect strategic and not merely tactical issues, thus concerning immediate decisions on distant objectives. What is the aim of the political scope and important autonomous role that the PSI as a whole has earned itself in the 3 years since the Turin congress? Obviously the answer cannot lie in governability, the just political method of a mature left aware of the country's problems, but certainly not a political or strategic objective. The Socialist premiership, an important factor in the regeneration of our democracy, is the result of a political process that must be pursued methodically through specific alliances rather than an objective to which to subordinate a strategy. The very desire, confirmed by the PSI secretary, to become stronger and stronger is a correct and natural aspiration which justifies sacrifices and struggles, but it is not in itself an answer to the party's political and strategic aims.

The answer consistent with the Turin congress lies in building a democratic alternative by altering the balance of forces on the left and through closer relations with the secular and Catholic progressive sectors. But the Italian political situation exhibits great interdependence among the parties. In fact it works as a system whose balances are continually being challenged and made stable again by the mutual influence of its components. Therefore everything must be appropriately influenced and set in motion by the Socialist's initiative.

Now the DC is showing signs of reconsidering the validity and effectiveness of the Preamble Group's options; the PCI seems to be assessing the possibility of moving from diametric and entrenched opposition to a more flexible and open form of opposition aimed at really building democratic solidarity and supported by a modification of its strategic platform of a "historical compromise"; and even the secular and progressive democratic parties are now working within the political order in which they are surmounting anticommunist prejudice to resist the centrist temptation.

The Socialists must form an immediate assessment of the country's situation and of relations among the political forces and consider the following basic question: Whether to continue with a strategy of breaking through or whether to shoulder (with the objective of the alternative) a task of rebuilding and strengthening Itanian society's civic and political fabric, involving all the democratic forces.

There is a profound difference of views on this in the party, regarding both analysis and policy pointers. To continue with the breakthrough line means stiffening the entire system of political relations, isolating the PSI, placing it in a context of unease characterized by the proximity of the Radicals, and effectively making it a factor of instability in a phase of the country's life when thrusts toward reason and constructive commitment should prevail.

For the PSI to undertake, from a reestablished position of strength, an aware and active policy of alliance, guaranteeing the resumption of relations of solidarity and cooperation among the democratic parties, means shouldering a dynamic and responsible role--not hegemonic but fundamental. This is the argument behind socialist centrality as centrality of function and role within Iralian democracy: Centrality of function is building a democracy of rotation; centrality of role in transferring social forces and areas of opinion from centrist influence to the reformist left, while at the same time challenging the PCI's predominance within the Italian left.

In the policy document presented on 10 August I tried, together with other comrades, to define this line and the subsequent stages that must characterize it. But decisions affect what happens every day and it is not enough to describe policy lines; they must be implemented. I believe that this strategic option should guide the PSI in its conduct during the government crisis and in tackling the unresolved issue of Parliament's role. Parliament is still the mirror of society and any harsh conflict in the country has repercussions on parliamentary relations, just as the ungovernability of Parliament has disruptive effects on the social plane. The issues are not disciplinary or organizational but clearly political and bound up with the country's real situation and must be approached as such.

In the past few days a dangerous spiral has begun, from the Fiat dispute to the situation in Parliament, escaping everyone's control, including that of the parties, trade unions, institutions and economic authorities.

The unpleasant and unnecessary affair of the snipers (rebel deputies who voted against their parties) was the final episode of an ongoing crisis that was in any case moving toward the downfall of the Cossiga government.

The reason for this downfall lay (and now lies even more) in the need to reestablish positive relations in Parliament among the democratic forces and in society among the major representatives of social interests.

The crisis (including the government crisis) must therefore be resolved in the direction of full utilization of the parliamentary institution as the place for dialogue and constructive understanding and in the deliberate quest for elements of policy which will lend substance and strength to parliamentary and government work. This must be borne in mind by the prime minister-designate.

The parties' rigidities are well known; it is difficult to surmount then, but it would be a mistake to accept them as a justification for impotence. In fact a number of clear positive possibilities can be perceived behind the confused formulations and elegant allusions:

1. It is possible, if the willingness exists, to rebuild within the parliamentary dialectic between majority and minority a constructive and collaborative rapport that will depend on the full opening of the parliamentary institutions to the opposition. I am thinking of the chairmanships of the parliamentary committees, which must again be assigned in accordance with institutional criteria;

2. It is possible for a government with an efficient and balanced structure and lucid decisions and options (I am thinking about the polemic over the corrupt allocation of posts) to establish through Parliament partial agreements with the opposition on important aspects of its activity, on appointments and on the formulation of certain planning laws;

3. It is possible for certain problems of the domestic and international crisis to form the basis of policy hypotheses in a convergence between parties that would subsequently adopt different stances in Parliament, thus preparing the ground for universally important and decisive undertakings. The parties must be urged to hold collegial consultations on the problems of prime national interest that the prime minister-designate finds on the government's agenda.

The present situation is leading to an accentuation of Parliament's importance as a political and institutional forum through which to resolve a serious and complex crisis. To talk about early elections is therefore a mistake and an act of political shortsightedness, because we must work instead in the opposite direction by granting the present Parliament scope for reform and prospects. On this point I believe there is an important convergence among the democratic forces. But an essential aspect, almost a turning point, in resolving this crisis is the resumption of responsible and positive relations on the left between the PSI and PCI which, without ignoring the current polemics, will direct them toward constructive solutions beneficial to the left and to democracy.

I feel the time has come to reread the 20 September 1979 joint PCI-PSI document and to acknowledge how topical it is, both in its realistic assessment of the diversity of the PCI's and PSI's roles and stances and in its definition of prospects for joint work. It is necessary to defend the PSI and its right to be very rigorous and steadfast in negotiations for the new government.

But the Socialists will earn themselves the real guarantees by extending the political framework on the left. In the dialogue and disputes on specific issues and events they carry the entire weight of the reformist left.

We must rid ourselves of the delusion that there can be mutual substitutions between Socialists and Communists. The Communists will never allow their influence in society and their parliamentary strength to be represented in the government by the Socialists. The Socialists will never delegate their choice of alignment to the PCI, thus abandoning their regained autonomy.

Cooperation between the two major leftwing forces must therefore take place in a context within which the diversity of roles and political stances is realistically accepted, not as a permanent factor but as a current factor that can be surmounted through the full implementation of a strategic blueprint of a government left.

This means seeking cooperation in forms that will guarantee the PCI the autonomous management of its strength through the instruments authorized by the democratic institutions (I am thinking in particular about parliamentary commissions, local administrations and public authorities outside the representative institutions) and that will guarantee the PCI the full use of its own characteristics, which make possible its presence in the government and in the heart of the trade unions and of the social movements. This is a necessary transition phase in building a government left which cannot be transcended either with good intentions or by the delusion of diametrically opposed forms of stubbornness.

To reflect on this is a duty for all members of the Italian left who are worried by the divergence between the PSI and PCI which lends strength to all those pursuing conservative middle-of-the-road plans to preserve the status quo.

The political crisis within the PSI, the left's transition to opposition, the party's management and the policy line which the majority seem to be espousing (at a Central Committee meeting at which numbers are of little value) conflict with the indications emerging from Italian politics. [paragraph continues]

The conviction prompts us to pursue within the party a very steadfast political battle, without dramatizing matters or adopting intransigent stances, aimed determinedly at altering a policy which we consider erroneous and which could isolate the PSI both at the center and on the periphery, thus turning it into the party of frustrated ambitions.

VATICAN: POPE ADDRESSES PILGRIMS FROM POLAND

LD211658 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1515 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] Here is what the Holy Father has said, among other things, to pilgrims from Poland:

[Begin recording] My dear ones, I want to give you an answer from my heart; (?even though I speak from a prepared text) it is a text written and dictated by the heart. You are here to represent two communities which are especially close to my heart and with which I have grown close through my own personal life--the community of Jasna Gora and that of the church of Gdansk.

I want to thank Father General for his words and for words spoken by you, Bishop. Much could be said in an effort to express all I felt in connection with your presence and in connection with the words I have heard, because in both cases words hide a very rich reality, a reality with which I have been connected and with which I continue to be connected.

And so I am grateful for the invitation to attend the great anniversary of the [word indistinct] centuries of the mother of our nation and mother of our church of Jasna Gora. I can only say that I accepted the invitation even before I heard of it [applause] and if I should express a wish in this connection, let it be this: May the years, or to be more correct barely 1 year--just more than 1 year--of preparations for that anniversary, to which the Polish Episcopate led by the primate and the church in Poland attach so much importance, pass in peace and under the sign of divine blessing, and under the motherly, watchful eye of her who has been given to us to defend our people.

And it was to her especially that I was appealing in the days and weeks during which the attention of not only Poland but also the whole of Europe, and the whole world was directed at Poland and above all at Gdansk. In those days and weeks I felt deeply linked with your Gdansk church, with your Gdansk community, and above all with [words indistinct]. I felt linked to you through the significance of events which [passage indistinct].

I am grateful for your presence here, dear fathers, dear sisters, dear brothers and sisters representing the lay Catholic community of Gdansk City and diocese, and especially you, the representatives of the world-renowned Gdansk shipyard. I wish you something for which I pray constantly: May the great effort aimed at the common good of the whole nation, at its life, justice and peace--may that effort bear its final fruit, may it bring (?forth its fruit) not only for your own community which has had in this respect a pioneering task, but for the whole community of our nation, the people of God who live on Polish soil, and I will say even more, for the peoples and nations of the whole world. This is what I wish, and this is what I constantly pray for. I want to assure you of this on the occasion of your visit.

May I ask you to convey these wishes to all compatriots, all the people of Gdansk, all my brothers and sisters, to your bishop and the entire revered church and community of Gdansk. [end recording]

PSD, CDS REITERATE SUPPORT FOR SOARES CARNEIRO CANDIDACY

[Unattributed report: "PSD Rejects Eanes' Attempt at Rapprochement With Democratic Alliance's Political Blueprint"]

[Excerpts] The Social Democratic Party [PSD] National Council "is surprised by and rejects candidate General Eanes' rapprochement with the Democratic Alliance's blueprint," states the final communique, issued yesterday, on its meeting. The Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] also held a meeting and, like the Social Democrats, once more reaffirmed its support for Soares Carneiro's presidential candidacy. That party's congress is scheduled for 20 March.

In criticizing the president of the republic's statements at his latest press conference, the PSD believes that these are "in clear contradiction with previous statements and with these candidate's entire political course, specifically the agreement with and latching onto the Socialist Party [PS] during the election campaign and the acceptance of Communist votes."

In addition, the final document emerging from the Social Democrats' Seventh National Council meeting "reaffirms the party's support for General Soares Carneiro's candidacy," and describes it as "the only one which guarantees institutional solidarity among the parliamentary majority, the government emanating from it and the president of the republic."

This candidacy, it adds, "is the only one which guarantees the establishment of a fully democratic system which will ensure the consolidation of freedoms and the continuation of a policy of social justice for all Portuguese people."

In addition to debating the presidential elections, the Social Democrats' meeting took stock of the results of the legislative elections. In this connection the communique begins by stating that "the Democratic Alliance's victory in the mainland and emigrant constituencies and the PSD's victory in the autonomous regions of the Azores and Madeira confirmed the entire Portuguese people's political maturity and high sense of responsibility."

The election results, it adds, "also confirmed the success of the conduct of the government of the republic and of the regional governments," and also "the failure of the opposition and the absence of a coherent and democratic alternative political blueprint."

CDS: "Certain Election of Soares Carneiro"

Also meeting on Saturday, the centrists' National Council approved a document entitled "the Christian Democrats' political line," which will be released on Wednesday at a press conference presided over by Freitas do Amaral. The holding of the party's fourth congress was also scheduled for 20-22 March next year.

"The certain election of Soares Carneiro in December, following the Democratic Alliance's victory in October," asserts a communique on the meeting entitled "enhancing the democratic state," "will finally make it possible to give the democratic state and its institutions the solidarity, cohesion and consistency which are preconditions for democracy's efficiency and prestige."

In addition, the CDS regards General Ramalho Eanes' recent press conference as "a simple but desperate attempt to recover lost ground and a further step toward his inevitable defeat."

The communique adds that the president of the republic "was always in opposition to the Democratic Alliance, from its formation to the 5 October elections, ranging through the proposal of a PS/PSD bloc, the Pintassilgo government, the speech at the swearing in of the sixth government, the constant link with opposition forces, the continual exercising of the pocket veto--temporary or otherwise--the permanent guerrilla warfare with the government in various areas and sectors (diplomatic changes, national defense, social conflicts, and so forth) and grave and unfounded accusations about the government's intentions, which were repeated only a few days ago."

"The belated attempt to latch onto the Democratic Alliance and to distance himself verbally from the opposition is objectively an act of juggling and of lack of political maturity," it also states.

The CDS also analyzed the results of the last elections, and emphasizes that the party "asserted itself as the only political force which has always increased its number of deputies in all legislative elections."

However, the centrists' communique stresses that in the autonomous regions "the CDS has continued unjustly to pay a high political price for the Democratic Alliance's absence from the archipelagoes," and states that "the guideline that the party's situation in the autonomous regions should be the subject of renewed attention and of immediate measures by the party leadership" was approved.

COMMUNIST PARTY ISSUES 'NOTE' ON ELECTION RESULTS

LD220901 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p 1

[Apparent text of PCP Political Commission 6 October note: "Over 1 Million Votes: 41 Deputies"]

[Text] 1--The results of the elections to the Assembly of the Republic bring new and aggravated factors of concern into the national political situation, which should, however, be confronted with confidence, firmness and determination.

2--The strengthening of the reactionary forces' parliamentary majority and the continuation of the "Democratic Alliance" government intensify the dangers concerning the Portuguese people's rights, gains and vital interests, foreshadowing the intensification and development of the "Democratic Alliance's" plans for subverting democratic and constitutional legality, with a view to eliminating the democratic system and destroying the great transformations effected in the process of the 25 April revolution.

3--The PCP emphasizes that the favorable results achieved by the "Democratic Alliance" are due largely to grave restrictions of democratic freedoms, unlawful actions, frauds and acts of coercion ascertained during the electoral process and during the voting itself. These results correspond not so much to real political gains but rather essentially to short-term social gains achieved by disguising the government's real policy, specifically through a set of demagogic measures with exclusively electioneering aims (taxes, an increase in the national minimum wage, benefits and pensions, promises of allowances for housewives, the diesel subsidy for farmers and so forth.

4--The results achieved by the "Democratic Alliance" were also considerably influenced by the scandalous and systematic use of the state apparatus for the benefit of the "Democratic Alliance" and the machine of deception, falsification and party propaganda into which the "Democratic Alliance" transformed the state-owned news media, promoting government policy and silencing the democratic forces, and with particular discriminatory anger, the PCP and the United People Alliance [APU].

5--The APU's electoral role, conducted in a situation characterized by grave factors detrimental to the democratic nature of the electoral process and with a public opinion subjected for months to the extremely strong pressure of government propaganda and deception, constitutes an inspiring assertion of popular militancy and of identification with democratic ideals and the people's interests and a highly important contribution to the defense of democracy.

The vigor and breadth of the APU's electoral role, the thorough and diversified political elucidation activity carried out and the great progress achieved in contact with the population in many areas of the country where the reactionary political bosses had hitherto prevented the expression of democratic stances, not only contained the waves of opinion which the results reflect but also represent for the near future new and rich possibilities of political and social action for the benefit of the defense and consolidation of Portuguese democracy. The PCP warmly greets the PCP members, the Portuguese democratic movement members, the thousands of independent citizens who supported the APU's campaign and all those who through their effort, generosity, enthusiasm and dedication built a great and active mass campaign to defend freedom, democracy and the Portugal of April. Despite the loss of some deputies, the election results themselves--1 million votes--confirm, even on the strictly electoral level, the PCP as an essential and decisive force for defending the interests of the people and the nation and for safeguarding and continuing the Portugal of April.

6--Despite the difficult conditions stemming from the election results, the workers and people's movement, the democratic forces and all Portuguese men and women who do not want a return to the past are capable of confronting and defeating the dangers which reaction is causing to loom over the democratic system. No election results give anybody the authority to dispute and violate democratic and constitutional legality, which all citizens and authorities, beginning with the government, remain obliged to respect.

In the new situation, dialogue and cooperation among the democratic forces and unity among all democrats and antifascists become even more of a highly cogent national imperative and an indisputable need to meet the people's aspirations for defending freedom and democracy.

7--The PCP Central Committee will meet soon to assess the national political situation under the new conditions created by the 5 October election results.

MADRID RADIO: PROSPECTS FOR CSCE TIMETABLE, AGENDA 'REMOTE'

LD221532 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Summary] The CSCE preparatory meeting remains at a standstill. Our correspondent at the Palace of Congresses reports that prospects of an agreement on the timetable and agenda for the main conference now seem remote. At this morning's session only the Soviet delegation spoke. In the corridors, rumors are circulating of fears on the part of the Eastern delegations that the West will let the remaining time pass without an agenda being agreed on. The preparatory meeting is likely to run right up to the main meeting due on 11 November, though the Soviet delegation may end it earlier because of the 7 November Soviet holiday.

DECREE CLARIFIES TITLE, FUNCTIONS OF 'GOVERNORS GENERAL'

LD221048 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] The government delegate in each of the autonomous communities, as provided for in article 154 of the Constitution, will be designated "governor general," according to a royal decree from the prime minister's office published today in the official state gazette.

The decree, which regulates the actions of the government delegate in each regional community, lays down that the governor general will direct state administration within the territory of the autonomous community and where necessary will coordinate this with the community's own administration.

The governor general, the decree adds, will exercise no public duty not deriving from the post, and he will be answerable for civil or penal matters arising from actions taken in the exercise of his duties to the appropriate section of the Supreme Court. It goes on to indicate that the governor general represents the government at the highest level in the autonomous community in question, with authority exceeding that of civil governors.

FOREIGN MINISTER OF EQUATORIAL GUINEA ARRIVES IN MADRID

LD222216 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] Florencio Maye Ela, first deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs of Equatorial Guinea, arrived in Madrid this evening on an official visit to sign an agreement on friendship and cooperation between Spain and Guinea. The new treaty will regulate the agreements between the two countries in various areas of cooperation signed in 1979. This is the first official visit made by the deputy prime minister of Equatorial Guinea to Spain. He has visited Madrid on other occasions in a private capacity.

AUSTRIA'S KREISKY MEETS PRIME MINISTER FOR TALKS

LD230911 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 15 Oct 80 p 12

[Unattributed report: "Austria Wants Closer Ties With EEC"]

[Text] "The Afghanistan crisis has created such a serious deterioration in the international climate that small states are only able to play a very limited role in their dealings with the superpowers," Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky said on arriving in Denmark yesterday on a 2-day official visit.

After discussing the international political situation with Bruno Kreisky, Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen stressed that both countries' government leaders were agreed that international crises such as Afghanistan and the war between Iran and Iraq made it more important to adhere to the policy of detente.

Anker Jorgensen added that he had discussed the Brandt report in detail with his Austrian counterpart. He stressed that the report was the best recommendation so far of how the enormous problems between the developing countries and the industrialized nations could be solved. Anker Jorgensen also gave his support to a new conference on the report, as has been suggested by Kreisky.

Anker Jorgensen also said that Bruno Kreisky had expressed Austrian interest in closer ties with the EEC. "The Danish Government has a positive view of this," Anker Jorgensen said.

NEW STUDY PUBLISHED ON CIVIL DEFENSE READINESS

LD221051 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 17 Oct 80 p 19

[Ole Stephensen report: "Denmark Totally Defenseless in the Event of a Chemical War"]

[Text] The civil defense has no resources to rely on if Denmark is the victim of chemical warfare. The population would be completely left to itself and its fate.

At the same time in the last year civil defense has saved 4 million kroner in wages for conscripts. This savings cannot be used to improve readiness for war or catastrophe because of special budget regulations to which the military defense forces are subject.

The Civil Defense Board has just published a two-volume work on civilian combat-readiness and civil defense in the eighties.

The situation is far from encouraging. While there will be masses of artillery fire, bombs and other frightening arms, by far the largest part of the population will not even have access to minimal standing room in a shelter. There should be 4.5 million places in Denmark, but there are only 350,000.

"In the event of a chemical war, we actually have no resources that we could use," Civil Defense Board Director Erik Schultz told AKTUELT.

"We know that the Warsaw Pact countries are doing a lot of work on chemical weapons, and we in the civil defense do have plans for what to do in such a situation, but these plans need time to be put into effect and they need money first and foremost," Erik Schultz said.

Civil defense has been the target for bigger savings than any other public authority in the last 15 years.

The budget was reduced by 20 percent in 1972, for example, and by a further 20 percent in 1979.

In 1981 every Dane—baby or pensioner—will pay around 1580 kroner for military defenses, but only around 50 kroner for civil defense.

In the present situation the Civil Defense Board has drawn up three points for the politicians to evaluate.

"We know that the economic situation is tight and that we must therefore hold back. We are facing the fact that we are not going to get funds easily. However, if we can first put an end to the downward curve in the budget, so we do not reach a lower point than we have already reached, it would mean a lot. Second, we would like a stable funding level over a number of years, so we know what we have to work with, and finally increased freedom of disposition like the military defense forces. This would mean, for example, that savings in one area, such as conscripts' wages, could be transferred to another area, such as the purchase of new fire engines," Erik Schultz said.

Ironically the two-volume work mentions three things that would continue to function normally when a war came: Money supply, church services and burials.

KEKKONEN TO PAY 6-DAY VISIT TO USSR BEGINNING 12 NOV

LD230912 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0500 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] President Urho Kekkonen will visit the Soviet Union in the middle of next month. President Kekkonen will make a 6-day state visit at the invitation of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium and the Soviet Government. The first 2 days of the official part of the visit, beginning on 12 November, President Kekkonen will spend in Moscow. After that he will go to the Soviet Republic of Azerbaijan, where after the first day's official program, begins the 3-day unofficial part of the state visit. During that part of the visit time has been reserved for fishing, among other things. President Kekkonen has not yet announced the composition of his entourage.

President Kekkonen has made four prior state visits to the Soviet Union in 1958, 1960, 1970 and 1977. Unofficially he has visited the Soviet Union almost 30 times.

REPORT ON PREMIER KOIVISTO'S TALKS IN YUGOSLAVIA

LD230841 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 19 Oct 80 p 11

[Jarkko Sauli report: "Successful Madrid Meeting Requires Better Superpower Relations"]

[Text] Belgrade—Finland and Yugoslavia emphasize the importance of good relations between the superpowers as a precondition for an improved international political atmosphere and for the success of the European security followup conference in Madrid. This was one of the results of the discussions Finnish Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto had during his visit to Yugoslavia, the official part of which ended on Saturday.

During the visit which began on Thursday Koivisto had official discussions with his host, Veselin Djuranovic, the government head, among others. As well as visiting Yugoslavia's long-time leader President Tito's grave, Koivisto also met the chairman of the Presidential Council, Cvijetin Mijatovic, and took the opportunity on behalf of President Kekkonen to invite Yugoslavia's president to visit Finland.

On Saturday morning the government head and Mrs Djuranovic accompanied Prime Minister Koivisto and his wife, their guests, to Dubrovnik, where the Koivistos will be taking a 5-day holiday.

Prime Minister Koivisto considers the deterioration in the world situation to be primarily due to the weakened relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. Confidence between these two countries has suffered setbacks, Koivisto said in a radio interview. According to Koivisto, Finnish and Yugoslav views on this central question converge to a large extent. In his comments on the security conference followup meeting in Madrid Koivisto said that one prerequisite for success seems to be that relations between the superpowers must be improved.

He considers the neutral and nonaligned states' possibilities in this respect to be quite limited.

On the other hand, these possibilities are not entirely nonexistent, Koivisto pointed out. He though that it was a positive circumstance that nonaligned states are taking part in the Madrid meeting. The superpowers, perhaps, expect some initiative from them and, according to Koivisto, such an initiative could be that the nations propose a realistic alternative.

During the visit the government heads of both countries attached great importance to the bilateral relations between Finland and Yugoslavia. These were thought to be exemplary for the most part, but trade relations were not thought to have developed as would have been desirable.

Most recently, however, there have been signs that trade has become more lively. As well as the parties' wish that trade exchanges cover a wider area, it was also suggested that the two countries cooperate, especially on building projects in third countries. The Middle East has been mentioned as one possible area.

The bulk of Koivisto's entourage accompanied him to Dubrovnik. Trade Union Federation Chairman Pekka Oivio is also taking part in the unofficial program.

OPINION POLL GIVES KOIVISTO LEAD FOR PRESIDENCY

LD230901 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 17 Oct 80 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Presidential Election: Already Primary Majority for Koivisto in the Country"]

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto continues to be devastatingly popular as a potential presidential candidate. According to the latest opinion poll, carried out by Finska Gallup, more than half of all those with a vote—in fact, 55 percent—already want to see him as Finland's next president. This would mean a primary majority for Koivisto.

A total of 9 percent of those asked said that they would support President Kekkonen once again in the next presidential election.

Third place is at present occupied by new Center Party Chairman Paavo Vayrynen, whose popularity is growing at the expense of Center Party veterans Ahti Karjalainen and Johannes Virolainen. Some 20 percent of those asked did not know whom they would support in the presidential election.

Mauno Koivisto's popularity has continued to grow during the time he has been prime minister. A similar survey a year ago—which was based, however, on the assumption that President Kekkonen would not run for reelection—gave Koivisto 43 percent. A poll published in the early summer which included President Kekkonen registered 46-percent support for Koivisto. At that time 13 percent supported the incumbent president.

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS COMMERCIAL TELEVISION NEWS BROADCASTS

LD221137 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 2000 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] The Radio and Television Committee recommends the granting of permission to Mainos-Televisio [commercial television (MTV)] to broadcast news for a two-year experimental period. The news would be transmitted on the TV-2 network late in the evening, in accordance with a mutual agreement between Yleisradio [Finnish Broadcasting Company] and the MTV.

The committee notes in its separate proposal concerning the organization of the news broadcasts that the MTV news must be up to standard and must not be interrupted with advertisements. The duration of the news bulletins should be 15 minutes.

The committee made these recommendations at its meeting today. The committee will submit its report to the Council of State during this month.

EUROPE PREFERS CARTER BUT MUST BE READY TO WORK WITH REAGAN

LD221405 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 20 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "The U.S. Election and Europe"]

[Text] With only a little over 2 weeks to go before the Presidential election in the United States, the opinion polls are still keeping both the Americans and us in complete uncertainty about the outcome. This is an uncertainty against a worrisome background: While President Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan are trying to win the decisive percentage points before election day on 4 November, new world problems continue to arise which the leader in the White House will have to solve. Growing tension in Europe, created by East Germany's escalated "policy of isolation" from the West and by the events in Poland, has appeared, to add to the explosive conflicts in the Middle East.

During the months of the campaign much has been said of the Americans' tepid response to both Presidential candidates, of their dissatisfaction with being left with two rivals without the leadership qualities or the political quality required for the key post in the United States and the Western world. This view of Carter and Reagan has been even more pronounced on our side of the Atlantic, among the United States' European allies. The lack of "ideal candidates" has undoubtedly also led to widespread over-simplifications, not least in Europe: It is true that Carter has been an indecisive leader, but he is nevertheless better than a President Reagan, who would turn the clock back to the age of confrontation verging on a new war.

In the short time left before the Americans press the electronic voting machines' buttons, people in Europe also ought to prepare themselves for the outcome of the election that they cannot change. Fixed and undifferentiated views will be of little help here. It is true that Carter pursues a policy that the European governments know, and that he therefore—despite all objections—inspires greater confidence than his Republican opponent. However, it is also indisputable that under the pressure of events he has also adopted standpoints that have brought him very near to Reagan's hard line, and correspondingly further from the Europeans' more flexible policies. Reagan advocates a policy based on rebuilding U.S. power, something which has not prevented him, however, from having to modify some of his more extreme views because of tangible realities. It goes without saying that foreign policy cannot be pursued in a vacuum, and this also applies to the two rivals in the U.S. election campaign.

What is important, however, is that Europe should look forward to the result on 4 November with the confidence that the West's leading power deserves. It would be a very sad beginning to President Carter's 4 new years in the White House if the emphasis were placed on the weaknesses in his foreign policy, in the midst of a complicated world where simple solutions do not exist. And it would give Reagan a more or less hopeless start if his election—as the mood in wide circles in Europe indicates today—is seen as a catastrophe. The collaboration between the United States and Europe will continue, regardless of who wins the election. While we follow the last lap of the election campaign, our conclusion ought therefore to be: We can hope for Carter, but we must also prepare ourselves for Reagan.

GOVERNMENT DISCLAIMS KNOWLEDGE OF ANY U.S. CYPRIOT INITIATIVE

NC221209 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] Answering a question in connection with President Carter's statement that following Greece's reintegration into the military wing of NATO the next problem to be resolved is the Cypriot problem, the government spokesman stated that the Cypriot Government does not have any official information about any U.S. initiative. The spokesman added that any initiative that would aim at helping resolve the Cypriot problem is acceptable by the Cypriot Government, provided that it would be within the UN framework and the procedures stipulated by UN decisions, resolutions and principles.

O AGON: CARTER'S FRESH PROMISES RECALL PAST PROMISES

NC220830 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 22 Oct 80 p 2

[From "Our Positions" column: "Following the Reintegration, the Cyprus Problem"]

[Text] U.S. President Carter has said that following Greece's reintegration into NATO, the next problem that must be resolved is the Cyprus problem and the restoration of human rights in Cyprus.

We bear in mind that President Carter's statement was made during an election gathering of Greek Americans and this makes us recall the promises that the U.S. President made four years ago.

Specifically, he had promised that if he won the election he would see to the solution of the Cyprus problem and the withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Cyprus. Mr Carter won the election and not only failed to keep his promises but also rewarded the aggressor by supplying him with plenty of arms.

Thus, we are cautious about the sincerity of his promises and we suspect that he will forget them if he manages to usurp the Greek-American votes again.

In any case, we wish to stress that Greece's reintegration into NATO is tantamount to a patchwork job if the problem that caused Greece's withdrawal continues in a state of dangerous suspense.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON PRESIDENT CARTER'S CYPRUS REMARKS

NC230831 [Editorial Report] All the Greek-language dailies of 23 October--with the exception of O FILELEVTHEROS and I SIMERINI--carry editorials on President Carter's reference to the Cyprus problem as the next problem to be resolved following Greece's reintegration into NATO. All editorial comments note that President Carter made similar promises in 1976 but failed to keep them.

In its "Comments" column on page 3, ELEVTHERI KIPROS says that "bitter experience compels us to have doubts about the realization of declarations by U.S. President Jimmy Carter in connection with the Cyprus problem, particularly in connection with every promise he makes about its solution." The paper adds that Carter made similar promises in the past and therefore the Cypriot people "can only consider Jimmy Carter's fresh statement as purely an election promise, not to say a demagogic promise."

In a front page editorial, I MAKHI says that the Cypriots should be celebrating because of President Carter's statement, but that they unfortunately received it "with coolness and great reservation, and the U.S. President himself is to be blamed for this because he has made much more important statements about the Cyprus problem many times in the past." The paper wonders: "How can we, the Greek Cypriots, believe in his words and receive them with pleasure and joy?"

The paper reiterates that no great importance can be attached to the U.S. President's words and stresses: "He himself has caused us to receive his words with indifference and apathy. Bitter experience does not let us react otherwise. We are compelled to speak cruel reality--we, who are neither anti-Western nor anti-American; we, who are feeling much more embittered and disappointed because of the U.S. and the Western attitude, and who are pro-Western." The paper concludes that "we are waiting for deeds, words neither persuade us nor satisfy us."

In a front page editorial, KHARAVYI deals with Greece's reintegration into NATO and criticizes "the bombastic celebrations by all the imperialist and reactionary circles internationally and internally" because of this event. Referring to President Carter's statement, the paper says that he made "a promise-threat about s fering Cyprus. Mr Carter clearly said that following Greece's reintegration into the military wing of NATO, the next problem for 'settlement' is the Cyprus problem. It appears that the President does not even consider the Cyprus problem as a separate question, but simply as 'another phase' in the inter-Atlantic dispute that will also be settled by the NATOite leadership." The paper expresses "justified uneasiness" because of Carter's statement and points out that what he has told the Greek-American voters is not just an election promise "but it is something worse: It is a warning about imperialist involvement and an attempt for a NATOite solution that will serve the imperialist plans in the Middle East; that is, this is a fresh threat against Cyprus."

TA NEA, as well, carries a front page editorial stressing that "Carter and the U.S. foreign policy understand only one Cyprus solution: The solution for the sake of which the July coup and the Turkish genocidal invasion and occupation have taken place; the solution that would legalize the faits accomplis, occupation, partition and displacement. Such a solution is not possible, because it depends on its acceptance by the Greek Cypriots, and because the Cypriot people will never allow such acceptance."

In his front page column "My Opinion," O AGON's "Observer" says that "this is not the first time that President Carter has lavishly made promises in favor of Cyprus, promises which he later on failed to carry out, and even violated, and has worked for the burying of Cypriot rights." The "Observer" adds that, although "we do not trust the U.S. President, we cannot possibly disregard the fact that his fresh statement is made at a period of serious developments in the Greek-U.S. and the Turkish-U.S. relations, and, therefore, we are compelled to attach to them this time some particular importance." Referring to Greece's reintegration, the "Observer" says that this might be the beginning of a general effort by the United States and the West to resolve the Greek-Turkish problems of the Aegean and Cyprus and stresses: "Therefore, this time Carter was not merely making promises but was furnishing clear indications of the thoughts and intentions of the Americans with regard to their next moves." The "Observer" considers it "reasonable" that "the West will seek to complete its efforts for a package settlement of all the questions that affect the region, because this is the only way for NATO to feel that its southeastern wing is safe and free from dangers." In conclusion, he stresses the need for vigilance and unity by the Greek Cypriot side in order to "deal with any eventuality, either negative or positive."

DENKTAS COMMENTS ON OFFICIAL VISIT TO TURKEY

TA230819 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] President of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus Rauf Denktas will arrive in Ankara today for a 2-day official visit. In Ankara, President Denktas will have talks with Head of State, Chief of Staff and President of the National Security Council Gen Kenan Evren, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and other government officials.

In a statement to Turkish Radio and Television, President Denktas recalled that the Cyprus problem had reached an important phase. He added that he would, as usual, have an open and substantial exchange of views in Ankara. This visit, Denktas said, would give him the opportunity to express the loyalty and gratitude of the Turkish Cypriot community to the Turkish nation and administrators.

Referring to the Cyprus issue, President Rauf Denktas said: The Cyprus problem has reached an important stage. Intercommunal talks, which have been obstructed by the Greek Cypriots for years, have resumed. The continuation of these talks in a healthy atmosphere and under conditions of equality and the ending of these talks with positive results that safeguard the rights of both communities are our common desires with Turkey. However, recently various pressures are being exerted on us, and it is our task to withstand these. Kenan Atakol, foreign affairs, defense and tourism minister of the Turkish Federated State, will accompany President Denktas in his visit to Turkey.

BAYRAK RADIO ANNOUNCES DENKTAS DEPARTURE FOR TURKISH VISIT

TA231157 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Excerpts] President Rauf Denktas left Cyprus today for an official visit to Turkey. Before his departure, President Denktas made a statement in connection with the visit.

Asked to comment on a statement by U.S. President Carter to the Greek lobby that after Greece's return to NATO's military wing, it was now the turn for the solution of the Cyprus problem and the restoration of the human rights in the island, President Denktas said: President Carter is speaking from Washington, while the Turkish Cypriot community—whose human rights have been trampled upon and its most valuable possessions destroyed for 11 years—has waged a dynamic struggle for the restoration of the human rights in Cyprus, which is only 40 miles off the Turkish coast. President Carter might promise this or that in a bid to satisfy the Greek lobby. However, I would like him to clarify what he means by the restoration of the human rights in Cyprus. Which human rights will be restored in Cyprus? To provide the Greek Cypriot community with rights that might lead to a repetition of the Greek Cypriot stand against our community during 11 years cannot be defined as the restoration of human rights but as an invitation for their destruction.

Pointing out that the views of the Turkish Cypriot community will be forwarded to U.S. officials, President Denktas said that the Turkish Cypriot community believed that the Cypriot problem could not be solved by presidential orders from Washington. Denktas added that to give such an impression to the Greek Cypriots would completely disrupt the intercommunal talks. He continued: It is our wish that it should not be forgotten that the Cyprus issue is a problem that can be solved by the two ethnic communities.

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU LEAVES FOR OFFICIAL VISIT TO INDIA

NC230614 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0430 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] President Kiprianou left after midnight for New Delhi for a 2-day official visit to India. During his visit, President Kiprianou will discuss with President Reddy and Prime Minister Gandhi the Cyprus problem, ways to further develop the friendship and cooperation between Cyprus and India and questions concerning the nonaligned movement. President Kiprianou is accompanied by Foreign Minister Rolandhis.

The president was seen off by House President Mikhailidhis—who will be acting president of the republic during President Kiprianou's absence—members of the Council of Ministers, the Indian Consul to Cyprus, house members, the police commander, the national guard deputy commander and by other officials.

CZECHOSLOVAK PREMIER STROUGAL ENDS VISIT; AGREEMENTS SIGNED

AT221335 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Text] The official visit of Czechoslovak Premier Strougal to Greece comes to an end today.

Strougal was received by President of the Republic Karamanlis at 1030 today. Present at the meeting were Czechoslovak Ambassador to Athens Zantovsky; Greek Ambassador to Prague Mavromikhalis and secretary general to the president, Ambassador Molivistis.

At 1130 a ceremony was held at the Foreign Ministry during which four agreements were signed between Greece and Czechoslovakia. They refer to economic cooperation between the two countries; to cooperation in the health sector; to cooperation in judicial aid and to the establishment of consulates.

The agreements were signed by the premiers of the two countries, Rallis and Strougal, Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and the Czechoslovak Ministers of Metallurgy and Heavy Industry Gerle and Foreign Trade Trade Barcak.

Earlier there was a meeting attended by the Greek prime minister; Minister Without Portfolio Dhimas; Minister of Industry and Energy Manos; Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis and secretary general of the Foreign Ministry, Ambassador Theodhoropoulos. On the Czechoslovak side, the meeting was attended by Premier Strougal; Heavy Industry Minister Gerle; Foreign Trade Minister Barcak and Deputy Foreign Minister Knizka.

At 1230 the two premiers held a press conference. Rallis and Strougal stressed that the talks conducted were in a spirit of cooperation and were fruitful. They also said discussions centered primarily on economic affairs but also on international problems. They stressed that despite the existence of different political systems, relations between Greece and Czechoslovakia are excellent and there are prospects for further expansion of cooperation between the two countries in many sectors. This afternoon Strougal departs Athens for Prague.

PROSECUTOR TO INVESTIGATE OPERATION OF FOREIGN UNIVERSITIES

AT221430 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 22 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The method of operation and operating permits issued to foreign universities in Greece will be looked into by the judiciary on instructions from the Athens prosecutor general who ordered a preliminary investigation.

The case started with a document issued by Education Minister Talliadhouros addressed to the prosecutor general in which he asked for an investigation of charges published in press articles referring to the illegal and unconstitutional operation of foreign universities.

The preliminary investigation is required to look into and confirm the following:

Operating permits issued by the Ministry of Education to these foreign senior educational establishments.

Reports by educational experts on these operations.

Action by the Ministry of Education toward checking and limiting the operation of foreign senior educational establishments.

According to the press reports, such foreign universities operate in Greece either as branches of equivalent universities abroad, which accept Greek students without entrance examinations, or as bureaus for assisting students to assit in the travel of interested students overseas. There are also schools which present themselves as study centers established by Greek citizens but which represent foreign educational establishments, as well as others which operate as centers for the preparation of students for entry into foreign universities. It is noted that the last two categories are not sufficiently covered by existing legislature. At the same time, the existence of such establishments proves the insufficiency of the Greek educational system.

ATHENS PAPERS COMMENT ON RETURN TO NATO MILITARY WING

AT211624 [Editorial Report] Athens newspapers on 21 October carry extensive commentary on the issue of Greece' return to the military wing of NATO.

MESIMVRINI in Greek notes on page 1 in its "Positions" column: "Unequivocally, the agreement that has been reached...ends, in a most satisfactory manner, a dangerous national outstanding issue and essentially completes—consolidates and protects—Greece's organic link with Europe." It also remarks that "The criticism being heard (from the right and the left)...is dictated by reasons of pure party selfishness. ...It would greatly profit all parties—without exception—if they would prove that in national affairs they subdue their propaganda or other petty interests."

Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek on page 2 publishes its "Laconic" column entitled "Return to NATO" which says that Greece's return is being made "without at all damaging its national interests and on the basis of the Haig-Davos agreement of 1978." Satisfactorily noting that the new Rogers plan envisages the establishment of a NATO headquarters in Larisa, similar to the one in Izmir, AKROPOLIS remarks: "Why, then, all the fuss and demagogy against NATO which the opposition is inciting? .... How shall we guarantee our territorial integrity without allies and without defense supports? What observer in good faith does not see that if the East bloc finally prevails, Greece will not be able to remain neutral and independent or that it will not be able to stop the designs which some northern neighbors still have on Macedonia and the Aegean?"

The KKE (Exterior) organ, RIZOSPASTIS in Greek, carries an editorial on page 1 entitled "Guilty" asserting that "The government of the right stands slavish and undignified before its 'allies,' unashamed of the slaps it has received from them and without the courage to seek a different road." It continues: The government "is guilty because it is taking Greece back into the NATO of the cold and hot war, to the NATO of the Cyprus treason, to the NATO of Papadhopoulos and Evren. It is guilty because at a critical period for peace it is surrendering the country to imperialists to be used as a base for their aggressive plans in the Mideast and the Balkans. It is guilty because, through return to NATO, it is undermining national independence, defense and security."

I AVYI, Greek-language press organ of the KKE (Interior) published the "I AVYI" column on page 8 entitled "Clearly Before the People." The commentary says "a 180-degree turn has taken place regarding the direction which was indicated in the summer of 1974"—that is, Greece's withdrawal from the NATO military wing. Now, it stresses, the government "must explain why the decision for withdrawal was correct in 1974 and is considered 'obsolete' in 1980.... In addition, the government must clearly inform the public and Chamber about the specific conditions under which the return has taken place. Half truths and alleged, secret 'previous obligations' are unacceptable...."

EUROPEAN ASSEMBLY DEBATE ON CSCE REPORTED

LD230943 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Oct 80 p 38

["M.S." report: "European Assembly Advocates Continuing Detente"]

[Text] Strasbourg—At the end of a debate on Wednesday 15 October on the forthcoming CSCE conference slated to take place in Madrid in November, the European Assembly voted by a big majority in favor of pursuing detente. Only the French Communists voted against the resolution submitted by Mr Rumor (DC deputy), the Italian Communists abstained. Several points in the resolution were amended at the Socialists' initiative. PS Deputy Estier asked for changes to modify the resolution's general tone. With Mr Rumor's support the most significant changes were adopted. The Assembly thus abandoned the idea of setting conditions for "the pursuit of the CSCE process." Indeed, the resolution only made provision for the process to be continued after the November conference "if the results obtained in Madrid justified it." The new text also calls on the European Nine to "constructively examine all the proposals made for a European disarmament conference."

The resolution passed, however, clearly denounces Moscow's intervention policy since the 1975 Helsinki conference. It demands "measures to solve the crisis started by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan." The text also makes an implicit reference to Poland, calling on the Nine to "condemn as unacceptable and contrary to the Helsinki Final Act any use of threats or force and to solemnly declare that the violation of the national will of a signatory country by another country would be regarded as a flagrant violation of the spirit of this act and would therefore represent a threat to peace."

L'HUMANITE CITES JOSEPH LUNS ON FRENCH-NATO MILITARY TIES

LD221035 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 20 Oct 80 p 9

[Unattributed report: "Close French Military Cooperation"]

[Text] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns confirmed—with satisfaction—yesterday evening the close cooperation which exists between the French Government and the Atlantic organization. Speaking as the guest on the Europe 1 Press Club he specified that this cooperation is both permanent and leads to "joint consideration" in some circumstances such as the Iranian revolution.

Questioned by our special representative in Brussels, Laurent Smouroun, on the increasingly Atlanticist stances adopted by the Giscard government, the majority parties and the PS, Mr Luns stated: "I am astonished that you should find it surprising that France is playing the game in NATO. France and the French Government have never dissociated themselves from the broad lines of NATO's policy.... The only difference is that France is not integrated militarily but it has missions to all the NATO commands and is informed of everything...."

"The French armed forces' role in the Indian Ocean," Mr Luns also specified, "is entirely in keeping with NATO's outlook and NATO welcomes it."

With regard to the situation in the Persian Gulf, he said: "There has been joint consideration (in the Atlantic Council) and all are agreed that U.S. action toward Iran, in the present crisis for instance, should be applauded and diplomatically supported."

[Question] Does France agree too?

[Answer] I have not heard any argument to the contrary from the French Government.

Questioned on Mr Giscard d'Estaing's decision to develop the neutron weapon, the NATO secretary general stated: "I welcome the fact that France will probably build this shell.... However the subject has not been discussed in NATO."

"I would not find it unnatural for some countries, especially the FRG, which is very important for many reasons, to agree to deploy it on their territory."

UNITED KINGDOM

CONCERN EXPRESSED OVER SAUDI MILITARY PURCHASES FROM FRANCE

LD211237 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 21 Oct 80 p 32

[Roland Gribben report: "Thatcher Inquiry on Contract"]

[Text] The prime minister has asked for details about how France came to win a 1,400 million pounds naval contract from Saudi Arabia. It was emphasised in Whitehall last night that Mrs Thatcher had not called for an inquiry into why Britain missed out on the orders and was seeking background information. But the contract is the second important arms deal won by the French in the Middle East in recent months. It comes against the background of moves by Mrs Thatcher to increase Britain's military sales effort.

There is some concern that the award of the order to the French may be a "hangover" from the Saudi reaction to the "Death of a Princess" television film which soured trade relations earlier this year.

But Britain, it is understood, was never seriously in the running for a contract which involved France providing a substantial addition to the Saudi Navy.

France has been negotiating with Saudi authorities for over two years as part of a wider programme to gain access to more Saudi oil.

The contract involves building four 2,000-ton missile launching frigates, two 17,000-ton fuel supply ships, and Dauphine helicopters armed with air-to-sea missiles. The orders will take four years to complete.

The British Embassy in Jidda has been providing background information about the contract negotiations and the Defence Ministry is preparing a background note for Mrs Thatcher.

It is being pointed out that Britain is now at a disadvantage in important Middle East arms deals where an oil trade-off is involved because of the growth of North Sea oil production.

Despite British technological achievements, particularly in aerospace, countries such as France, badly in need of secure long-term oil supplies, are making cut-price offers.

Ministers are also increasingly worried that France is "bending" international rules and mixing aid to developing countries with attractive credit arrangements to win business.

DIE PRESSE REVIEWS ACTIVITIES OF 'PALME COMMISSION'

AU231637 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 23 Oct 80 p 2

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "Gud": "Vienna: Palme Commission for Disarmament Is Taking Shape"]

[Text] Vienna--"The mere fact that such groups do exist is a good thing." This was stated by Vadim Zagladin, first deputy chief of the CPSU Central Committee's International Department, who on Tuesday at the "Club 2" [Vienna domestic television] panel discussion expressed himself appreciatively about the new disarmament commission "headed by Mr Palme."

John Edwards, secretary of the commission, in a talk with DIE PRESSE did not want his group to be downgraded to a "pacifists' association for the benefit of the Soviets." According to him, the Palme Commission plans to promote not only negotiations that are already underway but also additional ones, and it intends to publish a report on these endeavors by March 1982--that is a few months before the UN General Assembly special session on disarmament is scheduled to begin, in a similar way as Willy Brandt's report preceded the UN North-South debate.

After a 1 and 1/2 year preparatory phase, the "independent commission for disarmament and security questions" acquired about a month ago a more or less final members list. In addition to CPSU Central Committee Candidate Member Georgi Arbatov, it contains among others former U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, former prime ministers Joop Den Uyl (Netherlands) and Jozef Cyrankiewicz (Poland), SPD Secretary General Egon Bahr, former British Foreign Minister David Owen and Third World personages such as Olusegun Obasanjo, former president of Nigeria, Commonwealth Secretary General Shridath Ramphal from Guyana, and Salim Salim (Tanzania), chairman of the last UN General Assembly.

Edwards will reveal which "Western and Middle East" premiers have already promised financial support only when the payments have actually been received: so far, he says, donations have been received from a foundation in London. The Austrian Government is paying the cost of the commission's secretariat on Vienna's Argentinierstrasse. The next conference is scheduled from 12 to 15 December in Vienna.

FINANCE MINISTER PRESENTS 1981 BUDGET

AU231739 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 23 Oct 80 pp 1-2

[Summary] Finance Minister Androsch yesterday presented to parliament the 1981 draft budget. It provides for 335.1 billion schillings expenditures (as against 302.2 billion schillings in 1980), and 285.3 billion schillings revenues (1980: 253.2 billion schillings). In addition, there is a special budget for counter-cyclical measures providing for expenditures of 2.48 billion schillings (1980: 2.96 billion schillings), and 2.6 billion schillings (1980: 2.49 billion schillings) is earmarked as "stablization quota."

According to the finance minister, revenues are estimated to rise about 1 percent more than expenditures. At present, the Austrian economic situation is still marked by full employment, concrete growth, and relative price stability. The real growth rate this year is estimated at 3.5 percent, the unemployment rate 1.9 percent. At present, there are 2.8 million wage and salary earners in Austria, more than ever before, and there is no youth unemployment. For 1981, an economic growth rate of 1 percent and an increase of unemployment to 2.2 percent are expected, the finance minister said.

NRC HANDELSBLAD ON CONCERNS OVER U.S. ELECTION

LD231303 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 20 Oct 80 p 7

[Editorial: "Growing Concern"]

[Text] Despite months of squabbling the two candidates for the U.S. Presidency, President Carter and former-Governor Ronald Reagan, will now meet for a debate on television. This is good news for the U.S. electorate.

The squabbling was chiefly due to Carter's reservations about the presence at such a debate of the independent candidate John Anderson, in Carter's view a no-hope outsider, who only has press publicity to thank for his reputation.

The League of Women Voters, the active nompartisan women's organization which has arranged the television debate, had a different opinion for a long time. Anderson's standing in the opinion polls was at times as much as 20 percent of U.S. votes and, according to the league, he had to be taken as a serious candidate. The opinion polls have now knocked this view on the head--Anderson's support is melting away and the political platform can now be occupied by the candidates from the two largest traditional U.S. parties.

It is a great pity that the chances for Anderson, who up to now has made the most serious and convincing impression of all the candidates, seem to have disappeared completely. But the fact that U.S. voters are being given the opportunity to see the two neck-and-neck leaders in confrontation with each other is an advantage.

However, the outcome is unpredictable. Will Reagan's suave and relaxed ineptitude make a better impression that Carter's tense display of knowledge? Or will both gentlemen be sent home with an unsatisfactory grade? A number of American commentators incline toward the latter possibility. Reagan has a poor knowledge of his facts, although he can conceal his ignorance with charm for a few minutes; Carter has a treasurehouse of facts at hand, but does not know what they mean and this becomes obvious. So run a couple of the less friendly assessments of the two candiates and their television chances.

From Europe we can only watch the spectacle of the U.S. election with growing concern, not only because the outcome, no matter what it is, will give little reason for celebration (Carter's reelection would, however, make us less somber, but that is all), but the clammy hand which the even struggle for the White House will place on American diplomacy is alarming in the present world situations.

To give one example: The fairly pro-Iranian noises that have been coming from Washington recently are without doubt intended to prepare a breakthrough in the hostage affair. The release of the hostages in Tehran would be bound to throw another 4 years in the White House into the lap of a triumphant Carter. Policy in the Persian Gulf would thus become a function of the short-term electoral interests of a politician who wants to prolong his own stay in the White House.

Such links are improper and therefore dangerous. It is impossible to make the clock move faster, but the sooner 4 November comes the better.

EXPLORATORY TALKS HELD ON USSR GAS FOR NETHERLANDS

LD230815 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 20 Oct 80 p 1

[Own reporter report: "Russians Ask for More for Gas"]

[Text] Amsterdam--The Soviet Union wants a higher price for natural gas than the Netherlands wants to pay. This became clear this week in exploratory talks between a Soviet natural gas delegation, the Economic Affairs Ministry and the Netherlands Gas Union.

The Russians are considering a gas price based on the price of crude oil, while the Netherlands envisages a gas price in accordance with the price of fuel oil. At present the price the Russians are thinking of is around 40 cents per cubic meter, while the Dutch price is 30 cents per cubic meter.

According to a spokesman for the Economic Affairs Ministry the price difference does not mean that the negotiations on Russian natural gas supplies to the Netherlands have been unsuccessful. "Negotiations on the price will have to take place, as has not been the case during the exploratory talks. This week nothing has been done apart from making each side's positions clear," the spokesman said. One member of the Russian delegation has remained in the Netherlands to conduct talks on possible Dutch deliveries in exchange for the natural gas. The other members left Schipol Airport on Saturday. The exchange deliveries are in the technical sphere of natural gas production and transportation. During this week's talks it has become clear that a significant part of the credits that the Netherlands will have to give the Soviet Union for the gas supplies would be spent in the Netherlands on contract work and other technical activities.

It has also become clear that the Russians want to begin gas supplies very soon. Because Russia has 1984-1985 in mind it wants the contracts concluded within a few months. Some 40 billion cubic meters of natural gas are involved. Earlier this year the Netherlands Gas Union made it known that it was willing to take 4 to 5 billion cubic meters of natural gas per year.

PAPERS COMMENT ON KOSYGIN'S RESIGNATION

DW241002 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Press review on the resignation of Soviet Premier Aleksey Kosygin]

[Text] The daily DIE WELT writes: Nobody can tell whether Kosygin's resignation was for reasons other than poor health or whether the resignation heralds an upcoming evil, nobody can tell whether it will have any effects on the system. In the hierarchy the premier is subordinate to the party. However, a premier who was not only a member of the supreme party elite but also carved out his career jointly with the party boss was bound to wield special weight. The assumption that Kosygin's exit will not necessarily strengthen the forces of moderation seems to be permissible.

In the opinion of WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU the change in the Kremlin does not come unexpectedly. The paper writes: Kosygin's poor state of health was known. The supreme economic manager of the Soviet empire was not particularly successful in his bailiwick, as we saw again the other day. Successor Tikhonov, an intimate friend of Brezhnev who reportedly had differences of opinion with Kosygin in times past, had been standing by for quite some time. He, too, is a man for the economy, the boss himself handles the international business. Yesterday's Soviet scenery, however, unequivocally reminds us of how unmoved externally, not to say how untouched, the power relations there have been for many years. Kosygin resided on Red Square in Moscow for 16 years. The world public had grown accustomed to that face which continually looked sad. He was always involved, being part of the foremost Soviet elite, yet he was not the number one. Quite obviously one single man was ahead of him the past few years--Brezhnev.

BADISCHE ZEITUNG of Freiburg makes the following comment: The Soviet premier is resigning at a time when the government cannot but admit to the Supreme Soviet another poor harvest, and the nonachievement of plan targets in other branches as well. This is an admission which coincides with more and more vehement criticism of the economic and the administrative apparatus, supplies for the consumer and the inability to steer the country on the course of reform which is so necessary. Kosygin's successor, Tikhonov, is 75 years old and is possibly only a transitional solution. The surprising admission of the young, 49-years-old rising star Gorbachov to the Politburo as a full member might be tantamount to setting a course for the future: Gorbachov is an expert on agriculture, and agriculture continues to be the Kremlin's great problem child. Notwithstanding all unanswered questions in connection with Kosygin's resignation, one thing is definite: The continuity of the policy of the Soviet leadership remains preserved.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG writes: The successor, Tikhonov, has been prepared to take over for a long time. He is just 1 year younger than his predecessor, so it is not a change of power or of generations, but a carefully prepared and implemented transition. Is that the model for a great change that will unavoidably come in the Soviet Union in the coming years, namely, that a person may resign and that his name can still be mentioned in the future? that political leaders will be able to pass their power on in a very natural way? If the leaders achieve this, they will eliminate some of the reservations people still have about them. The civilized change of power in the Kremlin is a contribution one can hardly underrate with a view to the promotion of confidence in the world.

NEUE RUHR ZEITUNG of Essen notes: The change of top Soviet leaders demonstrates something one is not always aware of: The masters of the Kremlin are old men. Kosygin, an old man, is going, Tikhonov, an old man, is coming, and Brezhnev--thus to name the most important one--is a gravely ill old man who, amazingly, has been rejuvenated over and over again. It seems, however, that the Kremlin is far from suffering from the two most popular contradictory attributes of old age: Gentle wisdom and arthritic stubbornness.

Its policy is still characterized by the same hardness and mercilessness, but also by surprising mobility, at least when exploiting the weakness of the adversary is involved. If old age is supposed to be protection against foolishness, this is hardly applicable either. The Afghanistan adventure is the most recent evidence of that. Yet one ought to give some credit to that long-lived Soviet guard. These old men have experienced the catastrophe of World War II and they have learned their lessons. They do not carelessly put their red empire at stake, says NEUE RUHR ZEITUNG.

PAPERS COMMENT ON BREZHNEV ADMISSION OF ECONOMIC DIFFICULTIES

DW231220 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Press review on USSR Supreme Soviet session]

[Text] Discussing the criticism of supply bottlenecks in the Soviet Union voiced by the head of state and party, Brezhnev, the Bonn paper DIE WELT writes: The Soviets in this situation might venture a reassessment of their policy. They might reach the conclusion that their prognosis of the inevitable Western decline has been as wrong as has their forecast of a communist economic paradise in 1980, that with their boundless armament and aggressive policy of expansion they have attained nothing but barren confrontation, that they are unable to keep pace in an arms race, and that they should turn around out of their blind alley and proceed to attempt real reforms and reasonable coexistence and cooperation with the West, especially since the unrest in Poland, Estonia, Latvia and even in certain Russian factories seems to indicate that what has seemed to burden man for an eternity need not be accepted forever. They might realize this. They do not have to, or not so soon, but an energetic Western attitude which leaves no doubt that the West will no longer be fooled might help them in this process of comprehension.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG comments on the same topic: Unerringly the Kremlin keeps placing ideology above individual desires. Reforms are out of the question. As far as the leadership is concerned economic planning is also an instrument for exercising power. If it were to allow some independence for enterprises or even branches in which private initiative could develop, a gap in the control apparatus would ensue. This is what the group of rulers does not want under any circumstances.

SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch draws attention to Brezhnev's motives: Party Boss Brezhnev said the most urgent requirement was to improve consumer supplies of foodstuffs. The ruler over all Russians in a metaphor using an old, well-worn slogan called for more butter instead of guns. He did so with some reason this fall, to be sure. The Afghanistan adventure is unpopular even in the Soviet Union, and the punishment by the Americans in the economic field is not as ineffective as some observers in the West seek to make it seem. Finally, developments in Poland also cast long shadows in the Soviet Union. Today, in a rebellious environment within its own camp, Moscow cannot afford a supply crisis as it did formerly.

PAPER SCORES USSR PROTEST AGAINST ROGERS' BERLIN VISIT

[Commentary signed -R: "A Bogey Is Being Set Up"]

[Text] The perfecting of the "antifascist protection wall" with barbed steel mats symbolizes in a sad way the Moscow-ordered delimitation course diligently being promoted by East Berlin. Internal difficulties in the East bloc have once more increased the urge of the ruling party to isolate itself while simultaneously voicing quite senseless accusations against the West in line with that old clamour to "Hold that thief"! An example has been given in this respect by the protest of the Soviet East Berlin embassy against the West Berlin visit of NATO Commander-in-Chief Rogers. It was said that this was an attempt to include West Berlin in NATO's sphere of influence.

What is the purpose of that joke? Its originators know that since the signing of the 1949 NATO treaty the Berlin sectors occupied by the allies belong to NATO's defense area. Rogers' visit was not at all "in gross contradiction" to the four-power agreement. The Berlin treaty does not at all touch on the original occupation rights of the Western powers.

In a strange parallel action with this Soviet move, the GDR accused the West German television networks ARD and ZDF of planning as of January 1981 to "step up ideological war against the GDR." In fact, however, neither intensified nor territorially extended reportage has been planned. Even if this were the case, the GDR particularly would have no reason to become excited about stepped-up ideological war. Its functionaries have probably not forgotten the commitment accepted in Helsinki, namely, to "facilitate more free and far-reaching dissemination of information." But the SED obviously dislikes that duty so much that that it is preventively setting up an ideolocal bogey which some day could produce the pretext for taking further measures against West German correspondents.

GENSCHER RECEIVES SWAPO LEADER NUJOMA FOR TALKS

LD231935 Hamburg DPA in German 1733 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Bonn, 23 Oct (DPA)--Against the background of the latest UN efforts to achieve independence for South-West Africa (Namibia) on the basis of internationally-supervised elections, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher received Sam Nujoma, president of the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), for lengthy talks in Bonn today. On Friday Nujoma will also meet members of the Federal Committee for Foreign Affairs and for Development Policy and hold talks at the Ministry for Development.

The Federal Government does not recognize the elections that were organized in Namibia by South Africa, nor the establishment of the Council of Ministers under the leadership of Drik Mudge, because SWAPO did not take part in them. This was stated to Namibian Premier Mudge by Foreign Ministry State Secretary Guenther Van Well, when Mudge visited the federal capital last summer. Together with the governments of Washington, London, Paris and Ottawa, Bonn was responsible for the so-called Namibia initiative, which is reflected in resolution 435 of the UN Security Council.

According to the resolution, supervised elections with SWAPO's participation should take place in the former German colony, which later became a mandate of South Africa, as a prerequisite for Namibia's true independence. The first demand contained in this resolution is for an armistice between the SWAPO guerrillas and the forces of the Dirk Mudge government, which is heavily supported by South Africa.

One of the subjects under discussion during the Genscher-Nujoma talks is Bonn's view that SWAPO, although an important power, is not the only representative of the Namibian people. The Federal Republic voted against such a resolution at the UN General Assembly, but within the framework of its Namibia activities--and the presence of 30,000 people of German origin or German citizens in South-West Africa plays a role in this--Bonn is aiming at ensuring SWAPO's participation in any peaceful solution.

GDR'S EWALT MOLDT DISCUSSES GDR-FRG RELATIONS

LD232050 Hamburg DPA in German 1959 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 23 Oct (DPA)--The GDR today again made further normalization of relations with the Federal Republic dependent on certain conditions. Ewalt Moldt, head of the permanent GDR mission in Bonn, spoke at the opening in Saarbruecken of the first GDR film week in the Federal Republic about respect for the GDR's state citizenship [staatsbuergerschaft]. Moldt warned the Federal Republic against interfering in the GDR's internal affairs, among which was the raising of the compulsory minimum exchange. This measure is to serve the GDR's own population and is not directed against travelers.

GISCARD BRIEFS CABINET ON RECENT PRC VISIT

NC231601 Paris AFP in English 1545 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 23 Oct (AFP)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing today briefed his Cabinet on his recent week-long visit to China, saying that Chinese development "will have considerable influence on the world's future".

China's priority on economic development will make it "a great, modern power", he said, adding that an active China fully involved in international affairs will "constitute a factor of peace and stability in the world".

The French president said that the two countries' common views on a number of basic principles should help contribute to settling current problems, and notably the crisis situations discussed during the visit.

Chinese officials expressed interest in the development of relations between the two countries, he said, outlining plans he concluded with the Beijing government.

China has ordered its first two nuclear centers from France, and agreed to hold periodic political consultations with Paris, he said.

The two countries also plan to strengthen scientific and cultural ties with the creation of a French technological institute at Shanghai.

PREMIER IN TUNISIA FOR 3-DAY OFFICIAL VISIT

PLO REPRESENTATIVE DISCUSSES MIDEAST WITH PRESIDENTIAL ADVISER

NC232220 Paris AFP in English 2205 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 23 Oct (AFP)--Isam as-Sartawi, special envoy of Palestine Liberation Organization Chief Yasir 'Arafat, conferred today with a representative of French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, the PLO office here announced.

A French spokesman confirmed that Mr as-Sartawi had met, at his request, with presidential diplomatic advisor Patrick Leclerc. Their talks centered on Mr 'Arafat's mission to Iran and Iraq, the spokesman said.

The PLO office said they discussed the situation in the Middle East, with emphasis on the Iraqi-Iranian conflict and on Mr 'Arafat's efforts to achieve an end to the fighting.

MITTERRAND SPEAKS ON PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY, CRITICIZES ROCARD

LD231325 Paris LE MATIN in French 20 Oct 80 p 2

[Unattributed report: "Mitterrand: 'Party Unity Comes First'"]

[Text] Even before Michel Rocard announced his candidacy for the presidency of the republic, Francois Mitterrand criticized the mayor of Conflans-Sainte-Honorine's decision. During a public meeting held here at Kingersheim, in the Haut-Rhin Department, the first secretary explained: "Any candidate who says that he is a candidate before any federation has said so is no candidate." And he added: "As far as I am concerned, I believe that it would be incorrect with respect to our party to try to steal a march."

Here are the main passages from Francois Mitterrand's statement in Mulhouse: "I have scrupulously abided by the decisions adopted by our party which 4 months ago fixed 19 October as the beginning of the democratic process of our candidate's nomination for the presidential election.

"Today is 19 October. I have kept silent until now. It has been said that it was getting quite late. However, we still have more than 6 months before us.... As you know, I have long believed that throwing our ranks open to such a competition would have been premature.... But, since the time has come to speak, I will do so. I have heard many appeals addressed to me. I have even heard many candidates declare, without being asked by me, that they would withdraw their candidacy in advance if I were to offer myself for your nomination.

"Is it necessary to repeat that I have never had either any intention or any desire to do this? For me and, I hope, for you the problem should be considered from a different angle.

"No one can wear our colors under such grave circumstances unless his main concern is to unite the Socialists and champion their plan. No one can aspire to lead the country unless he personifies the will to unite popular forces in order to urge them, transcending any partisan struggles, to implement a national plan through which all French people will rediscover reasons for hope. Our candidate will have the duty to be at one and the same time the architect, interpreter and symbol of the struggle for freedom and socialism--our kind of socialism, which has its roots in the history of France and in our proud, patriotic and creative people, who are bearers of universal values."

L'HUMANITE CRITICIZES ELLEINSTEIN'S ATTACK ON PCF

LD231117 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Oct 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "J. Elleinstein on the Television"]

[Excerpt] J. Elleinstein launched an extremely violent attack on the PCF and its policy on Television Channel Two at noon yesterday.

He approved the remarks made by Laurent Fabius, who was taking part in this program, and said that "the corpse of the leftwing union is lying in Georges Marchais' drawer at Place du Colonel Fabien. While Georges Marchais has stated that the PS is swinging to the right--a question which deserved more detailed discussion, he added--"it is absolutely certain that the PCF has swung to the East, in other words that it supports all the most harmful aspects of Soviet foreign policy."

J. Elleinstein did no more and no less than to call on PCF voters to criticize PCF policy during the presidential election in order to create "the right conditions for a crisis within the PDF."

This attitude is totally foreign to a communist's behavior.

POMPIDOU ADVISOR GARAUD TO RUN FOR PRESIDENCY

NC232200 Paris AFP in English 2131 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 23 Oct (AFP)--Marie-France Garaud, considered by many to be the "eminence grise" of the late President Georges Pompidou, announced here today that she would be a candidate in the French presidential elections next year. Mrs Garaud, who was also an advisor to Gaullist Party Leader Jacques Chirac when he was prime minister, has denounced "Soviet hegemony" and has accused French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing of "going along" with the Soviet Union.

Last year, she broke with Mr Chirac, who is himself expected to enter in race, in which Mr Giscard d'Estaing has been given the edge in recent public opinion polls.

Another Gaullist, Michel Debre, is also a presidential candidate. Mrs Garaud today criticized Mr Debre for giving primacy to economic rather than political issues.

Mrs Garaud was believed to have exercised great power during the presidency of Mr Pompidou, and NEWSWEEK magazine in 1973 called her the most powerful woman in France.

MINISTER ANNOUNCES DELAY IN COMPLETION OF MIRAGE 2000

NC232214 Paris AFP in English 2150 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 23 Oct (AFP)--The building programme for the Mirage 2000 fighter plane, slated to be the backbone of the French airforce, will be delayed, Defence Minister Jeol le Theule told the National Assembly today.

A Defense Ministry official said the delay will put back the programme by six months to one year.

The major snag is over the fighter's new radar system. Planes delivered by mid-1983 will be equipped with a less sophisticated radar system which will be replaced after 1985.

The French airforce has already received 225 Mirage 2000 fighters, built by the Dassault firm.

In total, the airforce will buy 400 of the delta-winged planes.

When chosen by the French Government in 1975, the Mirage was considered one of the most sophisticated fighter planes in the world.

ASSEMBLY TO DISCUSS 1981 DEFENSE BUDGET

LD231314 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] The Assembly is to discuss the budget bill's second part, that of expenditures. Today the deputies will discuss a large part of it, the defense budget for 1981. This will reach a figure of more than FR100 billion. This is the highest of all budgets, and an increase of almost 18 percent compared with this year's budget. Here is (Patrick Mercillion):

[(Mercillion)] Yes, it reaches FR105 billion, to be quite exact. As to the figure of 18 percent, it is 5 percent higher than the national average public expenditure increase. First of all one notes the priority given to strategic nuclear forces within the context of their renewal in order to build the mobile ground-to-ground missile and the sixth nuclear submarine, the "Inflexible." One also perceives an increase in investment expenditure, that is an effort regarding equipment. However, not everybody enjoys equal treatment. Those presenting the budget to the National Assembly are satisfied with catching up regarding the air force but deplore a too low tonnage for the navy, the slow modernization of the land forces and the weakness of fuel stocks. In all, this is a budget which does not enable everything being done at once, but this is in any case a consistent characteristic of French defense budgets. This is a budget which nonetheless shows a clear effort in a time of international tension. However, unfortunately our country is almost the only one in Europe to make this effort and France can do nothing about that.

AFP: BOMB WARNING HALTS PARIS BOURSE'S OPERATIONS

NC231148 Paris AFP in English 1143 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Paris, 23 Oct (AFP)--The second bomb warning in two days caused reevacuation of the Paris Stock Exchange (Bourse) at noon today and caused the stock brokers' association to call off all stock quotations for the second straight day.

Trading on the exchange floor would have started at 12:30 p.m.

A powerful black powder time bomb was found in the Bourse on Monday and defused. It was set to explode at 2 p.m., a peak trading hour when there would have been a maximum number of casualties.

The Bourse, a symbol of "wicked capitalism" in the eyes of French leftists, has been evac- d a number of times because of false bomb warnings in the last several years. But an ymous warnings are taken seriously since a real bomb was found 3 days ago, and since another bomb killed four people outside a Paris synagogue a few days ago.

FORLANI UNVEILS NEW GOVERNMENT'S FOREIGN POLICY

AU230858 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 23 Oct (ANSA)--International prospects will become "dark" if a "serious" relationship of joint responsibility is not reestablished by the two superpowers over the crisis points in the world, according to new Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani.

Unveiling his government platform in Parliament yesterday, Forlani also urged a greater role for the European Parliament as he said his cabinet would support efforts by the U.N. Security Council to end the fighting between Iraq and Iran.

Italian foreign policy must be able to "express itself realistically and coherently with Italy's possible role," he said, as he reiterated Italian membership of the Atlantic alliance. Italy, he pointed out, supported the Atlantic Council's decision in December to "re-establish the balance altered in Europe with the adoption of new long-range theater weapons systems".

The Soviet Union recently accepted the Atlantic Council's offer for an agreement designed to limit and reduce these arms, he said, noting that these talks have just started in Geneva.

The Italian Government will "work to provide all its positive support", he said, moving on to recall Italian condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. [Words indistinct] U.N. moves over the Iran-Iraq conflict, Forlani said the Rome government continues to consider the holding of American hostages in Iran as "completely unacceptable".

On the Middle East and Palestine, he said his cabinet is convinced of the need to "speed up the pursual of an overall and lasting agreement" by urging all the parties involved to "undertake the path of negotiations".

Stressing Italian ties with Africa, Rome's program of aid to Somalia, and the recent financial agreement with Ethiopia, Forlani said that Italy would support all moves to promote a peaceful settlement of current conflicts in the Horn of Africa.

Elsewhere, he discussed relations with the United States, Canada and Japan. On East-West relations, he said he would try to build on the "positive relations installed with the Soviet Union and the other East European countries". On China, Forlani said his government notes "with satisfaction this great country's policy of opening towards the West".

In his review of Italian foreign relations, he promised a maximum commitment to intensifying relations with Latin America, Africa and Asia and discussed relations with Yugoslavia, Austria and Albania. Noting the particular importance of the situation in the Mediterranean, Forlani pointed to the agreement finalized with Malta on September 15 and described Italian relations with Libya, Egypt, Tunis, Algeria and Morocco as "intense".

Recalling the complexity of the economic moment in the world, the new premier said Rome would be working for "increasingly close cooperation among the industrial democracies and the development of harmonious relations between North and South".

"But we must keep clearly in mind that, if we do not manage to re-establish a serious relationship, an agreement, a jointly responsible search on the crisis-points between the two superpowers, the prospects will become dark", Forlani concluded.

Pledges Contacts With Opposition

AU230908 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 23 Oct (ANSA)--A new Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani pledges "respect and willingness for dialogue" towards the opposition in his platform unveiled in Parliament Wednesday evening.

Referring primarily to the Communists, the major rivals of Forlani's own Christian Democrats, the prime minister said that, "towards the opposition, the government's attitude will in any case be inspired by criteria of respect and willingness for dialogue, knowing that what is represented in this forum is part of the country's complex reality".

Forlani's new coalition is a partnership of the Christian Democrats, the Socialists, the Social Democrats and the Republicans. The Communists rank second in Parliament after the Christian Democrats, with the Socialists third.

According to Forlani, who spoke for ninety minutes, the present coalition is as much as could be realized in the present situation. "Every government formula expresses a particular moment of the political situation linked to political balances and convergencies around the platform", he pointed out. "It is in the country's general interest to seek a relationship of seriousness and coherence which permits realizing convergent and jointly responsible commitments towards a necessary objective of greater national cohesion", he added.

The first important reaction to the speech is expected later in the day when Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer is scheduled to speak in Parliament.

Friday, it will be the turn of Berlinguer's Socialist and Christian Democrat counterparts, Bettino Craxi and Flaminio Piccoli.

This morning's edition of the Christian Democrat mouthpiece, IL POPOLO stressed Forlani's openness towards the opposition together with his "frank cooperation" with the other members of the coalition. Other points underlined in IL POPOLO's editorial were the commitment to the struggle against inflation and the government's middle-term economic plans.

"A constructive [word indistinct] exchange with the opposition is emerging", commented Piccoli to reporters. "In any case, we are all in the same boat, in a moment of great crisis".

Piccoli also described Forlani's speech as "complete, very rich, above all as regards the section dealing with economic and foreign policy".

Craxi said the speech was "good" while Social Democrat Party Secretary Pietro Longo said the platform was directed with "great political sensitivity" towards the right-of-center Liberals. Longo also said Forlani's stance on relations with the Communists was "very correct".

For the Republicans, Secretary Giovanni Spadolini pointed to Forlani's "punctual fidelity" towards the agreements reached with his coalition partners and his platform's "continuity" with the basic points supported by the outgoing partnership of Christian Democrats, Socialists and Republicans.

A member of the Communist Party Secretariat, Alessandro Natta, underscored, above all, Forlani's commitment to "resuming a correct method in the relationship between government and the Parliament, and in relation among the parties".

BERLINGUER SPEAKS ON NEW GOVERNMENT IN HOUSE DEBATE

AU231935 Rome ANSA in English 1929 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 23 Oct (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer confirmed here today that his party would maintain its opposition to Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani's new government.

Speaking during the confidence debate in the lower house, Berlinguer added, however, that Communist opposition to the four-party team of Forlani's own Christian Democrats, the Socialists, Social Democrats and Republicans would be commensurate to the facts and guidelines of how the coalition governs.

Expanding the point, he said the Communists would make their contribution to solving the more urgent problems, fight to ensure that the government faces them with urgency, and firmly oppose measures considered against the workers' interests or harmful to public morality. On other points, Berlinguer voiced reserve, above all, over the attitude of the Socialists in the negotiations that led up to the formation of the new cabinet.

Turning to individual points in Forlani's platform speech yesterday, he said it was a platform of good intentions belied by the overmanning of its ranks--26 ministers and 57 undersecretaries.

He said, some of the government's commitments were among those that appear in the platforms of all governments, but are then never maintained.

On the section devoted to foreign policy, Berlinguer said it lacked the "spirit of determination" appropriate for the government of a major nation like Italy.

On its economic points, he said Italy is not irremediably "in ruins." "There are great resources," he said, "But I am also thinking of those energies pushed to the sidelines which, if left to themselves, are a source of danger."

On the Fiat affair, he described charges that his party had incited the workers to occupy the auto group's factories as "completely false and artificial."

On terrorism, he said the Communists share the "general satisfaction for the results achieved, but ask that full light be thrown on other obscure cases, stopping before no threshold."

The confidence debate is expected to end at the weekend.

AVANTI CITES POLICY CRITICISMS AT PSI COMMITTEE SESSION

LD231509 [Editorial report] Rome AVANTI in Italian 4 October 1980 carries on pages 2-5 an unattributed report on proceedings at the 3 October PSI Central Committee meeting in Rome. Directorate member Fabrizio Cicchitto, a representative of the "Socialist left" faction headed by former PSI Deputy Secretary Signorile, reportedly criticized the party for "continuous fluctuations" leading to its "political isolation," claiming that the recently deposed government became not the "transitional government for rebuilding the consitions for a national solidarity phase" but "a stronghold governed by the preferential axis between the DC preamble group and the PSI", and that "this obstructed the evolution of the political framework, thus helping to introduce conflict between the PSI and PCI." Cicchitto also called for " a foreign policy more in line with Schmidt's" and for a PSI congress "as soon as the government crisis is over."

Directorate member Giacomo Mancini, leader of another opposition faction, reportedly warned the party against "viewing our governmental participation without the Communists as a permanent fact and as an element hostile to the PCI's governmental participation."

A continuation of the report, carried on pages 2-4 of the paper's 5-6 October edition, cites leftwinger Riccardo Lombardi as expressing concern at the "protagonism" promoted by party secretary Craxi, "aimed at always putting the PSI in the limelight on both good and bad occasions", and warning that "the party must not make protagonism an end in itself." Former party secretary Francesco De Martino reportedly lamented "the fact that the Central Committee no longer reflects the decisions of the congress" and that "the party is still incapable of achieving a synthesis among various positions, a synthesis that can represent the various contrasting 'spirits' that exist within Italian socialism." Emphasizing the "pressing need to improve relations between ourselves and the PCI," De Martino claimed that "the DC is maintaining its hegemonic stance and taking advantage of the split on the left; in its maneuvers its principal target is in fact the PSI." The report states that he too criticized PSI foreign policy for "accepting the deployment of the missiles, the Olympic boycott and economic sanctions, unlike other European social democratic parties," and for failing to carry out "any action that can be even distantly compared to the actions of Schmidt or Brandt."

The report states that another directorate member Michele Achilli echoed this theme, condemning "the total subordination of Italian foreign policy to the United States" and "the complete absence of any reference to foreign policy in the secretary's report."

NAPOLITANO URGES PCI TO OPEN DIALOGUE WITH OTHER PARTIES

LD231421 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 16 Oct 80 p 2

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano article published by RINASCITA: "What Innovations (and What Is To Be Done) Following Cossiga's Downfall"]

[Text] Rome--Is everything stagnant in the Italian political situation? Giorgio Napolitano answers this question in an editorial published in RINASCITA today. Not at all, he says: Immediately after the downfall of the Cossiga government, important changes took place in two of the major parties, the DC and PSI, within the space of a few days. And now a phase of more intensive activity has begun within and among the parties.

The causes of these innovations are clear, Napolitano observes. Our party's action has exerted an influence and on several fronts (foreign policy, the functioning of the institutions, democratic order and the management of the economy). A situation of such serious division among the democratic forces has become increasingly untenable and dangerous. The Fiat dispute, the harshness of that clash, the importance of the issues at stake and the workers' commitment to the struggle have demonstrated in the strongest possible way the need for a political change.

But Napolitano asks, to what extent has there been a change hitherto? We must be prudent and realistic and at the same time manage to observe the signs of innovation. The most obvious of these is a shelving or fading within the DC of the anticommunist line, of the maneuver designed to exclude and harm the PCI, as expressed in the "Preamble." It is on this basis that it has proved possible to rebuild the unity of the DC leadership.

But one cannot deny, Napolitano adds, the degree of ambiguity which accompanies the option for a new unity within the DC leadership, which does, after all, indicate a change of direction with respect to the conclusions of the February congress. There are three essential points of ambiguity:

1--The limit--never surmounted even by the Zaccagnini-Andreotti group--with regard to the issue of government cooperation with the PCI;

2--The very prevalent tendency within the DC to counter the PSI's new pressures with a mere defense of its positions of power, instead of committing itself to a thorough change of methods in the management of public affairs;

3--The persistent tendency to avoid an unequivocal dialogue on the major choices of direction, starting with economic policy. These are problems whose acuteness cannot be escaped. We reserve judgement on whether any of these ambiguities will start to be truly resolved until the new government has been presented.

It is clear that the DC's responsibilities are the greatest; hence its greatest resistance to new approaches in government. At the same time, Napolitano points out, the DC's stubbornness and ambiguities must not constitute an excuse for the sector of the socialist leadership group that has tried to shelve the objective of the participation of both the major leftwing parties in the country's leadership, has forged links with the DC forces most hostile to such a prospect and now seems opposed to the establishment of more open attitudes within the DC.

We must therefore emphasize the contradictory nature of certain plans, the very dubious nature of a hypothesis of an agglomeration of lay socialist forces designed to compete with the DC for the country's political leadership, leaving the PCI on the outside. It is within this context too that we must view the PSI-Italian Social Democratic Party consultation pact--such a sudden response to the DC's recovered internal unity.

Obviously, the Socialist Party's position within the social and political alignment and the evolution of relations within the left or a different arrangement of its forces are now at stake. We hope it will be possible to hold discussions with the entire PSI on this point and therefore on the prospects for the left as a whole.

The real problem for us, Napolitano concludes, is not to allow ourselves to be prompted by any tendentious polemics to adopt closed stances, not to neglect any opportunity for profitable dialogue, not to limit ourselves to denouncing maneuvers and attacks against ourselves--full of dangers for the entire leftwing alignment and for the democratic movement--but to provide positive, more complete and more convincing answers to the many real demands.

VATICAN: POLISH PRIMATE ARRIVES IN ROME FOR VISIT

LD231540 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1515 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Cardinal Stefan Wyszynski, primate of Poland, arrived in Rome this morning, accompanied by Bishop Bronislaw Dabrowski, secretary of the episcopate. In the VIP lounge at the Fumicino International Airport, the distinguished visitor was welcomed by Cardinal Wladyslaw Rubin, prefect of the Congregation of Eastern Churches; Archbishop Luigi Poggi, the apostolic nuncio for special missions; [words indistinct]. Stanislaw Trepczynski, Polish ambassador in Rome, also came to welcome the visitor. This evening Cardinal Stefan Wyszynski will be received by Pope John Paul II at a private audience.

FREITAS DO AMARAL SAYS FRETILIN ACCEPTS TIMOR PLAN

[Unattributed report: "FRETILIN Accepts Portuguese Government's Plan for Timor"]

[Text] "The Revolutionary Front for an Independent Eastern Timor [FRETILIN] approves the plan of action drawn up by the Portuguese Government to attempt to resolve the Timor problem," Freitas do Amaral, who met in New York with a representative of that organization, has stated.

The deputy premier returned to Lisbon yesterday from Washington, where he had a working lunch with U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie, who was invited to visit Portugal at a date to be set in due course. A similar invitation was extended to UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim.

In a statement made before leaving the United States, Freitas do Amaral explained that he had a conversation with the FRETILIN representative that "dealt with the problem of the political solution to be found for Eastern Timor," also telling journalists that the governments plan concerning the issue "involves consultations at various levels, which will include that party and the other movements representing the people of Timor."

In this connection he emphasized that the meeting with the FRETILIN representative "represented only a preliminary and exploratory meeting," although he stated that he was "pleased to find that there is agreement between Portugal and that organization with respect to Timor's future."

When questioned by journalists about his talks with the U.S. secretary of state, Freitas do Amaral emphasized that "a broad identity of viewpoints" was ascertained.

CAPE VERDE PRIME MINISTER DESCRIBES TALKS WITH EANES, SA CARNEIRO

[Unattributed report: "Relations With Cape Verde Subject of Talks"]

[Text] The president of the republic and the prime minister yesterday received Cape Verde Head of Government Pedro Pires. During the 1-hour meeting with General Ramalho Eanes, relations between Portugal and Cape Verde and international issues were discussed. With Sa Carneiro, Pedro Pires discussed matters connected with Portuguese-Cape Verde bilateral cooperation.

On leaving Belem Palace, Pedro Pires stated that he talked with General Eanes about problems of Cape Verde which, moreover, are known to the president of the republic, who visited that country a few months ago. Economic issues were discussed and assessed in light of the successes achieved by Cape Verde.

In the international field, the Cape Verde prime minister added, African issues were highlighted, and "of course, the war between Iran and Iraq, which is worrying everybody because of its economic consequences."

A burning problem for Cape Verde is the dispute between Guinea Bissau and the Republic of Guinea, arising out of territorial claims to oil-rich areas in islands at issue between the two countries. In this connection Pedro Pires stated that the Portuguese Government promised him "its full support" for resolving the dispute, including documents in addition to those already sent to Bissau to substantiate Guinea's arguments.

Matters connected with bilateral cooperation in all fields were discussed in particular with the Portuguese prime minister. Stock was taken of previous relations between the two governments. International issues, principally connected with the northeast and south of the African continent, were also broached.

Pedro Pires, who leaves tomorrow for a visit to France, stated that there are no special reasons for his 3-day stay in Lisbon, emphasizing that it serves for contacts with the Portuguese authorities and for a brief rest.

With respect to his visit to France at the invitation of his counterpart Raymond Barre, the Cape Verde prime minister stated that the African Independence Party of Guinea and Cape Verde (the government party of Guinea Bissau and Cape Verde) hopes that France "will maintain a neutral stance, if it can make no other useful contribution," in the conflict between the two Guineas.

SOARES CARNEIRO ON FUTURE ROLE OF REVOLUTION COUNCIL

LD240230 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Presidential Candidate General Soares Carneiro said in Lisbon today that should he be elected, he will relieve the Council of the Revolution from its function as advisory body to the head of state if the councilors--considering their lack of confidence in him--fail to resign as they should, for the sake of consistency.

Speaking at a conference sponsored by the Institute of Democracy and Freedom, Soares Carneiro described Portuguese decolonization as the most painful amputation sustained by the country and stressed that historical judgment calls for its clarification. With regard to Portuguese youth, he said that he views its vote as the pure vote of hope.

MARIO SOARES BREAKS SILENCE ON POLITICAL ISSUES

LD240236 Lisbon Domestic Service in Postuguese 2300 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] In an article to be published by the weekly O JORNAL tomorrow, Mario Soares says that there is no conflict among leading bodies of the Socialist Party [PS]. Mario Soares, who has thus broken the silence he has maintained since the present crisis within the PS broke out, also asks that the demonstration scheduled for this Saturday in Rato Square be called off. He denies that he has met with members of the Democratic Alliance, as reported in some political circles.

PCP POSTPONES PARTY CONFERENCE, NO SUPPORT FOR SOARES

LD231552 Lisbon in Portuguese to Angola Mozambique and Sao Tome and Principe

[Text] Alvaro Cunhal does not back Mario Soares. This is a message the PCP secretary general delivered in an interview with DIARIO DE LISBOA published yesterday.

The Communist Party, which originally announced a party national conference for this Saturday, to debate and define its strategy on the 7 December presidential poll, has now postponed it until Tuesday, with the obvious purpose of waiting to see what emerges from this Saturday's meeting of the Socialist Party National Committee. Judging by what Cunhal said in the newspaper interview, the PCP is clearly concerned over what is happening within the Socialist Party.

In the event of Soares standing for election, Cunhal said, his candidacy would not only be one of defeat but would also represent the defeat of democracy.

On Gen Ramalho Eanes' candidacy, Cunhal had this to say in the interview: Eanes' candidacy is one which the PCP does not support, although it is being fought against by reaction en masse. Although the PCP does not back Eanes' reelection, he said, it will not pull the ground from under Eanes' feet.

Whether the PCP will put up its own presidential candidate, or whether it will back another, is expected to be known on Tuesday.

PSOE STATEMENT HITS GOVERNMENT POLICY, URGES PARTY UNITY

LD231041 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 12

[Unattributed report: "PSOE Condemns UCD and Presents Itself as Firm and Responsible Opposition"]

[Excerpt] Following its meeting over the weekend, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Federal Committee yesterday issued a political statement in which it condemns the Union of the Democratic Center (UCD) as being incapable of governing the nation, while presenting itself as a "firm and responsible opposition." The PSOE demands that the government keep its promise to submit the local government bill this month. It also makes an appeal for party unity, based both on internal democracy and on discipline.

The first part of the foremost opposition party's political statement renews criticism of the government for finding no "effective response" to our country's political, social and economic crisis. It accuses the autonomy policy of improvisation and alleges an inability to tackle the grave problems of public safety, as well as a lack of response to major foreign policy issues. In short, the PSOE finds that the government lacks a program.

With respect to the solutions which the PSOE claims to offer, the statement asserts that the resolution of the economic crisis requires the creation of jobs, promoted by a public investment plan, recovery of private investment and an efficient public sector, all this within the framework of a policy which will distribute wealth socially and improve social services. It adds the desirability of unblocking some autonomy processes, taking into account the wishes of the communities themselves. The PSOE also emphasizes the need for urgent reform of the public administration and the protection of civil rights and freedoms, such as freedom of expression, the right to objective information and the progressive regulation of divorce.

The PSOE Federal Committee positively assesses the great effort made by the municipal and provincial councils, most of which are run by Socialists. It denounces the lack of resources from which local corporations are suffering, and urges the government to ensure the municipalities' political and financial independence and to keep its pledge to submit the local government bill before November. In the socioeconomic and trade union sphere, the statement by the PSOE's top body between elections expresses support for negotiations between the social forces and the reorganization of the production apparatus. It accuses the executive power of attempting to strengthen "a certain trade union option which is very much in a minority," for the benefit of party interests.

Democracy and Discipline

As far as the PSOE itself is concerned, the Federal Committee believes that "the political and organizational effort to ensure that the party's organizational structure is more in harmony with the Socialist vote should be continued." It appeals for political unity in the party, based on internal democracy and on socialist discipline, together with internal debate, "which constitutes an essential characteristic of the PSOE." The Federal Committee adds that democratically adopted decisions and the conduct of the leadership bodies and officials "should be accepted and respected."

PSOE, PCE CONFER ON AUTONOMY PROBLEMS

LD231359 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 16 Oct 80 p 12

[Unattributed report: "PSOE and PCE Also Agree on Andalusia"]

[Text] The Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] and PCE executive committees yesterday held a meeting at which they agreed, just as the socialists and the democratic coalition had done on the previous day, that the only way to unblock the Andalusia issue is to amend the law on referendum procedures. With respect to municipal issues, it was decided to hold a further meeting to discuss the progress of the pacts in the municipal councils.

Madrid, 15 October--"Amending the law on referendum procedures is the way to unblock the Andalusian autonomy process," PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo stated at the conclusion of a meeting lasting over 3 hours this morning between the PCE and PSCE executive committees.

The two political forces agreed that this is the simplest way to conduct the Andalusian autonomy process by means of article 151 [of the Constitution]. "This is a national issue," Carrillo said, "which should be conducted through consultation among all parties, and in which there should be no impositions by the government party."

For his part, PSOE Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez stated that this meeting was necessary, since the political forces which denied the government their confidence and which were called on by the latter are entitled to contact each other and discover the degree of agreement between them.

Municipal Pacts

In addition to the autonomy issues, the two delegations discussed the leftwing agreements in the municipalities, trade unions and socioeconomic issues. "I have the impression," Mr Gonzalez stated, "that we are in the same situation as when the vote of confidence occurred--all the hope about the Andalusia issue which we might have had after the visit to the Moncloa Palace has been frustrated by a certain backtracking by the government.

"The viewpoint that the method should be to reform the referendum law is no longer being maintained. If a referendum is held on the basis of article 144, it will be consultative but not binding, and the law which results will still be something given by Madrid."

With respect to the Galicia law, the two parties made clear their common view that the agreement should be honored to the letter as it stands--a matter on which the democratic coalition also agrees.

Concerning the debate in the congress on the proposals for amending the referendum procedures, Felipe Gonzalez stated that a majority can be secured in the chamber, and expressed his opinion that a formula synthesizing the proposals submitted could be achieved by the assembly of Andalusian parliamentarians which would make it possible to unblock the process. Referring to "Convergence and union" and the Andalusian Socialist Party, he said that if these groups supported the government in the vote of confidence in order to try to unblock the Andalusian process, the PSOE would not oppose other procedures for unblocking it, especially if that proposal emanates from Andalusia.

As far as the municipal issue is concerned, it was decided that the party officials responsible for this area will meet to study the progress of the municipal agreements, as well as in order to broach the issue of the local government law. For his part, Carrillo stated that the meeting had served to consolidate the municipal pacts further, and that the need to continue these pacts had been made clear during it. Last, as far as trade union policy is concerned, Carrillo stated that in his party's opinion the trade union campaign which has now begun should be as nonaggressive as possible, to avoid being in confrontation at its conclusion--something which would make it more difficult to oppose the policy of the government and the employers.

CONTACTS IMPROVE ATMOSPHERE BETWEEN PCE, CATALONIAN PSUC

LD231513 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 21 Oct 80 p 11

[Margarita Saenz-Diez report: "Reality of PSUC Has Prevailed Over Carrillo's Viewpoints"]

[Excerpt] The PCE and Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] delegations, meeting in Barcelona on Sunday, decided not to change the present relations existing between the two parties. Thus Santiago Carrillo's attempts to subordinate the Catalonian communists' party to the PCE has given way to an acceptance of reality. In all events, the problem has been shelved.

Throughout Sunday afternoon, Santiago Carrillo, Simon Sanchez Montero and Nicolas Sartorious remained in session with the full PSUC Executive Committee, headed by Gregorio Lopez Raimundo and Antonio Gutierrez Diaz. The meeting constituted the second stage of a tense meeting held 3 October, at which the PCE secretary general asserted the desirability of ending certain practices of the PSUC, including that of openly and publicly criticizing the nationwide policy initiated by the Spanish Communist leadership.

Even at that time this initiative met with the opposition of most of the PSUC Executive Committee. In addition, during the 2 weeks which have elapsed, negative comments and reactions have occurred at many levels and in various ways, highlighting the profound negative repercussions which an attempt to impose the plan willy-nilly would have for Spanish communism.

Thus the day of the meeting--Sunday, 19 October--came. From the outset the PCE secretary general approached the issue from a different perspective. It was no longer a matter of the PCE's imposing the doctrine of democratic centralism on the PSUC but of improving the relations established between the two parties and enshrined in the rules in the section which we reproduce below, although calling for discipline.

The new approach made by Santiago Carrillo--who will have had time to reflect during his recent visit to North Korea--was favorably received by the PSUC Executive Committee. Its members argued, with only two exceptions, in favor of the PSUC's operational plan, and the need to promote internal debate, without evading the appraisal of the Moncloa pacts, the "agreed break" or the government of concentration.

PSUC Chairman Gregorio Lopez Raimundo apparently made a speech in support of consolidating the PSUC's autonomy, as did Secretary General Antonio Gutierrez Diaz. The latter also "conducted self-criticism" because of a certain ossification displayed by the already established channels of communication between the PCE and the PSUC. All of this is according to a provisional account of what happened secured by LA VANGUARDIA after many consultations, since a "pact of silence" appears to have been imposed.

Carrillo's two companions--Nicolas Sartorius and Simon Sanchez Montero--also appear to have endorsed the PSUC's viewpoints, without Sartorius referring on this occasion to the viewpoint of "a single state, a single party." As a result, the agreement "to respect what is laid down in the rules, improving the joint work of the PCE and the PSUC, as befits parties which, while being independent, are inspired by the same principles, adopt the same general policy and the same methods of organization and struggle united in the same process of transorming society," was adopted unanimously without too much difficulty.

It was also decided that a PCE delegation will explain that party's viewpoints to the PSUC Central Committee, so that, if deemed opportune, they can be included as amendments to the theses to be debated at the PSUC's fifth congress. In view of the present PSUC Central Committee's structure, initiatives which could concern a limitation of the PSUC's ability to operate independently are unlikely to have a favorable reception.

DENMARK

RADICAL LIBERALS CALL FOR GOVERNMENT'S VIEW ON NATO ARMS

LD231103 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 17 Oct 80 p 2

["C.B." report: "Radical Liberals Press for Decision on NATO Depots"]

[Text] The Radical Liberals have now placed themselves behind the call from the Liberals and Conservatives for the government to make a swift decision on its view of new NATO depots in Denmark.

Jens Bilgrav-Nielsen, Radical Liberal defense policy spokesman, told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that "defense negotiations will get no further" until the Social Democrats have had internal discussions on the depot issue.

"The government must be ready to clarify its position in time for the next meeting of the parties on 29 October. Otherwise the proposal for a new defense bill will have to be presented in the Folketing chamber, where we prefer to have discussions, rather than in closed negotiations at the Defense Ministry."

The Radical Liberal call for a government decision now is to be seen in the light of the party's national congress decision in September to oppose all further depot expansion in Denmark. On the other hand the Liberals and Conservatives have stressed that any reductions in defense make it even more important for Denmark to be in a position to receive reinforcements quickly--and thus increase the need for more depots. So far Defense Minister Poul Sogaard has said that a preliminary statement on what offers of reinforcements and depot expansion Denmark will have can be expected at the end of the year, and that a political decision will be made only after that.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATS TO DECIDE ON NATO STOCKPILING SOON

LD231225 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 20 Oct 80 p 5

["C.G." report: "Social Democratic Showdown on NATO Depots"]

[Text] The question of the extent of any new NATO depots in Denmark for storing equipment for foreign army forces looks as if it will now be decided in what is expected to be a "post mortem" within the Social Democratic Folketing group.

This will take place in advance of a Socialist People's Party Folketing question on reinforcement problems, to be dealt with in the Folketing on 30 October.

The Social Democratic members of the Folketing defense, policy and foreign policy committees and of the Foreign Policy Council will discuss the question on 23 October prior to discussion by the whole Social Democratic Folketing group. But it has already been announced that the party's chairman for the debate will be Folketing Member Lass Budtz instead of Defense Policy Spokesman Preben Steen Nielsen. BERLINGSKE TIDENDE has been told that the group has been deeply dissatisfied with Preben Nielsen's statements on the need for the NATO depots. Lasse Budtz said that his chairmanship is to be seen in the light of the fact that the government's report will be made by Foreign Minister Kjeld Olessen. Lasse Budtz is the party's foreign affairs spokesman.

Views on new NATO depots in Denmark range from Preben Steen Nielsen's statements that they are a prerequisite for Danish defense credibility to those of Folketing members Jytte Hilden and Majken Hesse that we must discuss whether "we want to make ourselves a target for bombs by setting up large depots in Jutland," and also that the question of what the depots are to contain and how large they are to be "is a knife-edge balance." "It sounds logical that since we are already in the alliance we should be ready to receive reinforcements: but it is not that simple."

Defense Minister Poul Sogaard told BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that there is nothing to stop the Social Democratic Party defining the principles for the future depots, but the defense minister maintained that no concrete decisions on the depots can be made, in that there has still been no offer from the Americans of "earmarked" troops with the concomitant need for stockpiling heavy materiel.

The move to decide on the Social Democratic position on NATO depots comes after both the Radical Liberals, who oppose the depots, and the Liberals and Conservatives, who want the depots, have demanded that the governing party swiftly reach a decision.

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE: E. BLOC READY TO 'RAISE DRAWBRIDGE' ON WEST

LD231043 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 19 Oct 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Into a New Ice Age"]

[Text] It will be a cold winter in Europe. The first frost has already hit German relations, like an advance warning of the cold front on its way from the East. With the German election out of the way the Soviet Union has begun to tighten up and when the U.S. election is over in a couple of weeks' time it will be time for the Soviet Union to put a number of problems in their place.

The Soviet leadership has had to do violence to its political character throughout this year. Its natural reaction at the time of its attack on Afghanistan would have been to slip into an aggressively defensive stance on all other fronts, a generally threatening stance, which brusquely rejected all countermoves to Afghanistan. However, for many reasons, not least because the Moscow Olympics were just around the corner, the Soviet Union chose more stylish avoiding tactics, which indicated that it was bound to return to its old ways after a while. The Soviet Union avoided confrontations also because it was not in the Soviet interest to provoke a swing to the right before the elections in Germany and in the United States. Before the Olympic games were over, developments in Poland had begun and, even though this hurt, it continued to be necessary to keep a tight rein on socialist solidarity. A direct intervention in Poland by the Soviet Union would have exploded all illusions of detente in Europe and simply have made Strauss chancellor and Reagan president.

But now the time is approaching for a cooling of the Polish summer. Last week's East German interruption of the normalization of relations between the GDR and the FRG was a clear signal that the drawbridge is about to be raised. The East Bloc is cocooning itself until events in Poland are sufficiently controlled to ensure that infection of Poland's neighbors is prevented and internal discipline is once again guaranted. The signal was not only the extortionate levies imposed on visitors from West German--that human "ersatz" for German reunification that has been the heart of the normalization policy--but also the simultaneous demand for West German recognition of the GDR as an independent nation and not just as one of two states in the German nation. It is a demand that is only made now because they know that its implementation is a political and constitutional impossibility.

The East German reflection of the toughening exactly corresponds to the attitude the Soviet Union has adopted to the preparatory negotiations for the Madrid conference on European security policy. It is negative, dismissive and unfruitful. It is the foundation for an ice-cold confrontation in Madrid, when the conference opens next month.

TRADE MINISTER COMPLETES WEST AFRICAN TOUR

LD231059 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 19 Oct 80 p 9

[Unattributed report: "Rekola Home From Africa"]

[Text] Foreign Trade Minister Esko Rekola returned on Saturday from a round trip to countries in West Africa. Rekola headed a trade delegation that traveled in Cameroon, Senegal and the Ivory Coast for 2 weeks.

During the trip the possibilities of strengthening and making more effective the trade relations and practical cooperation with countries in West Africa were clarified and investigated. In the past Finland's trade with Cameroon, Senegal and the Ivory Coast has been small. Finland has imported timber, fruit, coffee and raw phosphates from these countries; exports to them have principally consisted of paper, cardboard and chemical industry products.

PLO SPOKESMEN ADDRESS SOLIDARITY MEETING IN HELSINKI

LD231109 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 18 Oct 80 p 7

[Unattributed report: "PLO Members Attend Meeting in Helsinki"]

[Text] Organizations working for Palestinian solidarity in Europe began a 3-day meeting in Helsinki on Friday. Two representatives of the PLO are also taking part in the meeting.

The PLO representatives express the view that the security situation in the Middle East has great significance for European security. In his opening address one PLO representative said that there has been a positive development in the European nations' attitude to the Palestine question. He thought the reason for this was that the European nations have important economic, political and security interests to look after with the Arab nations.

U.S. influence in Europe is, however, so strong that it will still be a long time before all European nations recognize the PLO, he said.

The PLO representatives regretted the conflict between Iran and Iraq and said that both are the Palestinians' friends. They stressed that the PLO has succeeded in playing the role of mediator in the conflict and still wants to function as a "confidence-building bridge" between the parties.

The initiative for the meeting in Helsinki was taken by the PLO. At the meeting a total of 12 organizations from six European nations are represented. The meeting has been arranged by the Finland-Palestine Association.

During their visit to Finland the PLO representatives will meet with representatives of a number of political organizations. On Friday they met Communist Party Chairman Aarne Saarinen, and their program also includes a call on Deputy Education Minister Kalevi Kivistoe. Their program contains no official contacts with the foreign minister, for example.

NORWAY

MILITARY LEADER CALLS FOR 'CAUTION' ON NATO ARMS, HITS U.S.

LD230907 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 16 Oct 80 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Military Leader Strongly Critical of Contingency Stockpiling"]

[Text] "Contingency stockpiling of U.S. military equipment in Norway could increase tension in our part of the world," Lt Col Per Hansen, second in command, North Norway Brigade, said in an interview in FORSVARETS FORUM. He said that he understands the concern that is caused by the stockpiling of U.S. military equipment, and added that in view of this it is also understandable that many people think that contingency stockpiling is part of a military escalation.

Defense Chief Sverre Hamre said that he was staggered by the statements from Lieutenant Colonel Hansen. He told the Norwegian Broadcasting Service's Dagsrevyen news program that he personally disagreed with all the views Hansen expressed.

Hansen claimed that it has always been a fashionable attitude among Norwegian officers to be positive toward the United States and critical of defense budgets--which from the officers' viewpoint are always too low. The lieutenant colonel said that it was his duty to say what he thought, even though it was not fashionable.

Hansen said that in the past we have seen depressing examples of blunders made by the United States. As examples he mentioned the unsuccessful invasion of Cuba in 1961, the unsuccessful action to save the hostages in Iran this year, and especially the Vietnam war. Hansen is of the opinion that the United States has used up its quota of blunders and that the country must show greater talent in military and strategic questions.

He does not believe in a unilateral attack on Norway. If Norway were attacked, it would be part of a conflict between the superpowers, Hansen said.

Lt Col Per Hansen was asked yesterday in the Norwegian Broadcasting Service's Dagsnytt news program whether contingency stockpiling is not necessary to strengthen Norwegian defenses.

"We have been saying for years that it is necessary, but I think that just at present we could be a little more cautious and move a little more slowly, because a few things have happened in the world in recent months. We have Afghanistan, we have Poland, for example, and I think that we should deal very carefully with these things," Hansen said.

When asked if he thought that the government's present proposal is better than the original plans for contingency stockpiling in northern Norway, he replied in the affirmative. He also said that he thought that there was all too little debate on such questions among his colleagues within the defense forces.

"We really ought to have taken a more active part in questions like contingency stockpiling. Now I have been a little inopportune and stated my views, and started a debate in this way. I set about things somewhat drastically, so there will probably be a debate, but this should be taken as an indication that the defense forces are still comparatively free, and that it is possible for us to state our opinions if we wish," Hansen said. When asked if he expected to continue in the same way as he had done in the past, even after his statements on such a sensitive defense matter, he said that he thought that everyone with an opinion but who is not an expert ought to be allowed to give expression to it in a democratic country.

HOUSE REACTION TO GREECE'S REINTEGRATION INTO NATO

NC232042 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] At its regular session today the House of Representatives authorized its president to express House concern over the repercussions which Greece's reintegration into the military wing of NATO might have on the Cypriot issue.

Acting chairman of the session Potamitis has already sent a relevant message to Greek Chamber of Deputies President Papaspirou.

The issue was raised by AKEL parliamentary spokesman Papaioannou and a long debate was conducted on the issue.

AKEL LEADER ATTACKS DEMOCRATIC RALLY LEADERSHIP

NC230617 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 23 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The Cyprus communist AKEL Party leader Mr Ezekias Papaioannou has forecast that the new elections will be held "in the early months of next year". Speaking before the Central Committee of the party earlier this week he forecast that the House to be returned will be "democratic" and he declared open warfare against the rightwing Rally Party of Mr Kliridhis.

The AKEL Party, he said, was ready to collaborate both in the House and outside it with all forces except the Rally leadership which, he said, was identified "with the most reactionary quarters of monopolistic capital and international imperialism".

He underlined however that any collaboration must be based on the "approved and declared policy and line of struggle", meaning the policy agreed in 1977 during the lifetime of the late President Archbishop Makarios.

Mr Papaioannou said the Rally leadership is not merely "rightwing" but "courts fascism" and said return to power of the Rally would be calamitous.

"Woe to refugees and farmers and workers if the Rally leadership manages to assume power. Wild exploitation and oppression of the people will reach new heights and the present standard of living of workers will be in immediate danger. The Rally leadership will throw our people into the vortex of civil strife", Mr Papaioannou said.

He did not spare President Kiprianou in his attacks, saying that the Rally has taken advantage of the "serious errors, omissions and inconsistencies of the president of the republic" and accused him of making a reshuffle "in reactionary directions".

The AKEL leader also attacked the "anti-AKELism of the EDEK leadership" as responsible for the rift among the democratic forces. He described AKEL as a genuine communist party which is opposed to Eurocommunism and Maoism. The Rally publications would not have attacked it if it followed their favourite "Eurocommunism and Maoism", he said.

LISSARIDHIS SPEAKS ON LEBANON VISIT, CYPRUS ISSUES

LD231027 Kuwait AR-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 13 Oct 80 p 18

[Interview given to AR-RA'Y AL-'AMM and the Lebanese magazine SABAH AL-KHAYR by Chairman of the Cypriot United Democratic Union of the Center Party, Dr Vasos Lissaridhis, in Beirut during his "recent" visit to Lebanon--exact date of the interview not specified]

[Excerpts] Beirut--[Question] First of all, we would like to learn the nature of your visit to Lebanon and the discussions you have had with the political and governmental forces in Beirut?

[Answer] I came to Lebanon at the invitation of the Social Syrian Nationalist Party with which we have strong comradely and combat relations. We first had protracted talks with the leadership of the Social Syrian Nationalist Party in an atmosphere of friendship and understanding. We discussed not only the Lebanese and Cypriot issues but the overall situation in the Middle East because we believe that the Middle East issue is an entity. What the Palestinians, the Cypriots, the Lebanese, and all the national and progressive forces in the Arab world are fighting for is a common goal: To be the masters of their own fate and to be able to shape their destiny without any foreign act of kindness or imperialist plots and without being influenced by the state of instability that exists in the area as a result of sectarian, racial, tribal and regional prejudices. Because we are fighting against a common enemy, we have a common cause.

As a result of these talks, we reached identical views on how to confront the imperialist and Zionist forces in the area. We believe that these forces seek to dominate the Arab oilfields and the sensitive lines of communications in the area. In order to achieve these aims, these forces have to use policemen like Israel and As-Sadat to strike at the progressive forces in the area, particularly the Palestinian revolution represented by the PLO which is a contributory revolutionary factor to the progressive forces in our area. I can say that we reached complete agreement on the current situation in the area and on the responsibilities of the progressive forces regarding it.

I also met with Lebanese Prime Minister Dr Salim al-Huss. We exchanged views on the current situation in Lebanon and the developments of the situation in the area in a friendly atmosphere. I can say that I was extremely pleased with my talks with Prime Minister al-Huss, which can be described as fruitful, especially because we reached identical views on the means for developing the basis of cooperation between our two countries and peoples.

Naturally, I also had protracted and fraternal talks with the PLO leaders. We could not meet with Abu 'Ammar [PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat] who had been trying to mediate between Iraq and Iran, but we had talks with Abu Jihad on the same subjects as were discussed with the other forces in Lebanon. We have deep-rooted combat and organizational relations with the PLO because we consider the Palestinian cause and the Cyprus cause to be the same.

[Question] Moving on to another question. What is the latest information on the assassination attempt to which you were recently subjected in Cyprus?

[Answer] We know who is always behind such attempts. Although the finger on the trigger was believed to be Cypriot, those behind it were American and Zionist intelligence which regard our party as the only obstacle standing in the way of their expansion in Cyprus and their policy which is part of their moves in the Middle East. They are fully aware that we will never allow our country to be turned into a base for aggression against the Arab progressive forces. On the contrary, we want Cyprus to be an oasis for solidarity with the Palestinian resistance and the national movements in Lebanon and in the other progressive states in the area, such as Syria, the Libyan Jamahiriyah and the rest of the Steadfastness and Confrontation Front member states.

They have attempted to assassinate me and there is no doubt that they will try again. We are always prepared to face such cowardly criminal attempts. However, we do not believe that political assassinations can solve the problems of peoples. On the contrary, our experience proves that the blood of fallen comrades constitutes a new incentive to escalate the struggle.

By accident the assassination attempt failed. It appears that the [would-be] perpetrators were discovered several hours before the attempt was to have been implemented.

[Question] As long as we are discussing Cyprus, what, in your view, are the repercussions of the recent Turkish military coup on the internal situation in Turkey and on the problems Cyprus is experiencing through the presence of Turkish forces on its territory?

[Answer] We are aware that the army had been an effective factor in determining the internal and foreign policy even before the coup. What has now happened represents a kind of change. The American Central Intelligence Agency is behind the coup. But I do not believe that a qualitative change will occur in Turkish foreign policy because, as I have pointed out, the army had been dictating most of the foreign policy to the political leaders before the coup.

Regarding the internal situation in Cyprus, the consequences [of the coup] will be severe. As you know, Caglayangil announced a few months ago that what Turkey has taken with the gun, it will never return with the pen. It is as if our country can be "taken" just like that, or as if we are a piece of meat on a plate part of which can be carved out by anyone. The Turks have admitted occupation. It is unfortunate that Evren has announced something much more serious when he said that Cyprus is an indivisible part of Turkey. This shows that we should not expect anything other than a deterioration in the situation following the coup and that we must be prepared to confront the escalating blackmail in the area, particularly in the Aegean Sea against Greece, and also in Cyprus.

[Question] What is the role of the United States in these successive events--the partitioning of Cyprus, the coup in Turkey, and so forth? What is the aim of Washington as shown from these moves:

[Answer] Simply, it wants world monopolies to permanently control Arab oil as well as the Suez Canal and all the strategic lines of communications in the area. It also seeks to establish a series of military bases in order to have sufficient power to confront the Soviet Union and the socialist camp states--bases in Greece, Turkey, the Sultanate of Oman, Somalia, Kenya, Egypt, Israel and also Cyprus. This plan was drawn up a long time ago.

[Question] You have mentioned American bases in the area. We know that there are British bases in Cyprus. What is the role of these bases and will the United States use them?

[Answer] According to the agreement which was imposed on us by British colonialism before the independence of Cyprus, no power other than Britain is permitted to use the military bases on the island. Officially, the Americans are not allowed to use these bases, but we know that American ground and naval forces and planes and other war equipment are permanently present at the bases, in addition to the monitoring and spying equipment which provide them with information not only from the East [as published, presumably the Middle East] but also from the Soviet Union and the Balkan states.

In general, it appears that the Americans are making extensive use of these bases but, for them, this is not enough. They want to have legitimate presence in the island. As I have said, what they are now doing is illegal on the international level because Britain does not have the right to permit the Americans to use these bases.

[Question] Following the assassination of prominent PLO officials in Cyprus, your party called on the Cyprus Government to break relations with Israel but the government did not agree. Can you explain the real relationship between Israel and the Nicosia government?

[Answer] Frankly, there are no relations because to date Cyprus has not established an embassy in Israel since independence. During the first phase of its independence, Cyprus was compelled to recognize all the UN member states, including Israel. The foreign policy at the time was managed by the vice president who was a Turk. Dr Kucuk declared at the time that he would not sign the credentials of the Egyptian ambassador during 'Abd an-Nasir's regime unless Makarios signed the credentials of the Israeli ambassador.

This shows that the recognition of Israel was an operation of blackmail. It was natural for Tel Aviv after that to open an embassy in Nicosia because it was in its interest to do so. Fortunately, Cyprus has not established representation in Israel. The relations between the two sides are not good. Naturally, we prefer that no relations should exist with Israel and we regard the Israeli Embassy in Cyprus as a Mafia, as I said on previous occasions.

There are also blackmail operations on the part of the Western states which would resort to cutting off aid to Cyprus and taking severe measures against it if the government were to sever its relations with Israel. In the light of the present circumstances in the island, it is easy for these states to engage in such political blackmail operations.

[Question] What is the future of the negotiations between the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots?

[Answer] If things were confined to the negotiations between the Turkish and Greek Cypriots, they would have been settled a long time ago and in a proper manner because we believe that the interests of the Turks and Greeks in Cyprus are the same. Regrettably, however, the negotiations are not between the Turkish and Greek Cypriots but between Cyprus and Turkey and under circumstances of occupation. In fact, Rauf Denktas does not represent the Turkish Cypriots because they are suppressed by the Turkish occupation and the new Turkish immigrants.

It would be naive to believe that Ankara, which now feels stronger than at any time before, would resort to changing its stance, especially if we take into consideration Caglayangil's statements in the past and General Evren's statements at present. I do not expect any change in Turkey's stand on the negotiations. I believe that the negotiations will reach an impasse because of Turkey.

POLICE FIND FOUR TONS OF HASHISH ON LEBANESE VESSEL

NC212132 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 21 Oct 80

[Text] According to a police announcement, four tons of hashish have been found on a vessel under the Lebanese flag. The vessel had developed engine trouble and was towed into the old Limassol port yesterday. As a result of a search of the vessel, a large quantity of hashish was discovered. All eight crew members have been arrested; the crew included three Lebanese, two Italians, two Chileans and one Egyptian.

CYPRIOT-SOVIET SPORTS AGREEMENT--A protocol for cooperation in the sports field was signed in Nicosia today between Cyprus and the Soviet Union. The protocol was signed by Mr Lazaridhis, chairman of the Cyprus Athletics Organization, and Mr Ivonin, deputy chairman of the Soviet Committee for Physical Culture and Sports. The protocol provides for the exchange of coaches and athletes as well as the participation of Soviet athletes in international sports events held in Nicosia. On the basis of the protocol, the Soviet Committee for Physical Culture and Sports will also consider supplying athletic equipment to Cyprus free of charge. KKE (INTERIOR), COMMUNIST YOUTH, CONDEMN RETURN TO NATO

[Statements by the KKE (Interior) and EKON, Greek Communist Youth "Rigas Feraios" on occasion of a mass meeting scheduled for 1600 GMT in Athens against the return to NATO]

[Text] The KKE (Interior) and EKON "Rigas Feraios" have issued the following two declarations on occasion of today's mass meeting:

The KKE (Interior) Declaration

"The New Democracy government has succumbed to U.S. extortion. Secretly and acting behind the peoples' back, it signed for Greece's return to NATO's military wing. In this way it relegated to the trash can the 1974 statement that withdrawal was final and irrevocable.

"It accepts as allies the chauvinists of Ankara who occupy 40 percent of Cyprus and who promote their territorial claims against our country. It chains Greece more tightly to NATO's chariot at a time when the U.S. imperialists fan the flames of war in the Persian Gulf and the Middle East, prepare for interventions and threaten to sweep our country into buccaneering adventures.

"Our people feel concern and humiliation and they demand:

"--out of NATO;
"--bargaining between the government and NATO must cease;
"--the new agreement must be placed before the people for consideration the soonest possible;
"--the right wing must go."

The EKON "Rigas Feraios" declaration

"In 1974 Karamanlis [stated]: Greece withdraws from NATO finally and irrevocably 'after the demonstrated inability of the Atlantic alliance to prevent Turkey from creating a state of confrontation between two allies.'

"In 1980 Rallis [stated]: 'The government believes that Greece's reattachment to the military wing of the alliance strengthens our country's international position and defense capability and for this reason it considers it a positive event.'

"What happened in between? Did the Turks leave Cyprus? Did they give up their claims over the Aegean?

"None of this happened. The government succumbed to U.S.-NATO extortion. Out of NATO; the right wing must go."

BRIEFS

COMMUNIST YOUTH TO BEIJING--For the first time Greek youth has been formally invited to visit China. Representatives of "Rigas Feraios" (young Euro-communists) left yesterday for Beijing. They included Mrs Elli Papakonstandinou (second secretary of the Central Council), Mr Vangelli Rologi (secretary of the international relations department) and Mr Nikos Lakka (secretary from Epirus). The visit will last two weeks and takes place within the framework of an "opening" and re-establishment of relations between the Chinese Communist Party and the Western Eurpean communist parties. BENELUX COUNTRIES REQUIRE VISA OF TURKISH CITIZENS

TA231728 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] It has been announced that the Benelux countries--Belgium, Netherlands and Luxembourg--will impose a visa requirement on Turkish citizens as of 1 November. According to ASSOCIATED PRESS and REUTER, the announcements were made simultaneously in the capitals of Belgium and Netherlands.

A statement issued by the Belgian Foreign Ministry noted that the decision on the visa requirement was taken for economic and social reasons. Explaining the decision on the visa requirement, Netherlands Foreign Minister Van der Klaauw said that following the visa requirement imposed on Turkish citizens by other European countries, the Netherlands became the most attractive country for Turkish workers. Van der Klaauw said: Our decision is not political. It is not a decision directed against the Turkish Government or Turkish citizens. It is a decision based merely on economic reasons.

Meanwhile, in a statement issued in Ankara, Foreign Ministry Spokesman Ambassador Savlet Aktug said no information has yet reached the ministry regarding the details of the visa requirement, but it is noted that the requirement is temporary. Aktug said the public will be informed as soon as such information reached the ministry.

The FRG and France have imposed a visa requirement on Turkish citizens since 5 October. Switzerland announced it would require a visa for Turkish citizens as of 1 November.

INTERIOR MINISTER URGES NEW GOVERNORS TO BE IMPARTIAL

TA240826 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0800 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Interior Minister Selahattin Cetiner has said that existing problems in the country will be solved with an Ataturkist, contemporary and rational approach. Speaking at a meeting in Ankara attended by the newly appointed governors of 27 provinces, Cetiner called on them to act with full impartiality. Stressing that there are still harmful and dangerous militants [civil servants] in the public establishments waiting for the right moment to strike, the interior minister stated that if these people could not be won over they should be removed from office.

The meeting held at the Interior Ministry was also attended by Gen Sedat Celasun, the gendarme commander and a member of the National Security Council, and by the security director general, Lt Gen Hayrettin Tulunay.

The new governors of 27 provinces then visited the Ataturk mausoleum and paid their respects. They will be received by head of state General Evren and Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu in the afternoon.

VOTCP DENOUNCES GENERAL ROGERS' AEGEAN PLAN

TA221407 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Station commentary: "Aegean Should Be a Lake of Peace and Not of Tension"]

[Text] Dear listeners, NATO's Rogers plan concerning the Aegean has begun to be implemented following intense negotiations in Ankara and Athens. The primary goals of the plan are to secure Greece's return to NATO, to strengthen the southeastern flank of this aggressive organization and to place Aegean air and waters under the control of NATO and its chief boss, the United States.

The document hastily approved by the NATO Planning Committee at NATO Headquarters in Brussels announces that Greece has returned NATO and that the military command group to be established in the Aegean will be under the command of Rogers, the NATO Armed Forces commander. However, Greece's return to NATO is not as simple as it seems. Taking into consideration the interests of imperialism in the region and supported by pro-NATO forces that are [words indistinct] national interests in Greece, sovereign NATOite circles have announced Greece's return to this aggressive bloc. However, there is also Greek people to consider. This group of people--its communists, socialists, workers, toilers, intellectuals and civil servants--has gone into the streets to demonstrate against imperialist plots and for its national interests. The Greek Communist party and PASOK have expressed their opposition against this document of treachery which will soon be submitted to the Assembly. All the vanguard forces of (?the country) have initiated an extensive campaign to prevent Parliament's approval of this plan which aims at further involving Greece in the military adventures of NATO and the United States in the region. The mass demonstrations held in Athens and other Greek cities show that the Greek people will not succumb to NATO pressures, and that it will continue its determined struggle for peace and security in the region and for friendship among peoples.

As for Turkey, this so-called solution to the Aegean problem imposed by NATO pressure and control has created reaction within and among RPP circles and the armed forces. This has also been reported by the Western press. However, [words indistinct] which was the result of intense negotiations, has been concealed from the public. Therefore, this NATO plan on the Aegean, which is being implemented, has [words indistinct] reaction by Turkish public opinion. The imperialist press [words indistinct].

The militarist junta, which has abolished basic rights and freedoms, is trying to make our people ratify the adventurist plans of imperialists and the treacherous documents that trample on our national rights through terrorist bills and methods of oppression. Actually, this was the major reason for seizing power. Their aim is to crush all domestic opposition, to strengthen Turkey's ties with NATO and the United States and to make our country a tool for imperialist adventures. However, how long will the junta bayonets be able to prevent the people from expressing their wishes and from securing their national rights? Our people will not tolerate the presence of NATO and U.S. aircraft armed with nuclear weapons, of warships spreading death in our skies and waters and the transformation of our country into a tool of aggression and a threat against our neighbors. The working class, our people and the progressive patriotic forces have acted many times in the past. Even the Demirel government did not dare ratify the bilateral slavery agreement signed with the United States at the assemblies due to the mass anti-imperialist demonstrations in our country.

The head of the junta, Evren, and Karamanlis have sold their countries' national interests to the imperialists. Following its move in the Persian Gulf, the United States, through aggressive NATO, has now seized the Aegean. With the exception of the Aegean air and water control, NATO and the United States, have, for the time being, cast aside other regional problems. However, important problems such as the Aegean continental shelf and the exploitation of the rich oil reserves in the region will exacerbate the Turkish-Greek conflicts which are claimed to be solved. These problems will further increase tension in the region and conflicts between the countries. The Aegean agreement can accomplish nothing other than creating problems such as those created following the Camp David agreement. Now the power to create tension between the two countries is in the hands of the Pentagon. The junta, which has sold out national interests to the United States and to NATO, has thus shouldered great responsibility. The pro-American junta will not be able to handle this responsibility.

A realistic solution cannot be found to the Aegean problem under the control of the United States and NATO. Therefore, unity against the junta, the intermediary of NATO and the United States in our country, has gained more importance.

POLLS SHOWS MOST BELGIANS AGAINST DEPLOYMENT OF U.S. MISSILES

LD270927 Brussels LE SOIR in French 19-20 Oct 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "The Majority of Belgians Do Not Want the Missiles"]

[Text] An opinion poll published by our colleague L'EVENEMENT comes at an oppropriate time to give a casting vote in the quarrel dividing the political class as to the appropriateness of accepting U.S. missiles on Belgian territory. This opinion poll carried out by INUSOP among 2,000 people shows that 41.7 percent of our compatriots are opposed to the deployment of U.S. missiles in our country while 25.8 percent are in favor; those who said they did not know came between the two with 32.5 percent.

It should be noted that the wording of the question strove to express what is at stake in the debate as clearly as possible since it read: "In view of the Soviet missiles deployed in Europe, do you think that Belgium should agree to the deployment of U.S. missiles on its territory?"

There is no antagonism between the communities on this issue: The figures are almost identical for the country's three regions.

It is in other spheres that the differences are more clearly seen: Only 20 percent of women answered "yes" to the question as against almost 32 percent of men. There was also a marked age difference: The answer "yes" was low among those under 25 years old (16.5 percent) and those over 65 years old (23 percent). It achieved its best score in the group of people between 35 and 45 years old (31.3 percent).

The workers are massively opposed to the deployment of the missiles (46.5 percent). The "yeses" win, by a narrow margin however, among cadres and professional people (37.7 percent as against 35.4 percent).

Finally the "yeses" and "noes" were largely divided as expected over the political spectrum: From the Communists (84 percent said "no") to the French-speaking Liberals (55 percent said "yes"). Strangely enough, the majority of their Flemish colleagues in the Party of Freedom and Progress said "no" (40.3 percent against 26.9 percent). Is this the effect of Mr Van Miert's personal influence? Nonetheless there were more "yeses" among French-speaking Socialists (29 percent) than among Flemish Socialists (17.3 percent).

LE SOIR EXAMINES BELGIAN EFFORTS TOWARD REGIONAL DISARMAMENT

LD271025 Brussels LE SOIR in French 22 Oct 80 p 3

[Unattributed report: "Belgium's Action Within United Nations To Promote Regional Disarmament"]

[Text] While Belgium is taking part in various actions to promote disarmament--at the Vienna talks, in the disarmament committee in Geneva or in the framework of the CSCE conference--it has instigated its own initiative within the United Nations: The study or regional disarmament. It was this fact that Foreign Minister Nothomb stressed on the occasion of disarmament week organized by the United Nations and due to start on 24 October.

This was how he presented the study on all aspects of regional disarmament carried out by a group of 10 government experts under the chairmanship of a Belgian--Ambassador Albert Willot. This document, which has just been completed and will be sent to the UN secretary general in November, has been adopted unanimously--a fact which deserves to be emphasized.

This study describes the significance, value, advantages and resources of the regional approach to disarmament and arms control. It reviews all past and present efforts in order to learn the appropriate lessons from them. It examines the bases of regional disarmament, in other words the principles and directives on the basis of which efforts in this sphere should be made. It comprises a list of disarmament and arms control measures which, according to the circumstances, could lend themselves to a regional approach.

This list of measures covers the nuclear sphere as well as the conventional spheres and ranges from the most ambitious to the most modest measures.

It seems that no disarmament or arms control measure has any meaning unless it fully respects the principle of undiminished security for all the states concerned, individually and collectively. This truism is equally valid at world and regional level.

In addition any regional disarmament or arms control effort must remain compatible with efforts being made at world level, in the context of progress toward the ultimate objective of general and complete disarmament.

Similarly, regional disarmament can only result from the association of states, motivated by fairly convergent or parallel security interests, in one "region" for the needs of study, negotiation and implementation of specific disarmament or arms control measures on their territories and/or in their armed forces.

These are all questions which the study carried out by the experts examines in detail.

Mrs Gastaut, director of the UN bureau in Brussels, has also referred to the celebration of disarmament week proclaimed by the UN General Assembly and the importance of mobilizing public opinion at a time when the arms race will swallow up $500 billion (15,000 billion Belgian francs) in 1980.

DPA: NETHERLANDS MINISTER ON GDR MEASURES, POLAND, NATO MISSILES

LD261552 Hamburg DPA in German 1447 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] Stuttgart (DPA)--Netherlands Foreign Minister Christoph Van Der Klaauw has criticized the latest demarcation measures by the GDR. Nevertheless, the West ought to continue to try and obtain a "positive reply from the Eastern side" at the CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid both as regards disarmament as well as human rights and economic cooperation, the minister said on Sunday evening in an interview for South German Radio.

Van Der Klaauw also warned against interfering in Poland. Only in that way could genuine results be achieved in Madrid. Bonn and The Hague agree on continuing the policy of detente. The minister affirmed the Dutch Government's resolution of deciding on the deployment of NATO medium-range missiles in Holland at the end of next year. An important yardstick will be the state of negotiations between the United States and Soviet Union. "If there is going to be no progress, then the Netherlands will have to adopt the resolution and join in," Van Der Klaauw said.

An editorial version of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL, DOMESTIC ISSUES

DW241423 Bonn DIE WELT in German 24 Oct 80 pp 1-3

[Peter Boenisch and Ulrich Lueke undated interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn]

[Text] WELT: Many people say that detente policy has failed, and you, Mr. Foreign Minister, say that there must be a "realistic detente policy." Do you still maintain this position after the latest developments?

Genscher: Ever since I took charge of the office of foreign minister I have underscored the necessity of a realistic detente policy. This is intended to mean two things: First, detente policy is possible only on the basis of the alliance and the European Community. Second, detente policy must also include setbacks in its calculations. Interpreting detente policy in this way I am for the continuation of a realistic policy of relaxation of tensions. But, this must be wanted by both sides. Unilateral mitigation of tensions is not feasible.

WELT: Nobody has any objection to a careful German foreign policy, especially with Germany being divided. But don't you think that the East needs to be told that it cannot have both delimitation in politics and economic cooperation?

Genscher: Delimitation cannot and must not be answered with delimitation on our part. Viewed from this angle it would be utterly wrong were we to repay the measures of the Eastern side in kind. We would thereby play into the hands of the promoters of delimitation in the East. This is why a clearly recognizable intention to cooperate must be counterposed to delimitation.

Economic problems will increasingly determine the policy of the communist states, of the Warsaw Pact states. The economic problems now being admitted in the Soviet Union form but the tip of the iceberg, if I may put it that way. In assessing this state of affairs it is necessary to keep in mind, however, that economic cooperation between West and East is not a one-way street for advantages leading from East to West. Granted, there is also considerable interest in cooperation on the Western side. However, the West would be neglecting its own interests if it were to make itself dependent, for instance, by trading with the East too strongly under the aspect of safeguarding jobs, or in the energy sector by allowing the East to provide such a large proportion so that dependence ensues. Neither case applies, at least not as far as the Federal Rpublic is concerned.

WELT: So you believe that after the U.S. elections the Soviet Union will return to a policy of coexistence as a result of economic circumstances and discontinue the present course of confrontation?

Genscher: I believe the West must push the Soviet Union into a situation where it has to decide whether it wants cooperation or confrontation, doing so by means of a clear wish for cooperation in all fields.

WELT: Do you see a chance that this will succeed?

Genscher: After all, the communique following the Warsaw Pact foreign ministers' meeting indicates the intention to cooperate on the East bloc's part in an important field: arms control and disarmament. This must now prove its worth in practice. We will know at the end of the Madrid conference what this is all about. The other side must be taken at its word, in the full knowledge that the disarmament dialogue between West and East may have a great stabilizing effect.

This also is the reason why the Western alliance advocates calling a European disarmament conference, the activation of the MBFR negotiations in Vienna, U.S.-Soviet negotiations on medium-range weapons and the ratification of SALT II. The test for all this will be whether the East will be receptive to the Western proposals to agree on confidence-building measures for all of Europe--meaning the inclusion of the entire European part of the Soviet Union. Exempting the Soviet Union would not only be at odds with the Helsinki final act, but would also be violating the principle that confidence is indivisible, even regionally.

WELT: You say "confidence-building measures." Do you mean to say that you do not expect an invasion of Poland by the Soviets?

Genscher: We should do everything to avoid giving the other side any pretext for that as a result of our behavior.

WELT: That is a very cautious answer. Does this mean that the climax of the glacial period we are having in Europe has not yet been reached?

Genscher: I would not want to talk of a glacial period. We should avoid conjuring it up by talking about it.

WELT: Are you, who was born in Sachsen-Anhalt, hit particularly hard by the fact that the mandatory currency exchange aggravates inter-German contacts?

Genscher: I hope that everybody in our country takes it equally hard. But perhaps I can muster special understanding for the needs of the Germans in the GDR. We are aware that historical developments in the world today are oriented toward three factors: the right to self-determination, human rights and overcoming obstacles rather than creating new trenches and borders. In this respect we are on the side of progress.

WELT: Let us shift to domestic policy, Mr. Genscher. What is the motto for the next 4 years of social liberal government?

Genscher: I think you should not view these 4 years only in relation to the duration of a legislative period. There is some truth indeed in what people say, namely, that the policy of the eighties will be shaped in these years.

To start with foreign policy, we must be a veritable advocate of cooperation in the world, and despite all adverse developments we must try time and again to turn the eighties into a decade of disarmament. Our saying that we do want this disarmament but that we are not dreamers who believe that disarmament is a one-sided affair illustrates that we are not harboring any illusions. We advocate the balance of armaments on as low a level as possible. Mankind must make the resources available for the peaceful development of the Third World. This is an historical task.

WELT: You have answered our question about domestic policy largely with foreign policy arguments. Why?

Genscher: An isolated existence for the FRG is neither conceivable nor possible. The limits of the options of our country are largely determined by factors outside the country: commitment toward the Third World, energy supply, energy prices, raw material prices and so forth.

WELT: You have always been an Atlantic advocate by conviction. Does the alliance retain a special significance for you in the eighties as well?

Genscher: This is what I meant a while ago when I said that realistic detente is possible only on the basis of this alliance. The FRG and the Europeans affiliated with the Atlantic alliance must not forget at any time that they are not standing between the great powers, but that they are part of the one Western world.

European integration would be running after a wrong goal if through progressing toward unification it should want to drift away from the United States. European integration has to mean the enhancement of the weight of Europe in the Western alliance as a steadfast part of the Western community.

WELT: Back to the coalition negotiations, Mr Genscher. The slogan there over and over again is austerity. Where do the liberals want to start?

Genscher: We are looking forward to receiving the figures which the finance minister will submit to us. There are no taboos as far as we are concerned. I am quite happy to note that my Bundestag faction colleague Hoppe was the first in a long time to draw attention to the need for limiting the expansion of the budget. He was initially criticized also from among the coalition; subsequently he was followed by the CDU and in the end even by the bishops' conference. But he was the one who flashed the signal in that respect. We will deal quite consistently with any realistic austerity proposal in the budget.

WELT: Does this also mean cuts in existing expenditures?

Genscher: Yes. After all, anybody knows from their own personal life that they must examine time and again where austerity can be applied. We did not stage an election race filled with promises, and so we do not have the retract any miraculous things, either.

WELT: How about the SPD promise regarding coal and steel pool codetermination rights? Will that codetermination appear in the coalition agreement?

Genscher: You should not ask me that question. We consider the current state of legislation as good and correct because the 1976 bill is the most progressive codetermination bill in the whole world. We must wait for the SPD suggestions. An SPD-wide suggestion does not exist. Important signatures are missing on the initial motion from the last legislative period, such as the signature of Deputy Schmidt-Bergedorf. I respected that greatly at the time and I still do.

WELT: Mr. Genscher, you have warned particularly against fluctuating majorities when it comes to the coal and steel pool.

Genscher: I warned against fluctuating majorities in general. If fluctuation becomes a routine affair--such things happened at the end of the last legislative period--the opposition will rule in the end because it will side with one or the other government party. That would not have a positive effect on the government's ability to act, and I say therefore that this is more than a procedural matter. It is a matter of the government coalition's ability to act. I prefer to belong to governments which are able to act.

WELT: You warned simultaneously against falsifying the election results toward the left.

Genscher: Not simultaneously, but I did.

WELT: Was there a reason?

Genscher: No, I spoke in general terms saying: "This is the mission of 5 October 1980." On that day the voters decided in favor of the center, of progress, reason and a sense of perspective, in other words, not for stagnation. It would therefore be wrong for the Union to believe that it was a mandate to march in place. On the other hand, it would be wrong for some Social Democrats to think they needed to correct toward the left the decision in favor of the center.

The decision toward the center must materialize in the policy of the coming years if the voter is not to get the impression that the parties of the German Bundestag-- This applies not merely to the government parties--have not heard his signal.

We were the party which clearly said that we consider ourselves a party of the center, and it obviously prompted the voters to vote for us. Seen that way it is not merely a mission for the FDP, but the two other parties will also have to consider whether they shouldn't also move toward the center.

I believe in general that it is a most significant task for a liberal party in our constitutional and social system to bring about over and over again a concentration of the political parties in the center, and not to create rifts one is familiar with from other Western democracies.

WELT: And yet your statements created public friction with Mr Brandt. Do you think that is a ritual of coalition talks, or is there a fundamental difference?

Genscher: One cannot say that there was friction.... I did not intend to have friction. That is not my way of doing things. I believe that Mr Brandt did not want it either.

WELT: Another politician approached you in your spirit. Franz Josef Strauss said that the FDP is their natural coalition partner. What would have to happen for you to be able to say the same about the Union?

Genscher: I know neither natural nor unnatural coalition partners. I do not want to comment on all the statements made by Mr Strauss about the FDP after the elections. In doing this I would have to include others, and I do not want to mention those he made prior to the elections. I find that there are statements made and signals set for the Union camp rather than the FDP.

WELT: So you do not believe that what the SPD and FDP have in common is slowly petering out or exhausting itself?

Genscher: There are new tasks where the ability to rule together will have to stand the test again.

WELT: Does the FDP have that ability? One hears, for example, that Graf Lambsdorff did not prevail in matters of energy policy.

Genscher: On the contrary, the energy policy of the federal minister of economics, based on the decisions of the Bremen FDP congress and on the election program, was fully confirmed in our session on Tuesday.

WELT: Can you describe how the FDP could make the numerous SPD and Union voters it won in the elections into permanent FDP voters?

Genscher: If people voted FDP, I can only consider them FDP voters and not CDU or SPD voters. But our mission is to have them become permanent FDP voters. In order to do this one must know why they voted SPD. For personal reasons? For objective reasons? As a result of the practical policy of the past 4 years? The most important thing the FDP must show is continuity in all fields, ranging from the program to the person. Moreover, the FDP must exploit time and its success to eliminate the white dots on the map; it must strengthen its organizational structure.

WELT: In saying white dots, you mean areas where the FDP is poorly represented or not at all....

Genscher: Yes, but also areas where we have organizational white dots, and where only the unbelievable idealism of our members enabled us to conduct an election campaign, an election campaign that was facilitated by the federal party, its federal manager and its secretary general who came up with first class material and excellent goals.

WELT: But the party was ungrateful, particularly toward this efficient secretary general. It did not give him a seat. Will that be corrected?

Genscher: I am convinced that some of the people who raised their eyebrows when the secretary general showed serious interest in a seat--which I supported--that these people would like to forget what they did. I will see to it that proper consequences will be drawn.

WELT: The secretary general is somewhat bitter. Will Guenter Verheugen still be in office in late December?

Genscher: First, he is not bitter, and second, he will be in office.

WELT: A final personal question: With whom does the human being Genscher and the minister want to create better relations?

Genscher: That is particularly difficult to say for a foreign minister. As a member of the Federal Government and as the FDP federal chairman I would like to see us succeed in more clearly stressing the objective differences between the parties than in the past, and to blow aside the propagandistic clouds of fog. We will then see that the objective differences are smaller than they seem.

WELT: Aren't there also states with which we previously had very friendly relations, relations that have somewhat cooled off lately? For example, our relations with Israel. Will the visit of the Israeli foreign minister help to improve matters?

Genscher: I will do everything in this respect. I recently said on television in the election campaign how much I was depressed by the fact that one sometimes speaks in an ice-cold way of German-Israeli relations, as if our Middle East policy were a matter of a fishery quarrel between New Zealand and Australia. It is important to make the people of this country aware of what ties we have with Israel.

WELT: We wish you success.

On Relations With GDR

LD262105 Hamburg DPA in German 1030 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 26 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has asked the GDR to return to "businesslike cooperation with the Federal Republic on the basis of the treaties concluded." Once this has happened then Bonn also will not hesitate to continue efforts at improving inter-German relations at the point where they have been affected by measures which the Federal Republic can not condone, Genscher emphasized on Sunday in his party's press service.

The vital precondition for further progress in Deutschlandpolitik for the benefit of the peoples in the two German states is, according to the minister, "for neither of the sides to make unreasonable demands on each other such as the GDR recently did vis-a-vis the Federal Republic." "Second, nobody should attempt to undermine or call into question agreements jointly adopted, as happened recently with the GDR increasing the minimum exchange amount," Genscher wrote. "Such attempts cannot be accepted in the interest of a realistic policy of detente, which must also include the predictability of the partners."

The foreign minister recalled that the two states are shouldering a considerable responsibility for peace, stability and cooperation in Europe. "We know that this is also in our interest. We expect that the GDR also will recognize its interests and act in accordance with its responsibility."

Progress in inter-German relations will have a positive effect on the climate in Europe. Reaction [rueckachritte] will have negative effects. In Genscher's view the GDR leadership has "obviously been guided by political and not by fiscal motives" in the drastic increase in the minimum exchange amount to be paid by visitors from the West. East Berlin obviously thought there was little danger that such steps, aimed at demarcation, would jeopardize the improvements in East-West relations created with great pains in the 1970's.

ENVOY PROTESTS EAST BERLIN RESTRICTIONS ON FRG JOURNALISTS

LD231720 Hamburg DPA in German 1614 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Excerpt] East Berlin, 23 Oct (DPA)--The head of the permanent mission of the Federal Republic in East Berlin, State Secretary Guenter Gaus, protested today against the latest work restrictions imposed on West German correspondents, to Karl Seidel, a department head in the GDR Foreign Affairs Ministry. According to a spokesman for the mission, Gaus referred to the exchange of letters at the end of 1972 on the working conditions for journalists in the two states and also to the aims set down in the final act of the European security conference for expanding the exchange of information. Seidel rejected the protest, it was stated.

The mission refused to comment on the question of whether the issue of the drastic increases in the minimum compulsory currency exchange for Western visitors to East Berlin and the GDR had been raised. Observers assumed, however, that this subject had been broached.

The GDR Foreign Ministry has prohibited three permanently accredited correspondents from the Federal Republic from reporting on the autumn session of the land synod of the Sachsen Evangelical Church. Contrary to tradition, it was announced that permission would have to be granted for this purpose.

CARSTENS VIEWS GDR MEASURE AS 'SERIOUS SETBACK'

LD261212 Hamburg DPA in German 1124 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 26 Oct (DPA)--The increase in the compulsory minimum exchange amount when traveling to the GDR cannot be simply accepted in the opinion of Federal President Karl Carstens. Carstens said on North German Radio [NDR] on Sunday he would welcome it if the parties represented in the lower house were to find more common ground concerning this question regarding the GDR.

This "serious setback" to the policy of detente confirmed in the opinion of the federal president the doubt which had existed right from the start concerning the communist countries' ability to open up toward the West. Although he was in favor of attempting to achieve detente with the East, one would always have to bear in mind "that the East, especially the Soviet Union itself, is pursuing this policy of detente with objectives which are quite different from ours," Carstens added.

THATCHER TO MEET WITH SCHMIDT ON 16-17 NOV

LD241120 Hamburg DPA in German 1044 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--The British prime minister, Margaret Thatcher, is to meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn on 16-17 November. The Federal Press Office announced today that the meeting is within the framework of the regular German-British consultations. The two foreign ministers, Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Lord Carrington, will take part in the discussions.

FORLANI GOVERNMENT RECEIVES VOTE OF CONFIDENCE

LD251319 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1306 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Summary] Forlani's four-party government has received a vote of confidence in the Chamber of Deputies. Of 621 deputies, 612 were present for the vote. The majority required was 307. The result of the vote was 362 in favor and 250 against, with 9 abstentions from the Liberals.

Party Statements

AU251555 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Rome, 25 Oct (ANSA)--Aye votes were cast by the four government parties, Forlani's Christian Democrats (DC), the Socialists (PSI), Social Democrats (PSDI) and Republicans (PRI) plus the representative from the Valdostan. Ballots were cast against the coalition by the Communists, Radicals, the members of the independent left in the house, the Proletarian Unity Party and the Neofascist MSI. The representatives of the tiny right-of-center Liberal Party abstained. On Monday, the confidence debate shifts to the Senate and a vote in the upper house is expected for mid-week.

[Passage indistinct] his reply to confidence debate and before balloting got underway, statements were delivered by each of the parties. The Liberals explained that their decision to abstain "means confidence but not unconditional confidence". For the leftwing independents, who turned thumbs down on the new coalition, "Forlani's government program is a general commitment of promises". The Republicans, the smallest party in the coalition, underscored the "seriousness of the economic situation" and the "urgent need to continue with a rigorous policy implementing sacrifices and curbing public expenditures".

The opposition Radicans linked their vote to the charge that the government program fails to "mark a single step forward on the problem of hunger in the world, on military spending, the conditions of young people, the drug problem, nuclear power development, justice and the issue of law enforcement".

The Social Democrats, number three in the four-party majority, affirmed that, "this government has been formed with all the elements necessary for governing well". The Socialists, the nation's third largest party trailing the Christian Democrats and the Communist Party by several percentage points, reconfirmed their desire for a coalition which "assures the country democratic leadership and is committed to assuring the largest possible consensus for extending the grassroots of the majority".

The Neofascist MSI M.P.'s motivated their opposition on what they see as the desire of the new government to "endorse the requests of groups within the coalition to establish an understanding for cooperation with the Communists". The Communists, the major opposition alignment, argued that "Forlani's cabinet, like the one led by Francesco Cossiga (whose resignation on September 27 opened the government crisis, ed) does not represent an adequate response to the needs of the country". For the ruling Christian Democrats, "Forlani's government fits into ordered and democratic development, into traditions of growth. It did not arise out of the ashes of the Cossiga government", according to the DC, "but received its legacy".

Forlani on Objectives

AU251608 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Text] Rome, 25 Oct (ANSA)--Italian Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani put in a fresh appearance in the lower house today to reply to points raised during the confidence debate on his new government program unveiled Wednesday.

Before moving on to specific issues, the head of the new coalition of his own Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI), Social Democrats (PSDI) and Republicans (PRI) listed a series of priorities for his cabinet which won the confidence of the house in the afternoon. The prime minister singled out "the modernization and recovery of the economy and advancing the levels of production and services up to those in the other industrialized countries" as the top objectives in his program, followed by "developing agriculture and the depressed southern regions, the restructurization of the nation's great urban areas and closing the gap between housing supply and demand".

Still on the domestic front, Forlani cited the goals of "revitalizing the nation's institutions, safeguarding democratic law and order, eliminating terrorism and combatting crime in general and broadening the roles of local administrations".

Priorities for Italy abroad, according to the prime minister's statement, will include the nation's "full participation in the European Economic Community and the Atlantic alliance and a higher level of international cooperation in the search for security and peace."

Forlani went on to devote considerably more attention to Italian foreign policy in today's reply as compared to the section dealing with these issues in the platform presented Wednesday. "In fact", the prime minister said, "the government agrees with some recommendations formulated in this assembly for Italy to act on the appropriate occasion on initiatives for peace, disarmament, arms shipments, the North-South dialogue and development".

The new head of government then cautioned that, "these recommendations, however, must not be understood as detrimental to the fundamental ties which assure for our country defense guarantees within the framework of joint efforts along with other allies, with a limited national burden, and to the prospects of entering into a political and economic area which, we hope, will be increasingly extended and characterized by the inclusion of other democratic countries on our continent."

Opening up the section of his reply dealing with specific issues raised during the debate, Forlani affirmed Italy condemns "anti-democratic regimes which have taken over power and wield it in a number of Latin American countries and on other continents".

In reference to "judiciary proceedings underway in South Korea against (opposition leader) Kim Tae-jung", Forlani recalled that at the very beginning of the trial, the Italian Embassy in Seoul "obtained the right to attend the trial, in turn with other European Community colleagues.

"Concurrently", the prime minister reported, "steps have been taken with the authorities of that country with the firmness the case requires. Similar steps have been taken in Rome with the South Korean Embassy and the government has the precise intention to continue applying all possible pressure to save the life of the South's political leader".

Moving on to the situation in the Middle East, Forlani referred to the European Community Council of Ministers declaration of June this year, "which fully reflects the principles and assessment of Italy", and the prospect for a new three-way summit between Egypt, Israel and the United States.

The prime minister also reiterated "the need for a comprehensive settlement through negotiations involving all sides, including the Palestine Liberation Organization".

The head of government brought up the need for negotiations again when mentioning the hostilities between Iran and Iraq. Speaking of Italy's relations with Iraq, Forlani said that all dealings, especially those on the level of scientific and nuclear cooperation, "are rigidly subordinated to full respect for Italy's contractual obligations toward the Nonproliferation Treaty". Dealings with Iraq "for the construction of some naval vessels", the prime minister said, consist of "negotiations underway for some time now but which have not led to the formalization of a contract".

Berlinguer, Other Leaders' Remarks

LD232006 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The Liberal Party has decided to grant Forlani its abstention for the time being, a decision taken after much argument among the leadership; it is in any case a positive factor for the prime minister. Conversely, the Communist Party will remain in opposition, which however will be commensurate to the actions of the government. Nevertheless, it is prepared to contribute to the solution of the country's most pressing problems. This was stated by Enrico Berlinguer, who spoke this morning in the confidence debate. The Communists will oppose most firmly any measures or attitudes which they deem to be against the interests of the workers.

However, there is a new signal in the Communists' attitude: The parties which constitute the new government, Berlinguer said, recognize that to solve the country's problems and to ensure that the country can really be governed, it is necessary to establish a correct relationship between government and Parliament, between majority and opposition. In his speech the Communist secretary did not spare his criticism of the Socialist Party, which, he said, is losing the very features and the stance which had made it an essential component of the workers movement.

Magri, secretary of the PDUP [Democratic Party of Proletarian Unity] felt that this government did not deserve a different, that is softer opposition, since the Forlani government offers in a more organic form the same political line which was launched by the Christian Democrats' congress.

The MSI [Italian Social Movement] secretary was also very critical of Forlani, whose decision during the crisis, he said, of consulting only with the Communist opposition meant that the dialogue between Christian Democrats and Communists continues, albeit in a semi-concealed manner.

Benedikter of the South Tyrol People's Party pledged a favorable vote for the government; he said that he was somewhat perplexed at the number of commitments made by the government in its program and defined as suspect the snipers who caused Cossiga's fall.

POPE HOLDS 'SURPRISE' MEETING WITH IRANIAN AMBASSADOR

AU241620 Rome ANSA in English 1610 GMT 24 Oct

[Text] Vatican City, 24 Oct--Pope John Paul II received in private audience this morning the Iranian ambassador to Italy, Mohammad Baqir Nasirsadat-salami, for a long talk.

The fact that the pointiff granted the audience to the Iranian diplomatic representative accredited to the Rome government rather than to a representative to the Holy See generated considerable interest among Vatican watchers.

At present, Iran's ambassadorial post with the Vatican is vacant and the representation is being handled by the interim charge d'affaires, a counselor at the embassy.

The surprise papal audience for the Iranian ambassador to Italy was connected by these observers to widespread speculation on the imminent release of the 52 American hostages held in Iran by Islamic militants since 4 November last year.

FORMER PRIME MINISTER CAETANO DIES OF HEART ATTACK

PY262228 Paris AFP in Spanish 2211 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] Rio de Janeiro, 26 Oct (AFP)--Former Portuguese Prime Minister Marcello Caetano died here this afternoon as a result of a heart attack. Caetano had been in exile in Brazil since May 1974 after a coup d'etat overthrew Adm Americo Thomaz, the last of the presidents of Salazar's regime.

SOCIALIST APPEALS FOR JOINT CIVILIAN PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

LD251010 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] In connection with the upcoming presidential elections, Aires Rodrigues, leader of the Workers' Party for Socialist Unity-Workers' Socialist Party, said today that he will withdraw from the presidential race if the Socialist and Communist parties decide to submit a joint civilian candidate:

[Begin Rodrigues recording] The Socialist Party's national committee is to discuss again this Saturday the stance to be adopted by the party with regard to the presidential elections. The PCP for its part is holding a national conference this coming Tuesday to make a decision on the same matter.

For the working people the matter is clear: It was General Ramalho Eanes himself who confirmed that his action over the last 4 years was aimed to open the gates to the right. Throughout the country General Eanes is rejected by the working masses. General Eanes is in no position to represent the alternative capable of defeating General Soares Carneiro, either from the standpoint of the workers' interests or from the standpoint of the votes he may win in the coming elections. Consequently, it is impossible to back General Eanes. Mario Soares himself has withdrawn his support for Eanes' candidacy.

I therefore appeal to the Socialist Party's national committee and to the PCP's central committee and national conference: It is your duty to break with General Eanes immediately. For you, leading Socialist and Communist members, there is only one thing left to do: Get together, agree on a joint civilian candidate, a militant from a workers' party, likely in your opinion to be the one capable of winning the largest number of votes necessary to defeat General Soares Carneiro and the other generals. In such an event I will--as I have repeatedly stated--withdraw my candidacy. [end recording]

That was a statement by Aires Rodriques in connection with the upcoming presidential elections.

Meanwhile Lino Lina, tipped by the newspaper O JORNAL today as another presidential candidate, has told us that he has never been approached on that, and that all signs are that his party, the PCP, will be backing General Eanes.

COMMUNIST PARTY OF PORTUGUESE WORKERS TO SUPPORT EANES

LD260322 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Excerpts] The question of the presidential elections was the only item on the agenda of today's meeting of the central committee of the PCTP-MRPP [Communist Party of the Portuguese Workers-the Reorganizing Movement of the Party of the Proletariat] at its Lisbon headquarters. At the end of the meeting RDP [radio station] was apprised of the party's final position on the matter:

Begin recording] [unidentified speaker] After a comprehensive discussion of the present political situation the central committee unanimously decided to lend its support to General Ramalho Eanes' candidacy to a second term of office.

The central committee takes the view that the Portuguese people's fundamental goal in the upcoming presidential elections will be to elect a candidate with a democratic and patriotic program, antifascist and antisocial-fascist, capable of gaining the popular vote and thus defeating the Democratic Alliance's fascist candidate, General Soares Carneiro.

The central committee has stressed that the Democratic Alliance's reactionary coalition is hoping, and doing its utmost, to split the democartic forces, worsen the living and working conditions of the workers and oppress the Portuguese people, using Soares Carneiro's candidacy as a step toward the establishment in Portugal of a new fascist-type regime, a new terrorist dictatorship by the monopolies.

The Democratic Alliance's reactionary coalition is intent on pursuing its counterrevolutionary goals, either through the election of its candidate, Soares Carneiro, or by means of a military coup d'etat.

In these circumstances it is more important than ever to ensure the unity of the Portuguese working class and entire people in order to defeat the Democratic Alliance's putschist goals. There are objective political conditions for the consolidation and strengthening of that unity.

The central committee has denounced the putschist and divisionist maneuver undertaken by Dr. Mario Soares--a maneuver rejected by the majority of Socialist Party activists and sympathizers--which was aimed at covering up the responsibility that Dr. Mario Soares and the Socialist Party leadership must shoulder for the defeat in the 5 October elections, and at blaming that deafeat on the current president of the republic, whose image was in fact blatantly exploited by the Socialist Party in its election campaign.

The central committee denounces and condemns the attempts made by the social-fascist party of Barreirinhas Cunhal to associate itself with General Ramalho Eanes' candidacy, and takes the view that this attempt is aimed at getting the PCP out of the quagmire in which it found itself after the electoral defeat of 5 October.

The central committee stresses that the attempts by the social-fascist party of Barreirinhas Cunhal to jump onto General Ramalho Eanes' bandwagon are endangering his reelection prospects and, if not duly denounced and rejected, may contribute to the victory of the fascist candidate, General Soares Carneiro. [end recording]

DEFENSE MINISTRY DENIES RUMORS ON ANTI-AFRICAN INTERVENTION

LD250240 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2100 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] The official Angolan news agency today admitted the possibility of reactionary forces being in the process of preparing in Portugal for military intervention in Africa. In the context of this planning, which the Angolans claim is in support of U.S. policies, the Porto Santo airbase [on Madeira] would play an important role.

Approached by the Portuguese News Agency ANOP concerning this, a spokesman for the Portuguese Defense Ministry has said that the report is absolutely baseless and that it does not deserve any credence whatsoever.

PCE'S BALLESTEROS ON TENSIONS WITHIN PARTY, CARRILLO LEADERSHIP

LD270915 Brussels LE SOIR in French 19-20 Oct 80 p 3

[Ernesto Garcia Herrera article: "Will the PCE Continue To Support Eurocommunism?"]

[Excerpts] Will the PCE remain in the vanguard of the Eurocommunist movement? Will the Spanish Communists be able to continue to walk hand in hand with Enrico Berlinguer or will they return toward Alvaro Cunhal's nostalgic Stalinist stance?

These are questions which one is entitled to ask if one is to believe certain rather critical reports concerning the PCE which have not been denied by its leaders.

The PCE had 15,000 members in 1975 and 200,000 2 years later, after the first legislative elections (June 1977) held in Spain since February 1936. The membership was 140,000 at the end of 1979 and is apparently 100,000 today.

To this initial indication of a setback must be added another whose gravity can escape nobody: The general stampede over the last few years of the professionals--doctors, engineers, journalists and lawyers--who have left the party following the decision made by the central committee to "territorialize" (if one does not object to the term) the party.

This "territorialization" involved the dissolution of the professional groups and the incorporation of their members into district organizations. The same decision was applied--unsuccessfully, moreover--in the factories and places of work.

As far as the professionals are concerned, it was also a waste of efforts, since scarcely 20 percent of these professionals accepted the central committee's decision. The remainder departed. However, it must be made clear that, contrary to what has happened elsewhere, this exodus has not caused conflicts. There have been no affairs like those of Pierre Daix or Roger Garaudy among the Spanish Communists. Silence and icy politeness have been the norm. The PCE has not attempted to crush the dissidents, and the latter have not rushed to join other leftwing parties, either.

Over and above these defections, it seems that there is also a real confrontation within the party between two opposing currents--that of the "Euros" and that which might be termed, in accordance with the traditional terminology, the party's "Apparatchiks."

It seems that [PCE Secretary General] Mr Carrillo, whose power within the party is now absolute--"nobody breathes within the PCE if Santiago does not give permission," it is said--would like to reconcile the two currents, in that he claims to be a "Euro," while at the same time being the most effective protector of those nostalgic for Stalinism, who are mostly--something which must not be forgotten--his former comrades in arms. Under these conditions, Mr Carrillo and his supporters are coming under crossfire from the "Romans" and the "Carthaginians." Moreover, Mr Carrillo, his critics say, regards the PCE as his personal property, even if he has to distort the facts to that end. Nevertheless, Mr Carrillo's replacement is often talked about, and the names of possible heirs apparent are even mentioned. In the first place, there is Nicolas Sartorius, the veritable gray eminence of the Workers Commissions--the procommunist trade union. An aristocrat, the son of the Count of San Luis, a grandee of Spain, this is perhaps why he is called the "Spanish Berlinguer."

There is also Ramon Tamames, a university professor, economist, writer and brilliant personality. It seems that all this is apparently rather a handicap for Mr Tamames, the workers' sector rejecting him. And there is Jaime Ballesteros, a deputy and journalist, who has been chosen, it is said, by Mr Carrillo himself.

Mr Ballesteros told us:

"There is no crisis among us. There are, of course, problems, whose origins are quite different. In the first place, all the political parties are in a process of formation. The PCE, which had quite appropriate structures before the transition, has undergone a very large influx of members since that time. This has naturally entailed problems of internal coherence, with the tensions which all that involves. The PCE is composed of different sectors, different 'geological' strata, I would say. There are members who were trained underground in the various workers' and professional movements. There are also people who joined the PCE as emigrants. Last, there are also people who experienced the civil war and who are today the 'bridge' between the PCE of the civil war and that of the present time. These sectors each have their own cultural and political training and also their own outlook. To this it must be added that the process of integration is developing in a troubled political atmosphere, and this prevents the party leaders from having the time necessary to find solutions to the many problems confronting them. On the other hand, the PCE is becoming stronger every day, slowly but surely. Now this very deeply worries certain political forces which feel a need to exaggerate our problems and to create real dramas.

"As far as the so-called tensions between the 'Euros' and those nostalgic for Stalinism are concerned, it must be said that here, too, the Eurocommunist process is displaying tensions caused by the existence of certain traditions. That being said, I do not believe that a communist party can be found today which has gone further than we have along the path of Eurocommunism. I would also like to add that we adopted this stance when we were still underground, with the danger of not being understood which that entailed. But it had to be done. It was crucial for democracy and freedom. Moreover, this decision has been perfectly understood by the majority of the party, and those who disagree are quite free to say so. Last, and as far as Santiago Carrillo's succession is concerned, I believe that it is a matter of mere speculation. He remains the man with the greatest experience and ability among us."

SOVIET, CUBAN OFFICIALS ARRIVE IN MADRID ON 'PRIVATE' VISIT

LD262309 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] The deputy minister of foreign affairs [as heard] of the Soviet Union and the vice president of the Council [as heard] of Cuba arrived in Madrid this afternoon from Moscow. At Barajas airport the two officials refused to allow photographs or interviews, saying in both cases that the visit was strictly private. It is not known whether during their stay in Madrid they will meet any Spanish officials.

MADRID REPORTS ON SCHOOL EXPLOSION NEAR BILBAO

LD231924 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Summary] The latest official figures for the number of people killed in this morning's explosion in the Ugalde school in Ortuella is 63--61 children and 2 adults. Another 37 children are being treated for injuries in a local hospital. Thirty-five bodies have so far been identified.

The king and queen of Spain expressed their deepest condolences to the relatives of the victims in a telephone call to the civil governor of Vizcaya this afternoon. It has been confirmed that Queen Sofia will travel to Bilbao later this evening and will probably visit the scene of the accident.

Meanwhile, the press office at the Ministry of Education has announced that tomorrow all state schools will observe a day of mourning and there will be no classes.

PRESS ASSOCIATION: GOVERNMENT PLANS LARGER DEFENSE CUTS

LD231734 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1610 GMT 23 Oct 80

[By Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Text] Defence Secretary Mr Francis Pym has been warned in a confidential memo from his top civil servant that defence chiefs are seriously concerned over government cutbacks in military spending.

At the same time, the Treasury chief secretary, Mr John Biffen, has written to Mr Pym demanding cuts of 400 million pounds sterling a year up to 1984. It is understood that the Treasury now wants to increase this figure to 500 million pounds sterling so the government can boost assistance to the nationalised industries without raising taxation.

As a result of the cuts, the government will fail to honour, both this year and next, its pledge to increase defence spending by 3 percent a year in line with an agreed NATO target. But it is clear that defence is being required to buckle under like other spending departments and the discipline of cash limits and further spending cuts takes precedence over the defence commitment.

The PRESS ASSOCIATION has in its possession documents spelling out the fears of the defence chiefs and the demand for cuts by Mr Biffen, which will mean that Britain's military spending will increase by only 1 1/2 percent in each of the next two years. These developments are bound to alarm many Tory MPs. Mr Pym is likely to face tough questioning at the Conservative backbench defence committee on Tuesday and at Commons question time the same day.

The Ministry of Defence and the Treasury clashed earlier this year over control of the defence budget, which was 600 million pounds sterling overspent. In August a three-month freeze was imposed on new defence contracts and the ministry's cash limit was increased by 203 million pounds sterling.

In a minute dated October 2 to Mr Pym on this year's defence expenditure Ministry of Defence Permanent Under Secretary Sir Frank Cooper predicted that despite the new cash limit, the defence budget would still be overspent by 135 million pounds sterling. He was meeting the chiefs of the defence staff today to discuss what could be done.

Sir Frank blamed the high rate of billing to the ministry by private industry, high overheads and a bigger rate of inflation than forecast. Sir Frank told Mr Pym that the chief of staff were "naturally seriously concerned" about the effect on their operational capabilities and also stressed that the international situation had deteriorated dangerously in the last few weeks.

There was evidence of NATO and international awareness of Britain's reductions in activity levels.

Sir Frank expressed his own concern about next year's budget when, he said, industrial and economic factors would continue to exert "enormous pressures" on defence.

Mr Biffen, in his letter, marked "secret" and dated September 19, said there was a real possibility that public spending cuts would have to be "substantially beyond" those he had proposed in July. He had originally asked for savings of 140 million pounds sterling a year from the Defence Ministry from 1981/82 to 1983/84. But he said: "In the situation we now face we must explore the possibility of a substantionally greater contribution from defence, say, of the order of 400 million pounds sterling a year. I recognise that such a cut would create substantial programme difficulties for you, but I have to put no less unwelcome proposals to other colleagues with major expenditure programmes and must look to you to accept a fair share."

He added, "clearly this would mean that we would not meet the 3 percent target in 1981/82."

"A strong defence requires a sound economy," Mr Biffen declared. "The cuts which we now have to examine in social--and other previously 'protected'--programmes, are likely to create even greater political and presentational problems."

The Ministry of Defence's own calculations show that Mr Biffen's proposals would mean a 1 1/2 percent increase in real defence spending this year and next, returning to the 3 percent NATO growth target after that.

The Conservative election manifesto declared that "a significant increase will be necessary" in defence expenditure.

Only in August, Mr Pym wrote to Party Chairman Lord Thorneycroft stating the government's "unshakeable commitment to defence" and appearing to confirm that ministers were sticking to the NATO agreement.

PA Defence Correspondent Robert Hutchinson writes: Before the spending clampdown announced in August the Defence Ministry had already launched internal savings valued at around 250 million pounds sterling. These included postponement of orders for spares for the army's Blowpipe anti-aircraft missile; its bigger brother, the Rapier; deferment of harbour service boats for the Navy and jetstream aircraft for the RAF. Then came the moratorium--a total ban on new defence contracts except those involving dire operational need. This was expected to save more than 100 million pounds sterling. But further measures were thought necessary--and the ministry cut back fuel allocations, freight movements and subsistence allowances for personnel, again worth 100 million pounds sterling. The Navy bore the brunt of the fuel reductions--up to 30 percent was cut--and two ships were pulled out of a NATO exercise in the Mediterranean.

Remarks by Pym

LD231852 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1843 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Later Mr Pym said in a statement "the quotations given appear to be taken from genuine documents. But no decisions have been taken. They can be taken only after collective consideration by ministers. Discussions about future levels of public, including defence, expenditures are only just beginning as part of the annual public expenditure survey cycle. The government is in no doubt that we must increase year by year our defence capability until we reach and maintain it at a level which we believe is essential for our national safety."

THATCHER ADVISED OF LEAK OF DEFENSE CUT PLANS

LD232204 London ITV Television Network in English 2100 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Britain's defense chiefs have told the government they are seriously worried about cuts in defense spending. The Treasury is said to want cuts of 500 million pounds a year over the next 4 years. The cuts mean that Britain won't be able to fulfill promises on increased defense spendings given to NATO. The defense chiefs' worries emerged in a confidential letter to the defense secretary, Mr Francis Pym, leaked to the PRESS ASSOCIATION news agency.

Our political editor says the government are seriously embarassed by this leak, and the prime minister has been told. Mr Pym said tonight that the story appears to be taken from genuine documents.

RALLIS GOVERNMENT GETS CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES VOTE OF CONFIDENCE

AT242230 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 2158 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text of announcement by Papaspirou, chairman of the Chamber of Deputies, on the result of the vote of confidence requested by the government on its foreign and NATO policies--live]

[Text] I have the honor to announce the result of the voting. A total of 202 votes were cast; replies in support of the government numbered 182. The government thus receives the vote of confidence. A total of 20 negative votes were cast and there were 9 abstentions. This is the result of the voting. I request your concurrence to adjourn the meeting until next Wednesday for legislative work.

Papandreou's Tactics Condemned

AT251435 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 25 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

[From the "evening" column: "The Fireworks"]

[Text] The Chamber of Deputies early today ratified Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing with the increased majority of 3/5 of the number of deputies--exactly what would have been needed for ratification of a law approving an agreement under article 28, paragraph two of the Constitution. This majority could have been even greater if the issue had not been presented in the form of a vote of confidence to the government and if certain reasons, primarily of antigovernment opposition expediency, had not led to a negative vote by centrist deputies.

The defeat suffered by the opposition in the Chamber of Deputies, however, is not only expressed by the result of the vote taken. It is, perhaps, more strongly expressed by the basic outcome of the 3-day debate during which the arguments presented by the Rallis government proved to be far stronger than the sloganeering of the opposition.

Public opinion followed the basic points of the debate over television and in the newspapers and drew its own conclusions. The majority of this public opinion, like the majority in the Chamber of Deputies, supported the government's decision.

The peoples "silent majority" does not demonstrate in the manner of recent demonstrations by the organized minority. The decision of this "silent majority" will be decisive, however, when the times comes to vote. There were ample messages on this. The change in the position of the majority opposition party during the third day of the debate proves it.

It is true that on the first day the chairman of PASOK was very careful during the Chamber's debate in his attempt to influence the centrist area. When, however, his party cadres informed him that such tactics would give the victory of impressions to the government, the leader of the majority opposition party gave the signal for a stronger tone. It is within this framework--within which Mavros, who never ceases to surprise everyone at every given instance, also moved--that PASOK's deputy Kousoyiorgas started to talk in hard tones in order to be followed--but after the Chamber's meeting--by Papandreou himself.

The fireworks launched by the chairman of PASOK just after midnight could not, naturally, have any effect because Prime Minister Rallis in closing the debate stressed that we are willing to negotiate with Turkey, that if Turkey demonstrates goodwill we would then be able to proceed to solutions but without, naturally, making any concessions on any of our sovereign rights.

Papandreou, who had not heard this statement [PASOK walked out of the chamber] did not later hesitate to describe it as an "unbelievable and unacceptable admission that the government of the right is prepared to negotiate with Turkey on our national sovereign rights in the Aegean."

This was a desperate and last-ditch effort to win the battle--which was already lost during the previous three days--only a few minutes after midnight.

TO VIMA REPORTS 'FULL SPEED AHEAD' FOR TALKS ON U.S. BASES

AT261330 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 26 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] It appears the government is now determined to proceed with full speed ahead toward signing and ratification of the agreement on U.S. bases in Greece, after the vote of confidence it received on the night of last Friday to Saturday. The government even hopes to have the agreement signed and have its ratification concluded--with the required majority of three-fifths or of 180 deputies--prior to the winter meeting of NATO's foreign and defense ministers which meets in Brussels 9 to 12 December.

The urgency for signing this agreement is so great--from both sides--that the "preliminary" consultations between the acting secretary general of the Greek foreign ministry, Ambassador Roussos and ambassadorial advisor to the U.S. Embassy (Milton Conver) are expected to start on Wednesday morning. It is expected that Pentagon advisers, due to arrive in Athens from Washington, will supply various items of information during these preliminary consultations which are expected to be very short.

It is generally believed that there will be no "insurmountable" obstacles during these consultations, particularly in reference to the economic aspects of the agreement which the Greek Government considers satisfactory in principle. By contrast, the Greek side will request a revision of basic points of the agreement which have to do with the status within these U.S. bases.

As it is well known, U.S. ambassador to Athens Robert McCloskey, immediately upon his return from Washington in early September, handed to Foreign Minister Mitsotakis the draft of this new agreement which is designated as agreement on defense and economic cooperation (DECA) [rendered in English]--because apart from the status of the U.S. bases, it also provides for economic assistance and development of the Greek war industry.

The new agreement is based on two separate points:

The Greek-U.S. defense agreement initialed in July 1977.
The equivalent U.S.-Turkish agreement signed in Ankara last March.

The agreement provides that in the end a total of four bases will be kept (Nea Makri, Souda, Iraklion and Ellinikon) under a Greek commander and a U.S. deputy commander. Every installation will be a Greek installation under a Greek commander within which "facilities will be provided for U.S. armed forces in order to serve joint defense goals."

On the question of strengthening the Greek war industry--which is a new element by comparison to the old agreement--specific proposals have already been submitted to Washington by the National Defense General Staff.

Among these are a request for the provision of U.S. technology and capital for the manufacture of various types of weapons in Greece, for the repair and maintenance of U.S. aircraft at the Greek airforce industry installations at Tanagra, and so forth. U.S. response to these requests is so far considered satisfactory by the Greek military command.

ECONOMIC, TECHNOLOGICAL TIES WITH U.S. DISCUSSED

AT241741 Athens NEWS in English 24 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Minister Without Portfolio Stavros met with the United States Ambassador Robert McCloskey. The two men discussed implementation of the Greek-U.S. treaty for economic and technological cooperation signed in Athens last April and Greek-American economic relations.

It was decided to form a work group for problems arising from the treaty's implementation, in view of the expected arrival in early December of the American delegation to the joint committee provided for by the treaty.

Issues to be discussed in connection with the treaty's implementation include Greek exports to the United States, facilitation of American investments in Greece, promotion of trade and the effect Greece's accession to the European Economic community will have on Greece-U.S. trade.

NEWSPAPERS DECRY EFFECT ON CYPRUS OF REENTRY INTO NATO

I AVYI Column

AT251505 Athens I AVYI in Greek 25 Oct 80 p6

[From the "I AVYI" column: "A Hugh Political and Moral Issue"]

[Text] The concern expressed by the Cyprus House of Representatives over repercussions which Greece's reintegration within NATO's military wing will have on the Cyprus issue, creates a huge political and moral issue for the government. We consider the way in which Prime Minister Rallis reacted to be an insult to the mentality of both the Chamber and the people. He more or less argued that the Cyprus House of Representatives was influenced by the opposition's criticism against the decision to reintegrate.

Rallis personally, the other day, used a certain opinion expressed by Makarios in 1975 that Greece should not abandon (God forbid) NATO, as if it was some "heavy artillery" in support of the decision to reintegrate. Using this Makarios opinion, which is 4 years old which, in the final analysis is nothing more than the opinion of a single man, no matter how authoritative he may have been, and not some holy writ, Rallis attempted to strengthen the argument that allegedly reintegration within NATO will help Cyprus. Now, when the Cyprus House of Representatives expresses its concern, with a special resolution, over repercussions of this reintegration upon the Cyprus issue, Rallis personally replies with certain paternalistic assurances. Is this a serious way to handle such a serious matter?

The resolution of the Cyprus House of Representatives touches upon the most basic problem which is affected by this reintegration. This is because withdrawal from military NATO in 1974 was an act committed in the defense of Cyprus. Reintegration today is nationally unacceptable if only on the basis of the fact that it will have negative repercussions in Cyprus, as pointed out by the Cyprus House of Representatives.

The government offers no answer to this, however, simply because it has no answer. At the same time, the government remains exposed because it has placed not only the Greek people but also the political leaders of Cyprus before a fait accompli.

The government, consequently, should abandon its efforts to avoid the issue and it must give the necessary responsible explanations to the people of Greece and of Cyprus. All the rest does nothing more than add an even darker hue to the severely unacceptable policy of retreat in face of U.S.-NATO pressures which are aimed against our true national interests.

RIZOSPASTIS Article

AT251530 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 25 Oct 80 p 2

[From the "Radical" column: "The Cold Shower"]

[Text] The cable of the Cyprus House of Representatives addressed to the chairman of the Greek Chamber of Deputies was a cold shower for the government. While Rallis and Mitsotakis were trying to convince the deputies and the Greek people that reintegration within NATO would help the cause of Cyprus and will provide the government with the possibility of offering greater assistance to the people of Cyprus, we have the arrival of the cable. The Cyprus House of Representatives expressed strong concern over the repercussions which Greece's reintegration within NATO will have. The chairman's department in the Chamber, always "prepared" for such eventualities, proclaimed...ignorance. The chairman started to search his desk. A mini-government conference provided the solution. In a very "convincing" way the prime minister indirectly but clearly blamed the Cyprus House of Representatives with a lack of a will of its own because it was "influenced" by the dangermongering of the Greek opposition. It is such an insult that Rallis directed against the political world of Cyprus, against the Cyprus House of Representatives and against the people of Cyprus. The Greek Government of the rightwing wanted Cyprus to forget: that the coup against Makarios was organized by the Americans and by NATO; that these two "great protectors" of ours incited and encouraged the Turkish invasion of the island; that it is the NATO member states which at the United Nations vote against a solution of the Cyprus issue with partition as their goal so that they might be able to turn Cypriot territory into a U.S.-NATO base. Does it want the fact that all this took place while Greece was a member of NATO forgotten and that Greek-speaking NATO agents, who remain unpunished, were used to make all this happen? This is why the prime minister did not hesitate to use the description that "they were influenced" by the opposition. It is a fact that the Cypriots never expected such an insult from the government of New Democracy. The Greek rightwing, however, has undertaken so many obligations toward NATO that it has lost its senses under their weight and it now loses its calm and even its dignity.

RIZOSPASTIS Interviews Papaioannou

AT261145 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 26 Oct 80 P 5

["Text" of exclusive interview granted by secretary general of AKEL, the Restorative Party of the Working People (the Communist Party of Cyprus), Ezekias Papaioannou to RIZOSPASTIS. Date not given]

[Text] Question: It is generally accepted that Greece's reintegration within military NATO will unavoidably influence the Cyprus problem. In his statement, Prime Minister Rallis argued that reintegration "will benefit Cyprus." How does AKEL view this development and its repercussions upon the Cyprus problem?

Papaioannou: No matter how one examines the reintegration of Greece within the military structure of NATO, one reaches the conclusion that this is a serious blow both against Greece and against Cyprus. Reintegration leads to increased tension in this so sensitive area of the world and it leaves Cyprus exposed. Public opinion in Cyprus has correctly described this reintegration as a stab in the back of Cyprus.

When Greece withdrew from NATO's military wing, primarily as a result of the Turkish invasion of Cyprus, the prime minister of that time and current president of the republic, K. Karamanlis, stated that the government's decision "was final and irrevocable." Now Rallis states that reintegration "will strengthen the position of Greece and will benefit Cyprus."

How can the position of Greece be strengthened, however, within an alliance dominated by imperialist forces--particularly by the United States--which is directly responsible both for the junta-fascist coup in Greece and that in Cyprus, and for the invasion of Attila? Greece is not an imperialist country and its natural position is within the camp of the nonaligned, within which Greece could play a very important role. At the same time, life has demonstrated that during the 6 years during which Greece did not belong to NATO's military wing it managed to develop excellent relations with the Peoples Republic of Bulgaria and the other socialist countries.

A Camp David Solution Is Being Promoted

As far as Cyprus is concerned, this reintegration will encourage imperialist NATO circles to intensify their pressures and their plots for a NATO partitionist solution of the Cyprus issue. It is not a coincidence that President Carter stressed that now it is the turn of Cyprus. This means that "a Camp David" is being prepared for the Cyprus issue by the U.S. imperialists.

The betrayed, deeply wounded but unsubjugated Cypriot people, however, will in no case tolerate any imperialist, NATO, intervention in the solution of the Cyprus issue. NATO was and continues to remain an evil demon for Cyprus and the unenslaved Cypriot people will always face it as their most relentless enemy. It is only within the limits of the United Nations and on the basis of the resolutions of this international organization and the Cypriot summit agreements that a solution acceptable to the Cypriot people is feasible.

Question: Intercommunal dialogue in Cyprus is being resumed under the auspices of the UN secretary general. Are there any prospects for its conclusion in positive results and, if so, under what prerequisites? Particularly in reference to the domestic front in Cyprus, what measures could contribute in this direction?

Papaionnou: It is yet too early to draw any conclusions on whether there will be positive results from the continued intercommunal talks. These talks are still in the exploratory stage and although the climate, as stated, is good, they have not yet entered into a basic dialogue.

It is the opinion of AKEL that both sides should undertake every possible effort toward progress and an agreement on the domestic aspects of the Cyprus issue. This ought to be done on the basis of UN resolutions on the Cyprus issue, the Makarios-Denktas and Kiprianou-Kenktas agreements. Progress and an agreement will not be easy. There is no other and easier process however. It is the Cypriots themselves, Greeks as well as Turks, who will solve the domestic aspects of the Cyprus issue always, naturally, under the auspices of the United Nations. What is needed is patience, determination and, most of all, adherence to the principles which have already been agreed upon. Negotiations will be hard and will require much time. The vital interests of both the Greek and Turkish Cypriots dictate rejection of the intervention of the imperialist alliance of NATO or any other foreign intervention in Cypriot domestic affairs. This solution could be achieved on the basis of the biregional federation and not a confederation.

In reference to the domestic front in Cyprus, that which could contribute in the direction of a peaceful, democratic and just solution of the Cyprus issue is unity of all patriotic forces on the basis of the approved and declared correct line and tactics for the solution of our problem. The division which exists today in this front is due to the nonconformity of all parties to this line.

At the same time specific measures must be adopted for a rapprochement between Greeks and Turks in Cyprus. We must not forget that imperialism and foreign occupation are the enemies of all the Cypriots. Through understanding and agreement with the Turkish Cypriots, it will be possible to conduct a joint struggle against the foreign occupation of Cypriot territory, for the dissolution of imperialist bases and for the full demilitarization of Cyprus.

In reference to the foreign aspects of the Cyprus issue, this ought to be discussed and solved by an international conference with UN limits. Such a conference must discuss the conditions which Cyprus was forced to accept in 1960 as a necessary prerequisite for its declaration as an independent state. These conditions must be abrogated, the bases must be abolished and the guarantees must be replaced by guarantees from the UN Security Council. Cyprus must become and it must remain truly independent, sovereign, territorially integral, nonaligned, demilitarized and a center of peace, friendship and cooperation for all the nations of the area.

Close Comradely Relations

Question: AKEL and the KKE are connected by close comradely ties established in common struggle for the ideals of socialism and peace. How do you view the contribution of relations and cooperation between the two parties in the struggle against the common enemy, imperialism, for the just solution of the Cyprus issue and the establishment of detente and security in the area?

Papaioannou: Relations between AKEL and the KKE are excellent. The two parties are connected by extremely close comradely ties based upon the invincible scientific theory of Marxism-Leninsim and proletarian internationalism. These relations will strengthen continually and an additional step in this direction will be undertaken during the imminent visit to Cyprus by a delegation of the KKE Central Committee on an invitation from the Central Committee of AKEL.

The two parties which function in the most sensitive areas of the world could contribute to the further strengthening of the struggle of peoples against the common enemy, imperialism, to the just solution of the Cyprus issue and the strengthening of detente and security in the area.

The brother KKE Party supports with firmness the liberation struggle of the people of Cyprus and opposes the reintegration of Greece within NATO. In its capacity as the party of the working people of Greece, it plays a pioneering role not only on the domestic problems of the country but also as a militant factor in support of detente, peace and disarmament which are interrelated and inseparable from the life and future of the Greek of all other peoples.

We will discuss with the brother KKE Party the prospects of further strengthening the struggle of our peoples for a peaceful and just solution of the Cyprus issue, for obstruction of the imperialist threat against Cyprus and the Middle East area and for strengthening peace and security in the east Mediterranean and throughout the area.

RIZOSPASTIS Editorial

[Editorial: "An Unbridgeable Gap"]

[Text] The trick of giving a vote of confidence to the government in no way closes the vast issue of our country's reintegration within military NATO. The government is deceiving itself if it thinks that last Friday's vote means legalization and acceptance by our people of an act of national treason which turns our country into a dependency and attack base of the imperialist North Atlantic coalition with inestimable tragic consequences.

The Greek people consider the result of the other day's voting in the Chamber of Deputies as invalid and the agreement on our reintegration as nationally unacceptable. The people feel absolutely no obligation taken under this agreement. The people consider it a class option by the oligarchy which unhesitatingly sacrifices national interests on the altar of U.S.-NATO imperialism hoping that in this way it will, in the end, manage to protect its privileged and antipeoples regime.

The true voting on the enslaving agreement with NATO was not carried out in the Chamber of Deputies. It was carried out outside of the Chamber, in the streets and squares of Athens, Pireaus, Thessaloniki and other cities. It was impressively expressed through the universal demonstrations and marches in which the slogan: "Out of NATO for good," resounded stentoriously. These universal expressions demonstrate that there is a full division between the government's policy and the feelings of the Greek people.

The unbridgeable gap between the people and the artificial majority in the Chamber of Deputies dictates the immediate dissolution of the Chamber, the proclamation of elections and the election of a democratic majority which will support a government of broad democratic forces. This is the only solution which could lead the country out of today's destructive course, which can rid it of the danger of new national adventures which are appearing threateningly on the horizon.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES DEBATE ON GOVERNMENT FOREIGN, NATO POLICY

AT222040 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2230 GMT 22 Oct 80

[Recorded highlights of the Chamber of Deputies debate on the government's foreign and NATO policy]

[Text] [Begin recording of highlights of Prime Minister Rallis' address] Ladies and gentlemen, the government hoped that the majority opposition party, having been briefed in detail on conditions of our special relation with NATO, irrespective of its negative position toward the alliance, would have exercised, as it has every right to do, the criticism which it considered essential and that it would have pointed out to us the mistakes which, in its opinion, would have existed in the conditions of the agreement. The government could not have imagined that the agreement would have been described as nationally unacceptable and as leading to national adventures. The government could not have imagined this because the agreement does not touch upon any sovereign right or upon any interest of Greece [applause] nor does it lead to national adventures. On the contrary, it protects us and diverts us from future national adventures [long applause]

It is, in addition, also useful to remind the Chamber of Deputies that today's handling is undertaken in accordance with the conditions of the original treaty, a treaty which was drafted, signed and ratified by the governments of the center of 1951-1952, and bears the signature of Nikolaos Plastiras as prime minister and minister of national defense and the signature of Sofoklis Venizelos as minister of foreign affairs.

In addition, today's shouting by the followers of PASOK and the Communist Party which demands our withdrawal from the alliance, is not being heard for the first time. These sentiments were also heard on the eve of the 1977 elections, when these two parties set withdrawal from NATO as the slogan for their preelection campaign.

The total of the votes received by these two parties, however, did not go over 35 percent. Consequently, in the 1977 elections, the Greek people rejected the proposal for withdrawal from NATO. I now wonder: Why is it that this discussion is being brought back at such an inopportune time?

You must allow me after this short introduction to remind you that on 5 August 1974 the Karamanlis government of that time had to deal with a dramatic problem. This was the second Turkish invasion of Cyprus. At that time, of the four persons who took an active part in this drama, three are here. We met in my staff headquarters, before dawn. They were the prime minister of the government of that time; the current minister of national defense who was minister of defense of that time; and myself personnely. We continually communicated with the foreign minister of that time, Yeoryios Mavros, who was in Geneva. We discussed and examined, with the military naval and air staff officers, what would be a suitable reaction. There were three possible solutions. The first was that we should not react at all, simply limiting ourselves to a simple verbal protest. I do not believe that anyone in this hall, even today, after all these years, would have opted for such a a course because this would have been the course of national degradation and shame. Neither at that time nor now is there anyone who would be prepared to indicate this path. The second solution which presented itself to us was war. That possibility was examined. It was examined very seriously and at length. It was proved, however, that the condition of the armed forces did not permit us to resort to this solution.

This is because Cyprus would not have been saved and Greece would be running the danger of annihilation. It is not necessary, gentlemen, to remind you that one month before these dramatic events took place, the events I have recalled for you, there was a general mobilization call made upon the Greek Armed Forces. It is also unnecessary for me to remind you what this conscription unfortunately produced.

The third solution was one we approved. It concerned withdrawal of our military forces from the alliance and their placement under Greek control, under Greek command and our statement that this was a move of severe protest for what was happening and for what was happening without anyone intervening on the island.

We hoped by this to have touched the sentiments of the world, at least the Western world, to bring their intervention. We also hoped that there would be an expression of some form of intervention which would prevent the crime. At that time, however, both the United States of America and Great Britain were in a very disturbed political internal situation, as you can remember, and our move could not touch upon their sentiments as much as it should have. I say as much as it should have because the results of the movement were not the ones we expected. There were results, however.

Gentlemen, you should not forget that this withdrawal of Greece, this absence of our armed forces from the alliance resulted in the embargo. It resulted in bringing the international organizations to their senses and to condemn the Turkish action.

Therefore, our action did have results. All those who say that it was wrong, say so today. They do not recall the situation and the psychology of both the Greek Army and the Greek people. They do not recall the psychology of Cyprus where people were being massacred and which demanded at least this support on the part of Greece.

The years passed and it became obvious that this move produced what it had to produce. It became further obvious that a prolonging of the situation, as I will tell you shortly, incorporated dangers for Greece and for Cyprus. This was proclaimed by Archbishop Makarios himself. On 12 October 1975, the minutes exist, Makarios in discussion with the prime minister of that time, Karamanlis, said, "For God's name do not leave NATO, for God's sake do not leave, because your stay within NATO helps Cyprus."

Seeing, therefore, that the move could not produce anything new in the future, and that a counter counting had already started, the government submitted its well-known proposals for special relations.

In 1977, and after nearly four years, these proposals were approved the other day by the alliance. You will tell me: Why did so much time have to elapse? One year was devoted to discussions of a technical and military nature with the alliance. When the proposals, which are well known as the Haig-Davos agreement while in fact this is not a Haig-Davos agreement but proposals submitted by General Davos and which were accepted by Haig in principle with the reservation of submitting them to the military committee--when these proposals were submitted, they faced a Turkish veto. As you know the decisions of the alliance are taken unanimously.

Consequently a struggle began to divert the Turkish veto. This was a struggle not only by us but by the alliance. Protracted deliberations, plan upon plan, all were rejected by our military advisers and by the government because if accepted, there was the danger of affecting national interests.

In the middle of the dilemma it is obvious that we preferred rejection of these proposals. In February 1980, General Rogers submitted his last proposal but one, that is, his last plan before acceptance of the present plan under discussion.

This was also unacceptable and it was rejected in very few days. The general then adopted another approach. This consisted of direct consultation at the technical level between his staff officers and Greek staff officers and, I imagine, also with the Turkish staff officers.

Thus we concluded on the plan submitted Friday which was accepted and which offers not one single exchange, not a single concession. [long applause] It is a plan which does not harm either sovereign nor even national Greek rights. On this opportunity I wish to congratulate, in front of the Chamber of Deputies, both General Davos and General Gratsios, and their staff officers who with such patience and determination managed to conclude teir very difficult task.

The plan was unanimously adopted by the military command. It was also unanimously adopted by the government. The entire reconnection or rather the special relation, is undertaken on the basis of the NATO documents which we have signed and which continue to remain in force in conjunction with the answers of 1977, the Greek replies to the questions which are known as the Davos proposals. Prior to our withdrawal, however, in 1974, there existed pending issues. These issues were long discussed without any solution because there had to be unanimity on these issues as well.

A new pending issue was also created with the establishment of the Smyrna headquarters in a way which differed from the status of the old Smyrna headquarters under the command of an American, prior to our withdrawal, in which we also participated.

These pending issues, it was agreed, must be solved through discussion by the two commanders and the commander of the Naples Headquarters. If a solution is found, if they agree, if there is unanimity, the solution will be accepted. If there is no unanimity, then discussion will continue until it is achieved. In the meantime, however, we will have the temporary solutions which exist today and which will regulate the situation. These temporary solutions, do they hurt Greece? They most certainly do not, because as I have told you, pending issues existed as far as 1974 and we remained in the alliance because these existing pending issues did not harm us. A new pending issue, that of Smyrna headquarters was created. However, the area of responsibility of this headquarters is entirely Turkish. Thus responsibility covers the Turkish Armed Forces and the Istanbul FIR. Why then all this concern that these pending issues create dangers? There is only one excuse: The belief that Greek generals and Greek politicians are prepared to betray Greece and to accept solutions which are antinational. Gentlemen, this is a heavy insult, both for the army and for us, the politicians. I had hoped it would never be stated because the small or large history of each one of us is well known to all.

We also have the question: How is it that the Turks raised the veto and now suddenly they agree? What did we give them? I reiterate: we gave them absolutely nothing. The Turks agreed that the agreement should apply because they see an extremely dark international horizon and they understand that they have every interest that there should be no disturbance on their western frontiers.

The Turkish foreign minister yesterday made a statement. He said that the agreement was reached thanks to the conciliatory position of Turkey. I would like to make a correction here. Perhaps this is a conciliatory position, but the conciliation consists of the fact that they did not and they continue not to present their illogical demands which they continued to present up to only 15 days ago. Turkey made no conciliation apart from giving up its illogical claims which created the complications. We did nothing else except to insist on the course which we laid down four years ago and which was accepted fortuitously for the national interest.

Two points of the agreement are underlined. One is the notorious question of the 6 or 10 miles and the opposition argues that we ceded sovereign rights because we gave up the 10-mile limit in airspace and we limited ourselves to 6 miles. Gentlemen, this provision has applied for exactly 20 years. NATO documents of 1960 have a clear provision which for NATO reasons defines Greek airspace to six miles which coincides with territorial waters. Consequently, the six miles have applied since 1960. An additional step was taken today. There is a provision under the agreement that every settlement will only affect relations within the alliance and in no way affects bipartite issues. Therefore, this right of NATO aircraft to use the airspace between 6 and 10 miles is an exception for NATO aircraft only and does not apply for third parties, not even for NATO members in cases when their national aircraft want to use this airspace.

Where then does the opposition see that we have ceded sovereign rights?

In conclusion, I also was surprised to hear that acceptance of this agreement means recognition of the partition of Cyprus. Gentlemen, as I have told you in October of 1975, Makarios had this idea about NATO, but does Cyprus benefit if Greece is weak or does it by contrast benefit if Greek defense is strengthened? Is it in the interest of Cyprus that Greece should sink? Is it in its interest that Greece should survive so that it may continue to offer its contribution, as it has done all these years and as it will willingly continue to do in the future until the peaceful settlement of the issue? [applause]

I did not expect such an accusation. I did not expect it against us who for the past few years have done nothing, no matter where we may be, except to stress to all our interlocutors, whether they are in the Western or the Eastern areas, the tragedy of Cyprus; and to demand that documents issued after consultations with friendly countries should incorporate a special and specific mention of Cyprus.

I do not say these things so that the government may gain the gratitude of the Cypriots. No matter what we do we will not ask for their gratitude because Cyprus suffers all and the debt we pay to them is a small one. This is what we can do, we cannot do more. From this point, however, to accusations that this agreement is a signature under the partition of Cyprus, there is a distance as the distance from here to Mars.

Gentlemen, I have told you that all this time the course of deliberations on the possibility of reattachment was a course which made us pessimistic. We had resolved, however, and we had proclaimed this, that should there be no positive reply to our proposals by the end of the year then we would withdraw them. We had made this statement in full knowledge of the consequences.

I will relate them to you because the same consequences will exist if we leave the alliance completely as the opposition demands, or if we remain out of NATO's military wing for a long time. Gentlemen, the alliance has defense as its main goal. What do we offer it if we only belong to the political wing and we do not belong to the military wing? We offer nothing.

However, they present the example of France. France, gentlemen, is a great power. France is a manufacturer of arms of the highest technology. France, when the horizon fills with clouds, will join its forces with the forces of the alliance. I cannot imagine that you would want to equate the military ability and potential of France with that of the military abilities and potential of Greece.

If, therefore, we withdrew from the alliance as PASOK wants, first: the only representative of the alliance in the southeast wing would be Turkey. This would mean that armaments as well as credits for substructure projects and training credits would be channelled toward Turkey.

If we accept this, then we must accept the disturbance of the balance of power between Turkey and Greece.

This would not be the only consequence, however, of our withdrawal from NATO. There is another one. If we withdraw from the alliance for good then it is the Turkish fleet and Turkish aircraft which will sail through Aegean international waters and airspace for the sake of the alliance. Is it, therefore, to our interest to support such a solution?

We cannot demand that when we withdraw the alliance should remain uncovered in this area. When we withdraw the area remains vacant, and this vacant space will be taken over by Turkey. This will be the result of our withdrawal from NATO. All these young people who for two days now have shouted "out of NATO' or "NATO-treason" do not know this simple fact. This very simple fact.

In any case, gentlemen, under the current settlement there is no creation of any irrevocable situation. Within a year there will be elections. Gentlemen of PASOK place the question clearly before the people: Out of NATO. We will present the people with the contrary: we will say that we will remain within NATO provided our national interests are not harmed, because this is to the interest of Greece. We will win an easy victory because the people, do not smile, the people know [mild disturbance and bell ringing] the people know and they want to maintain their security. Their security, at least for the present—I do not know what will happen after five or 10 years—lies in NATO.

I would like to close, gentlemen, with a declaration: We, all those who participate in the government, are proud of what has been achieved. We are proud because we believe that under this agreement we have avoided a national adventure. [prolonged applause] [end of recorded highlights of Mallis address]

[Begin recorded Papandreou speech] [applause precedes Papandreou's speech] Mr Chairman, dear colleagues, I have the feeling—and the prime minister of the government should permit me this—that perhaps he, personally, as well as his front have not understood the magnitude and the significance to our nation and to our people of the decision which they have taken by accepting the agreement prepared by Rogers and which also has received the approval of the Turkish junta.

I also regret that the prime minister of the government in referring to specific issues committed, I believe, an error in his estimations and perhaps also in his positions. I hope that I will manage to place things in their proper position.

First of all, the government opted for this process for a vote of confidence. One wonders why this is so at a time when the Constitution, in article 28, paragraph two, makes it absolutely clear that this agreement ought to have been placed before the chamber for debate and ratification. Does it or does it not?

The government did this, however, for a very simple reason. Naturally, perhaps the government was afraid that 180 deputies will not consent to this agreement. This time we will be registered face to face with the country's history. [applause] There is no question of secret voting here. Each one of us will connect his name and his own personal history with the nation's progress.

Consequently the agreement ought to have been presented to the Chamber. Instead of this, we have a trick—vote of confidence—so that the government will not be obliged under the Constitution, to present the agreement, so that the 300 representatives of the nation may be in a position to judge on the basis of the content of the agreement.

What helps this? If the prime minister tells you that the agreement does not lead to concessions and I tell you, as I will tell you, that I know the agreement and that it does lead to concessions, then whom will you believe?

New Democracy will believe the prime minister and PASOK and perhaps the opposition will believe me. Each one of you ought to have demanded to see the agreement with which our country is tied to NATO [applause].

A strong impression is truly being created because officers in the various staffs, the Greek, Turkish, Italian, and German staffs, may know the agreement. The Turks may know the agreement, not only may but they do know it. Do the Greek people know it? Do you, here tonight, know what you are going to vote for with a light heart? [applause].

Naturally, the party leaders were briefed. [Indistinct interruption] Very well then not all of them. In any case I was briefed. I am in a position to speak, to express my opinion without, naturally since there is an obligation, revealing specific issues related to the country's security.

We must once more glance—even if only for a short while—at this recent history of the past 6 years, the period described by the prime minister as the foreign policy period of the New Democracy governments. Let us see what this policy is.

In August 1974, as you know, when Greece withdrew from NATO, the following statement was made by the government: "Following the demonstrated inability of the Atlantic alliance to stop Turkey from creating a state of confrontation between two allies, Prime Minister Karamanlis gave instructions that the Greek Armed Forces should withdraw from the alliance. Greece will remain a member of the alliance only in respect of its political wing."

In December 1974, the prime minister of that time, Karamanlis, in his policy statement referred to the reasons why Greece withdrew from the military wing of NATO and they were: One, the Turkish invasion of Cyprus and two, impositions upon Greek sovereign rights in the Aegean. Let us not go so far, however.

In 1977, in this very hall, the prime minister of that time stated: "As it is well known, Greece withdrew from the military wing of the alliance both as a show of protest", —the only thing which the prime minister remembered,—"over the double invasion of Turkey in Cyprus, and because it wanted, as a result of its dispute with Turkey, to have its own armed forces under its absolute own control." This was the fundamental reason, the deeper reason, over and above other impressions, which forced the government of National Unity, as it was called at that time, to withdraw from NATO. It did not even control its own armed forces. I would like to add something which I expressed recently in one of my political speeches and which I believe applies. It is a fact that it must be admitted, this is the only admission which I make, that during the past six years the armed forces were truly armed in such a way that they are in a position to deal with any imposition against the nation. This was done with the concurrent opinion of the Panhellenic Socialist Movement as well [applause]. The prime minister of the government personally informed us that in July 1974 there were no armed forces. I ask: Was not Greece in the military wing of NATO at that time? [applause] The Greek officers and men were armed at that time so that they might be able to bind the will of the sovereign people.

Today we have defense. It is this defense which the government sacrifices on the altar of NATO interests. [applause]

It is a fact that negotiations ended with the last Rogers plan. It is unbelievable that they ended within a few hours. This was done even before our country's cabinet could meet.

NATO's Defense Planning Committee met and approved and ratified the agreement. I much fear that there is the unavoidable conclusion, no matter how much it may offend--our intention is not to offend but we are obliged to tell the truth as we see it at these movements which are so critical for our nation and our people--there is no question about it. That this was a record time. This means that there was advance preparation. At the same time there was advance staging. There was, at the same time pressure and extortion on the part of the United States and the great NATO countries. The prime minister cannot deny it at a time when he sent a letter to Carter in which he mentioned that Greece is being pressured to undertake a nationally treasonous act which he refused to undertake.

The time is gone when Karamanlis, now president of the republic, used to tell us that the government is not being pressured. The prime minister officially and responsibly admitted the pressures and the extortion in his letter which became well known through the press.

I believe that even the best-intentioned citizen and follower of New Democracy will have to admit that the foreign policy of the government, of the governments, of New Democracy during the past 6 years was a monument of contradiction. It is a fact that it is necessary to have explanations, which the prime minister of the government has not provided to the Greek people, as to why Greece is returning to NATO's military structure. None of the conditions which led to Greece's withdrawal have been eradicated. Cyprus today remains under the barbarous occupation of Attila. The dispute with Turkey exists and affects many sectors of our national security. Consequently the need for our national armed forces to remain under the control of the Greek Government also continues to exist.

Tonight the government and the prime minister sought to excuse this return--not the withdrawal but the return--to NATO under the argument that the absence of Greece from NATO's military wing, from NATO's military structure, would allow Turkey to claim rights in the Aegean within the framework of NATO. I believe we only heard this a short while ago.

This argument, however, is absolutely wrong. So long as Greece is not a member of its military structure, NATO is in no position to question the sovereign national Greek territory. [indistinct interruptions in the background] Forgive me, you must listen. I listened to the prime minister with care and I demand the same from you. You will listen in the same way that we listened.

Greece has its own airspace. This is 50 percent of the Aegean airspace. Admittedly, there is a 50 percent portion which is international and where in fact not only the Turks but also the Chinese have a right to fly, where not only the Atlantic alliance but any alliance anywhere in the world has a right to fly. Yet there is also the Athens FIR. The Athens FIR coincides with our eastern frontiers. This FIR cannot be violated. Any violation of the FIR means an act of war in exactly the same way that NOTAM 714 of 1974 was.

That the prime minister says that we must return so that Turkey may not precede us only has a meaning under the condition that the government--either this government or previous governments--planned, and we know that they planned since September of 1975, to return to NATO. This has a meaning only if you are returning to NATO's military structure where you might find some of the doors are closed. If you do not return then you maintain your sovereign national rights in the Aegean fully intact. Any other position on the issue is deceiving.

This policy, the lack of elemental strategy, placed our country, the government, under unbearable pressures and extortion by the powers of the West. I would like to refer to a statement by Prime Minister Panayiotis Kanellopoulos in this hall on 22 May 1980. He said: "It cannot be stated that the government succumbed to pressures.

"Had it succumbed to pressures then it would have come to terms and it would have returned to NATO's military wing." [inaudible interruption] Kanellopoulos replied to me and I believe this is important. This is why I read it. [inaudible interruption]

What does return to NATO mean for us, for Greece? First of all, what security does it offers us? In case of a world confrontation I believe that, both for you and for me, it would be of no interest where we are situated geographically. Humanity will simply not survive. The few who will survive may perhaps be in East Asia. This, however, is of no interest.

In case of a clash between the superpowers, the offer of NATO to us will not only be insignificant but it will even be a reason for the destruction of our people and our fatherland, because as the Soviets have stated clearly, so long as there are bases in our country from which nuclear missiles can be launched, then our country will be hit immediately. These are clear statements and we know them.

Now, however, we also have the other myth. This is the danger from the north. The minister of national defense has personally ended this mythology. He stated that there is no more danger from the north. The president of the republic, Karamanlis, visited the countries of the north, the Balkan north, both as a prime minister and as a president. He speaks of friendly relations which continually develop and gain strength and expand in many directions, both bipartite and multilateral. We applaud him. At the same time, however, we cannot talk of the danger from the north which obliges us to go where? To the very alliance which until today had threatened both our national independence and our territorial integrity.

Dear colleagues, there is no automation. At some time the 300 representatives of the nation must know what NATO contains. Most, and not only Greeks but also foreigners, believe that in case of an attack against a country, for example Greece, by some country from the north then automatically the alliance will come to the assistance of our country.

This is absolutely true. Article five of NATO's constitutional charter provides for consultations and decisions on whatever measures—probably including military measures—it will adopt. The Chamber of Deputies knows extremely well—it does know this—that the U.S. President cannot declare war without a concurrent view from Congress.

How automatic is all this and what kind of protection against unknown Balkan enemies will it provide us? By contrast, Greece today is in danger only from Turkey. None of us within these walls must for a single moment forget that Turkey is a mortal danger to our nation and to our people [applause].

The danger today comes from Turkey. Here is a small list: the invasion of Cyprus; violations of the Athens FIR; violations of the continental shelf; violations of national airspace; threats against the islands; and the question of western Thrace. I could expand on each one of these issues at length but I will not do so because everyone, as well as the public, knows about them. These are the actions of Turkey. Now we are extending the hand of brotherhood to Evren's junta so that we can say: Allies, we will march side by side; it does not matter that your soldiers and your tanks are in Cyprus and are trampling upon the sacred soil of the island. [applause]

Over and above all this, participation within NATO also means supplying useful information to Turkey with regard to our country's armed forces.

It is strange that the special experiences of our country, experiences shared neither by Italy, West Germany, France nor Great Britain, have not yet taught us even the elemental alphabet of foreign policy. We know that NATO--and, for us, NATO was identified for years and continues to be identified with the United States of America--intervened in the country's political life. The royal coup of 15 July 1975 was their work. We also know something else. The Prometheus plan, on the basis of which the colonels imposed their stark--NATOist--dictatorship in Greece, was based precisely on a NATO plan.

We know that both NATO and the United States support openly and shamelessly, I would say, all Turkish claims. And they have refused and continue to refuse what our government has considered possible--to exert pressure upon Turkey. There was a myth that if Greece became difficult, the United States, in fear, would pressure Turkey. Why should the United States fear anything from the Greek Government which has never denied them anything? [applause]

Over and above all this, we now approach the critical issue. PASOK argues and I argue that the conditions of the agreement mean the ceding of national sovereign rights. I say all this only within the certain limits allowed me.

The prime minister was truly disturbed, he was greatly disturbed and insulted because we have said and have stressed that tragic Cyprus was the first victim of the agreement. From the moment that our withdrawal was officially and responsibly linked internationally with the occupation of Cyprus, our return--while 38 percent of the island is still under occupation--cannot but inform the international public that, for us, the issue is closed. This is also what the Cypriots feel--not their official leaders who cannot stand up against the government of Greece, but the political forces of Cyprus. How can the Government of Greece accept as uniformed allies the same ones who are today violating Cyprus? This is unthinkable to me. [applause]

Over and above Cyprus we come to the notorious question: Is the Greek airspace 6 or 10 miles? It is clear that Greece has retreated from the 10 miles to 6. I would like to ask the prime minister if he remembers a dialogue which we had right here on 22 May 1980. Speaking to the prime minister I said: "Mr Chairman, I thank the prime minister for the replies and explanations which he has given us. However, I would like to ask one more thing. Is the national airspace 10 or 6 miles?" The reply of Prime Minister Rallis was the following (pay attention): "The national airspace is 10 miles. It is questioned by the other side but, by Greek laws, we have established Greek airspace at 10 miles and this is the Greek position." Is this the Greek position? Is this the position of the government today?

In 1978 Turkey altered the status of Smyrna. Until 1978, the sixth ATAF--the designation of Smyrna headquarters--was under two Americans: as of July 1978 it was taken over by the Turks. The prime minister correctly observed that at that very moment it became a Turkish headquarters and operational control was in fact limited to Turkish air, land and sea space. This is true. However, under the agreement we have now accepted, an equivalent headquarters will be established--some say at Larisa and I have also heard Athens mentioned, but I am not sure. This is not important. This will be the seventh ATAF. For the first time we have the issue presented--and this is where the key to the issue lies--of how will operational control be divided between the sixth and seventh ATAF, between Smyrna and Larisa? This is the question. You would expect me to tell you that I know the answer. I will tell you what I know and what I can say.

A three-member military committee--made up of the Turkish admiral, the Greek admiral and the U.S. admiral in Naples--is entrusted to find, through protracted, difficult negotiations, where this dividing line will fall in the Aegean. When drawn, however, this line will at the same time also include all other limits which exist in airspace. [Athens TO VIMA in Greek on 23 October carried the text of Papandreou's speech which includes the following additional passage at this point:

"Because this is a somewhat technical matter, permit me a few words on how the question stands:

"When we speak of operational control over airspace we speak of three completely different things:

"The first is what is known in English as the 'early warning area' which, in the case of Greece, until 1974 while we were in NATO, ended east of the Athens FIR. The Athens FIR was debated so many times in the Chamber of Deputies that I do not think it is necessary for me to explain the term.

"The second is what is described as 'tactical air operation.' This concerns attacks, operations,--up to 1974 this area had the Athens FIR as its eastern limit--between our islands and the Turkish coastline.

"There is something else described as 'gross tell' [as printed] which concerns the exchange of information. Starting from the Athens FIR, take 20 miles to the right. This is the area within which Turkey must report its flights to us. Take 20 miles to the west--I am speaking of 1974--and this is the area in which our own flights must be reported to Ankara.

"Therefore we have these three areas and I have this to state:

"When this notorious demarcation line between the sixth and seventh ATAF is found--it is not likely to go to the east it is only likely to move toward the west--all other limits will be drawn with it--the limits I have mentioned--and fundamentally this is our country's air defense.

"I believe that should this happen then the Athens FIR would be unable to operate as it has to date and it will also have to be moved to the west to the new demarcation line."] Now pay attention, there is an uncertainty here, however: When will this job finish? When will these negotiations lead to results?

It is not known when and, if you wish, my forecast and belief is that they will never agree on any specific line. The question will remain unsolved and will be settled by the Americans either in Naples or in Brussels. This is the conclusion which I have sincerely reached after studying the issue.

For me this is fundamentally a verbal dressing--this is the term used by our youth today--a verbal dressing of the basic Turkish demand that the status of 1974 should not be considered as the starting point for negotiations but that there should be another, uncertain and undefined status which, in the process, will be cleared up by this three-member committee. What is this? In essence this is a form of joint sovereignty--American, Turkish and Greek. Dear friends and colleagues, we thus have joint sovereignty over the Aegean. This is the raw truth and we must adjust to this truth and act accordingly.

I would like, dear colleagues, to read to you a dialogue between Karamanlis and me. It is a short one. It is dated 16 January 1979:

Papandreou: Is the government prepared to accept partition in the area of operational control zones (I am referring to airspace).
Karamanlis: Why should it accept this?

Papandreou: I am asking, Mr Prime Minister.
Karamanlis: Why should it accept partition? Are we traitors? Can you tell me that the government, any government would make concessions to another country at the expense of its own country's interests? Why should it do such a thing?

I did not reply to this question but I believe that today's events truly offer a final answer to this government prime minister and current president of the republic.

The TO VIMA version adds at this point:

"I do not have very much to tell you on sea space. The chief of the Naval General Staff is kept in the position of responsibility, in other words he is responsible for Aegean sea space. It is, however, clear to me that the U.S. admiral in Naples is in a position to organize missions and to relegate responsibility either to Turkey or to Italy, or Greece or France in whichever direction you may wish. In other words, Naples has all the ability to order missions under the command of an officer who is not Greek. I have not established this last fact. This is only my own conclusion, but it is not based on specific information, let us understand each other on this."]

The government gives or wants to give the impression that it negotiated strongly with the Americans and Turks and that it managed to achieve the desired results: That Turkey—Evren and with junta—give in under the relentless blows of Greek foreign policy. And yet we know that the Rallis letter to Carter demonstrated the exact opposite. It showed that we were the beggars. This was proved by the letter and it would be interesting as well as useful if at some time we would be able to see this letter, or at least the party leaders in the Chamber of Deputies should see it. [indistinct interruption] Forgive me, Mr Minister, your time will come. [shouting, applause]

What I consider unacceptable and insulting to the Greek people is the statement of the foreign minister made in the United States behind the backs of the government and the prime minister—that the question must be closed before elections are held. What right does he have to call upon a foreign power to follow domestic political developments and regulate its own foreign and defense policy on the basis of the concern, and I would say certainty, that the people will elect PASOK into power during the next election? [applause]

I would like to point out, for the benefit of the government's prime minister, that he is mistaken when he considers that now the basic provisions of the NATO agreement are applicable and that only technical issues—airspace, territorial waters and who has control, Turkey or Greece—only technical issues will be solved under the agreement. Therefore, there is no reason for the agreement to be presented to the Chamber of Deputies in accordance with article 28, paragraph two of the Constitution.

This is a mistake because it is also very clear that it was necessary to have a great many years of negotiations. It is clear that the prime minister of that time, Karamanlis, withdrew Greece from NATO not because of technical details which can now be smoothed out, but because of vast national interests which were being affected by the NATO agreement. We cannot accept that today's prime minister should state that these are secondary technical issues of a military nature. How much of a secondary issue is it if tomorrow this three-member committee sets for us a demarkation line and we find our islands in the east Aegan belonging in someone else's airspace? To what degree are these technical military issues?

It was also stated by the government that the constitutional charter of the alliance does not require parliamentary approval and ratification. Let the constitutional charger of NATO state whatever it pleases. We have a Constitution and it is impossible for provisions of NATO's constitutional charter to override provisions of our Constitution. Unfortunately, this does apply with respect to the EEC.

Communal law overrides the Constitution as we have stressed here in the past. The NATO constitutional charter, however, does not override our Constitution. Consequently, it should have been presented here for ratification.

In my opinion, we have here a violation of the Constitution. This is a stark violation of the Constitution. I therefore call upon the president of the republic to study the possibility--since he is not convinced that there is an obvious disharmony between the people's will and the Chamber--of whether or not he has the right, in accordance with the Constitution, to proclaim a plebiscite so that people from every corner of our land will be able to express themselves with a "yes" or a "no" on NATO. [applause]

At the same time, the prime minister also has the obligation, when the opposition points out the vast significance of the issue, to apply the Constitution and recommend to the president of the republic to dissolve the Chamber due to a national issue of vast significance as provided for under the Constitution. The prime minister, however, does not seem prepared to accept the invitation.

We await a plebiscite, we await elections; and we are certain that the people will win and that PASOK, which will effectively and determinedly protect national interests, will become the government so that the people and not NATO will be sovereign. [applause]

We have said that we consider the agreement to be invalid and to undertake an obligation which we have no reason to undertake. When PASOK gains power it will be in a position to abrogate the agreement but, because we respect the Greek people, we want to say something else; when we come into the government we will present the Rogers agreement for consideration by the Chamber of Deputies of that time so that the Chamber can decide in a sovereign manner. [applause] [confused interruption] I believe that when your prime minister spoke we did not guffaw.

I would like to make one final statement. PASOK does not wish to give parliamentary authority to this process which is a parody. [confused interruption] We will not walk out; we will sit it through until we see you on the rostrum. We will stay in order to force you to explain to the Greek people what you have done. [prolonged applause] [end recording]

[Begin Defense Minister Averof recording] In his speech the chairman of PASOK gave two kinds of lessons to the government; one to the technicians who handled the issue and one to the military commanders who unanimously accepted the conclusion of the negotiations. These two kinds of lessons were one of patriotism and dignity, and one of intelligence.

I accept the first lesson with humility because I believe that all those who are kneaded together with this nation in such a way that they have become one of its organic cells have the duty to listen to all lessons on patriotism so that perhaps they will find ways to improve themselves. I therefore thank the chairman of PASOK for his lesson on patriotism. However, I refuse to accept the lesson on intelligence because I do not imagine that many of you understood much of what he had to say either, and what we did understand included horrible inaccuracies.

I will reply to certain of these points. Others will reply to other points such as the question of legality and the violation of the Constitution in which the reply, I believe, will be closemouthed.

I hereby request that I be allowed a pause in order to say that, when there was voting on another dire crime--the agreement on the EC--PASOK was absent and did not even sit down to discuss it. [applause] Perhaps this time it will sit down and vote against this issue as it has stated.

What has been the general position of the chairman of PASOK? The old one: Out of NATO. To begin, I would like to observe that recently PASOK has undertaken an impressive and spectacular turn away from the one-party socialist countries toward the socialist parties of the West. I greet this turn and we are following it with interest. It is strange, however, that all Western socialist parties support NATO for the sake of their own countries' security—all except PASOK. It also has other differences with them such as nonparticipation in the Socialist International; but, with respect to the security of their own countries, those parties favor participation in NATO while PASOK opposes it.

I know the refrain and I know [indistinct interruption]. I thought that you would not interrupt me, as the chairman requested. I would have said it myself. I know the counterargument; that those parties, those countries have no arguments with any of the other NATO members. But as will be seen subsequently with regard to these differences, we will be in an incomparably stronger position to cope with them and serve our national interests than we would have been outside of NATO. This was clearly and excellently explained by the prime minister of the government. I will also make certain observations on this point.

We have to deal with the security of our country, the security of all countries. This is the alpha and omega of the political thinking of every responsible man. Regarding this, we see that all Western parties, socialist or not, are gravely concerned about finding support somewhere. On the one hand, they see the general situation and, on the other, they see that one must find support somewhere because the beautiful but weak Third World is the only one that will suffer without basic assistance. Here, gentlemen, I would like to tell you that it is very correct to say that all Western parties, socialist parties included, all parties with the exception of the communist parties, even the Eurocommunists, support participation in NATO. They do so very correctly because the international horizon is very dark; it has rarely been so dark.

In contrast with the Portuguese, Spanish, Italians, Belgians and Dutch, whose parties all favor NATO, we find ourselves in a more critical position from two aspects: one is that, with our weak frontiers, we are at one of the most critical crossroads of the world and certainly the most critical in Europe; the other is that neighboring our own area and within the broader region we have 2/3 of the world's oil reserves. If, therefore, the parties of the West, socialist or not, have reasons to be interested in their countries' memberships in NATO, then we have 10 times as many reasons for this. Yet it is at this very moment that PASOK has chosen to tell us that we must leave NATO and enter the Third World, to tell us that we must leave the alliance with which we most certainly have specific complaints but with which we are linked by traditional ties—cultural and strong economic ties. It has chosen this very moment when the horizon is so dark that all governments are concerned about future developments.

So that I might possibly improve myself, I humbly accepted the lesson in patriotism from patriot Andreas Papandreou. For reasons of intelligence, however, I refuse to accept the lesson in intelligence from professor-politician Andreas Papandreou for the very simple reason that I fear that his words are far removed from reality; in addition, the details on which he relied in order to reach his conclusions are also far removed from reality.

I would like to note some of these details. I will not talk for long about the question of why we withdrew from NATO. This was explained very well by the prime minister along with the reasons of why are are returning. I will limit myself to saying that it was correctly stressed that, first, we look toward the end result in public affairs; in accordance with this end result we make our decisions. We must look at the reasons which led to that decision. The reasons were impressive—exercise of pressure, demonstration of active protest, insufficient results, the need to change.

Naturally, the chairman of PASOK is inured to change. [indistinct interruption] Naturally, on such a basic problem he ought to have forgiven us for this change. Changes in international politics are daily matters. Woe to countries which, because once they have done something, refuse to change their policy.

I will not deal for long with the issue of Cyprus because there is absolutely no basis to the statement that we are weakening Cyprus by our return to NATO. In what way is the just cause of the Cypriots being weakened? Do international organizations mean a weakening? Do we weaken ourselves by returning to NATO?

Apart from the Makarios statement which the prime minister read, we also have other recent statements. The Cyprus Government does not disagree on this. It is only PASOK which disagrees. The reason is another matter. On the contrary, we believe that within NATO—with a politically and militarily stronger position—we would be in a better position to cope with the situation and to help our Cypriot brothers to finally find an acceptable solution. [prolonged applause]

I now come to a question which has been very confused, or rather which has been greatly complicated even by the masterly tactics of PASOK's chairman who discusses and criticizes more with slogans than with arguments. These are tactics which, when the slogans are well placed—and he knows how to place them well—do influence many listeners. This is the question of the Aegean. The question of the 6 to 10 mile limit falls within this issue. How does this question, which is so greatly exploited by many and around which so much demagogy is conducted, truly stand?

Fifty years ago we declared, through domestic law, that littoral airspace has a width of 10 miles. Almost everyone questions this. We also have arguments to support our own viewpoint. The others, however, also have arguments to support theirs. We do not give ground on ours. There is no instance when we did give in. I will come to the one mentioned by the chairman of PASOK. Our position is that, because we adopted this stand 50 years ago, the 10-mile limit applies. The others question it.

How do we solve the problem? There are three ways: 1 — To appeal to international arbitration, to an international court which will issue a verdict which, as we will state in advance, we will accept so that this uncertainty and demagogy can come to an end; 2 — Because there is no international executive authority which, even if it issued a decision in our favor, could enforce the 10-mile limit, to enforce this limit on our own, in other words, to state and ensure that any aircraft of any government which flies between 6 and 10 miles will be shot down; and 3 — Extension of our territorial waters from 6 to 10 miles. In this case, automatically and according to international law, our airspace will also become 10 miles.

A careful and responsible study of the issue, however, led the Greek Government to conclude that it will never give up this right of extension of up to 12 [as heard]. We would only extend if it became unavoidable. However, on a temporary basis we do not do this because we believe that it would generate various reactions. If we did this then the Soviet Union would dismantle its permanent anchorage, the greatest it has, at a distance of from 7 to 8 miles from our own land, and it would have to seek elsewhere for a permanent anchorage for its Mediterranean fleet. We do not want such a thing to happen because we have friendly relations. [prolonged applause]

These are the three ways for solving the problem: arbitration; enforcement of the issue through our airforce, something we could do as a last resort; or expansion of our territorial waters. Let PASOK tell us which one of these three solutions it would choose?

I now come to the question of why we said that, with respect to NATO maneuvers, we acdept the 6-mile limit. I will not refer to the fact that this stand was adopted in 1962 [indistinct interruption] in 1960 [correcting himself], and that the government of the center under patriot and democrat Yeoryios Papandreou, who also had absolute patriotic pride, did not object to it. They found it to be correct and natural and I will tell you why.

From the moment we became part of NATO, as we were at that time, it was not important if for the sake of exercise we accepted the 6-mile limit. This is because in NATO maneuvers, conducted for the sake of training for war, there are no national or international areas. The maneuvers are conducted everwhere. They are conducted over Turkey, over Greece. It is only during the planning stage, which is conducted with unanimity, that we must also give our approval of the maneuver. It is then that everyone takes care and places certain sensitive areas outside the overflight pattern because one does not want these areas to be observed. As for the remaining areas, there are no limits.

During NATO maneuvers prior to 1974, we landed in Turkish airfields; they landed in Greek airfields. We conducted practice shooting on ranges within Turkey and they did the same on Greek ranges. There was no question of 6 or 10. Why then should we say "no, for maneuvers it is 10 and you cannot pass through"? Therefore, it is not important that we said we recognize that pice of paper which defines the 6-mile limit for maneuvers.

There are three categories of forces with certain subdivisons: forces which nations make available to the NATO commander in chief in which one part is under his absolute command and the other is under his command with certain prerequisites; those which have been made available for future placement under his command--earmarked for assignment; and others which are designated as "other forces". It is these last forces which are made available to the commander in chief upon the decision of each member government. He is in no position to tell us; I want so many--naturally if you are in, you cannot refuse to give anything--but what and how much one can give depends upon oneself.

There is also a written obligation signed by Greece and by all the other partners that at the start of every 6-month period or, in case of national emergency, the member has every right to withdraw its forces both from the first and the second categories and to bring them into the category of forces under the national command. Consequently, there is no question of our assigning them unless, as the chairman of PASOK stated, we have treasonous intentions, assign all of our forces, and give up any chance of getting them back.

The very same applies to the deployment of forces. Deployment, with the exception of the very first category, is undertaken by the staff of the member state. If, for example, it is believed that there is an Italian, not an Italian but some threat against the Ionian Islands and the NATO commander in chief denies this, then the Greek Command is free to make the deployment according to its own judgement for coping with the threat.

It is therefore impossible to say that we are joining and handing over our defense even if we assumed that all of NATO was hostile, an assumption which we do not accept.

You see, therefore, that we have all sorts of guarantees. I had prepared notes to expand further but I believe I will limit myself to the main points which I will touch upon in the simplest manner so that we can understand whether or not we are losing anything.

I will limit myself to discussing two other questions. One is the FIR. The prime minister admitted that Smyrna headquarters' jurisdiction, which is under a Turk who nevertheless carries out the duties of a NATO commander, for the time being stops at the Athens FIR. This is a fact and this is a success.

What is the FIR? FIR, gentlemen, is not a frontier; it is a demarcation line provided for under the agreement of Chicago on international air communication under ICAO [International Civil Aviation Organization]. Under this agreement, Greece has control of air traffic on one side of the line. This is the FIR. It is not a frontier. There are questions here, as well, on which we have differences. One is whether the FIR applies only to civil aircraft but not to military aircraft. We argue that it also applies to military aircraft and that they must be announced. Others argue to the contrary.

This then is the FIR. The question arises as to where this FIR will be located. At the moment it is situated where it has been. What will happen later will be defined by negotiations which will be conducted with us having a veto in the same way that others have it, with an equal position toward the others. [applause]

It is here that the great importance of this agreement lies. Until now we discussed and negotiated to find conditions which would allow the lifting of the Turkish veto. This was the situation during the past 3 to 4 years. We did not agree because we refused to compromise.

Today we enter with the authority of all the documents we have signed and with all the replies furnished by Davos. At the same time, if we had stayed out of the alliance, the Turks would have been the only Western ally in this entire area; it would have received even greater military aid and we would have had to rely upon our own forces for equipping our armed forces with our potential insufficient to guarantee our own armaments. We would also have had to face a spare parts problem because our materiel is nearly exclusively American. Favorable credits are also American and would be difficult to replace.

For all these reasons, I believe that with this agreement we have offered an important service. I believe it has only one disadvantage; that it could not be published. It cannot be published because, unfortunately, it was given a high classification at NATO, and under this classification we could not publish it. However, not only the Turks know about it, dear colleages. It is known to your leader, to the briefed political leaders. It is known to our military staffs. Over and above this, the government has announced the essence of its contents and you cannot imagine that it is announcing lies when it is certain that one day, which may not be too distant, the text will be published. Consequently, the fact is that the text is not being published, and I personally admit that I fail to understand why and am seeking the reason which obviously concerns us. I am sorry that the text is not being published so that each one of us can understand under what good and logical conditions we are returning to NATO. I reiterate that the text is not unknown to the briefed leaders. All of them saw it, our military staffs know it, we know it and, in the future, the entire Greek nation will know it.

It is not permissible for the president of PASOK to consider that men like Davos, Gratsios, Kouris, Papaefstathiou and other honorable officers who worked with great devotion.... [interruption by Papandreou]

Papandreou: What you are trying to say at this moment is totally unsuitable. [commotion]

Averof: Why, Mr President, you tell us.... [interruption by Papandreou]

Papandreou: Because, I also respect the officers about which you just spoke. This, however does not mean that the government has the right to blame the responsibility which it carries absolutely as a political government upon the men and officers and staff officers of the Greek Army. [applause] In addition you know, Mr Minister, that the staff, those who are on it in uniform , do not have the opportunity to express their views in public or to deny what you are saying tonight. How can they tell the Greek people directly how they evaluate this agreement when they do not have the right? And why do you refer to them? What does this peculiar and strange reference offer you? [applause]

Avgerof: I have one more thing to say about your statement. Full responsibility lies with the government and we claim this responsibility and initiative. There is no doubt about this. I am however obliged to mention it because it refers to excellent officers who cooperated in this task. These are officers and men of excellent stature who believe that, if there was not just reason but the slightest concession, they would not have participated in it. [applause] It is only in this sense that I refer to them and not to place responsibility on them. The responsibility is ours and we claim it. [applause]

Dear colleagues, these simple words which I believe are very clear and are based upon documents are the ones to which we refer from this official rostrum on the issue. This is what we will reiterate in a year from the election balconies to the Greek people who, with their experience and wisdom, will surely approve with their crushing majority. [prolonged applause]

The few who are creating a furor around the agreement without knowing anything of general policy, apart from the slogans handed out to them, these few noisemakers who ride in private cars brandishing electronic loudspeakers, these lamentable heirs of the village, these few are not the Greek people. Luckily we have gone through a tempestuous life. We have lived through great storms and we were not intimidated by other furors much more threatening, long lasting and terrible. We will not be intimidated now by these furors. We will stand upright in the service of the Greek nation, calmly awaiting their verdict. [prolonged applause] [End recording]

WILLY BRANDT ENDS VISIT AFTER AWARD BY ATHENS CITY

AT261000 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Text] Chairman of the Socialist Democratic Party of the Federal Republic of Germany Willy Brandt left Athens at noon today. Earlier, Athens Municipality awarded to Brandt the city's gold medal of honor at a special ceremony at Athens Municipality.

The Municipal Council's resolution on the award stresses the award is made in recognition of Brandt's contribution to the struggle of the Greek people and their resistence organizations against the 7-year dictatorship. Mayor Beis, in addressing Brandt, stressed the city of Athens proclaims Brandt an honorary citizen.

Replying, Brandt expressed gratitude for the honor awarded to him by the most ancient, as he described it, municipal authority in Europe, the Municipality of Athens, and referred to the problems, political, economic and ecologic, faced by the world today.

Tomorrow the minister will visit the prison of Tirins and the archeological sites of Mycinae and Epidaurus.

CUMHURIYET SEES CARTER'S CYPRUS REMARKS AS ELECTION TALK

WC270929 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 25 Oct 80 pp 1, 7

[Excerpts] In a statement after Greece's reintegration into NATO, President Carter said: "Now it is the turn of the Cyprus dispute to be resolved." In a way, Carter has a right to talk in this manner, because the event [the integration] should be considered an achievement for the White House. The election winds blowing in Washington may have pushed Carter into making an investment in the Greek Cypriot sector.

However, the repercussions which this statement has caused in Turkey and in the Turkish Cypriot sector are likely to create negative situations in the future. TFSC President Denktas characterized Carter's statement on Cyprus as an "interference" and criticized Washington "for talking as if it is going to resolve the Cyprus dispute itself." This is how Cyprus looks at it. But Carter's words have created some effects in Turkey as well. It is sufficient for the time to say that Turkey, which is aware of the fact that it is carrying the responsibility of an extraordinary period, is looking at the matter with patience and temperance. It should not be forgotten that there is some sensitivity against "American interference" in every sector of Turkey.

Under these circumstances, President Carter's immoderate words would naturally cause some discomfort in Ankara.

However, it is unlikely for the President, who has been carried away by the excitement of the forthcoming elections, to be able to take such delicate matters into account while winking at the Greek Cypriots.

HURRIYET CITES U.S. PRESSURE FOR AEGEAN, CYPRIOT SETTLEMENTS

WC271921 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 26 Oct 80 pp 1, 11

[Excerpts] The pressure brought to bear on Greece by the United States for the purpose of strengthening the southeastern wing of NATO at a time when a hot war is raging in the Middle East has begun to yield results, and it has been announced that Turkey and Greece will meet in December to discuss the Aegean issue.

While efforts are being exerted toward resolving the Aegean dispute between Turkey and Greece, diplomatic circles in Ankara say that TFSC President Denktas has reached an "important" identity of views with Head of State Kenan Evren and Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu as well as with other competent officials in talks he has had in Ankara. These circles also report that Denktas has been briefed on international contacts. It is further maintained by the same circles that the negotiations may pave the way to a definite solution of the Cyprus dispute.

On the other hand, circles close to the Foreign Ministry have stated that the heretofore determined Turkish foreign policy has not changed in any way and that Turkey's views on the Cyprus and the Aegean issues are known. In view of this, Turkey supports the idea of settling the Cyprus issue through intercommunal talks in a manner which would protect the rights of both communities.

Previous Cyprus talks were obstructed by the Greek Cypriots. Diplomatic circles have asserted however that this time the United States could exercise pressure on Greece and Greece could do the same on the Greek Cypriots for the furtherance of the intercommunal negotiations.

LEADERS MEET DENKTAS, SUPPORT TURKISH CYPRIOT POSITIONS

General Evren Statement

TA241600 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, began his official contacts in Ankara this morning. After his visit to the Ataturk Mausoleum, Denktas met with Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara and with Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu separately. Denktas was received by Head of State Gen Kenan Evren at 1430.

In a statement at the meeting, Denktas said that the Turkish Cypriots were grateful to Turkey. Denktas said: You have, at the last moment, saved the only motherland of the Turkish people. [sentence as heard] You have made a great sacrifice in the path of democracy through Ataturkish principles.

Also speaking at the meeting, General Evren said: The motherland will always be on your side. As we have always stated, a bicommunal, bizonal federal system and the security of the Turkish Cypriot community are our primary conditions. We wish that the intercommunal talks, which have resumed in a bid to realize these, will continue with success and that a definite solution will be reached. We will surely extend every possible aid on this issue.

Denktas will meet with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen at 1730. Denktas and Turkmen will later hold a joint news conference in connection with the talks.

Ulusu Statement

TA242021 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Excerpts] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, who arrived on an official visit in Ankara yesterday, has concluded his contacts. Denktas visited the Ataturk Mausoleum this morning; he placed a wreath, paid his respects and singed the special book at the mausoleum. Denktas met with Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara at 1000. Denktas then called on Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu at 1100. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and the minister of foreign affairs, defense and tourism of the federated state, Kenan Atakol, were also present at the meeting. Ulusu gave a luncheon in honor of Denktas at the foreign visitors mansion.

In a statement at the luncheon, Ulusu said that the services rendered by Denktas in all the phases of the Cyprus problem, which is a national cause, have earned him historic importance. Ulusu also expressed his happiness in welcoming Denktas to Ankara as the president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus and extended his government's greetings to the Turkish Cypriots. Noting that, through the courage and sacrifice of the motherland and the Turkish Cypriots, great steps have been taken in the Cypriot cause, Ulusu added that the Turkish Cypriots are now living in freedom and security in their own region and that they are trying to complete their economic development. Ulusu said that Turkey will extend all possible aid to the Turkish Cypriots in this field as well. Expressing his satisfaction that the intercommunal talks, which resumed as a result of efforts by UN Secretary General Waldheim, are continuing in a positive atmosphere, Ulusu expressed the wish that the talks will lead to a just and lasting settlement that will serve world peace.

Also speaking at the luncheon, Denktas thanked the Turkish Government on behalf of the Turkish Cypriot community. Noting that the Turkish administrators had shouldered a great responsibility in order to restore democracy in Turkey through Ataturkist principles, despite the difficult conditions, Denktas added that these people were determined to help the Turkish Cypriots.

Denktas called on Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen at his office at 1730. In a statement before the meeting, Turkmen said that, at the meeting, they would assess the results achieved at the intercommunal talks in Cyprus. Denktas said that the fact that those who were closely connected with the Cyprus problem and its phases are not in power is the greatest guarantee for the Turkish Cypriots. Noting that he favored the continuation of the Cyprus intercommunal talks and a positive outcome, Denktas added that, however, this could not be achieved by one of the parties alone. He said that the Greek Cypriots have to accept the principle of Turkish Cypriot partnership. Stressing that this was one of the major principles, Denktas said that this principle meant a federal system composed of units with equal political rights. Denktas said: If they want a real federation, which they say they want, then we also want that. Then they should accept this equality.

Denktas and the delegation accompanying him will leave Turkey tomorrow.

Denktas Concludes Visit

TA250929 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0900 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, who has concluded his official contacts in Ankara, left Turkey by air this morning. Denktas was seen off with a military ceremony at Ankara's Esenboga Airport by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen also attended the ceremony.

In a statement at the airport before his departure, Denktas said that he exchanged views in full agreement [with Turkish officials] on the current situation of the Cyprus problem. Expressing satisfaction over his contacts in Ankara, Denktas said: I am returning to the island stronger than before.

TERCUMAN COMMENTS ON DENKTAS' VISIT TO ANKARA

NC270902 Instanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 26 Oct 80 p 4

[Article by Fahir Armaoglu: "Denktas' Visit"]

[Text] Denktas' visit to Ankara the other day and the contacts he had with Turkish authorities were undoubtedly closely linked with Greece's return to the military wing of NATO. Although Turkish Government circles have refrained from establishing a link between the Cyprus issue and Greece's reintegration into NATO, it is impossible to deny the existence of such a link. Naturally, there is no organic or legal link between the two issues. But we cannot help seeing the existence of a political link.

The understanding and good will shown by Turkey toward Greece on the subject of NATO has created great, but probably somewhat unnecessary, optimism in the West from the point of view of Turkish-Greek relations. Purposely or otherwise, the statements of the Greek authorities have provoked this optimism. In this atmosphere, the West appears to be expecting new and positive developments in the Cyprus question. This being the case, both Turkey and the TFSC have felt the necessity of pursuing a careful policy and of making a new appraisal of the situation.

We do not doubt that the goodwill gesture shown by Turkey will greatly influence the talks which will be held in the UN General Assembly next month. This requires the Turkish Cypriot side to be very careful during the intercommunal talks until the UN General Assembly resolution is issued. This is one of the reasons that have prompted the Ankara talks.

However, all this should not be interpreted as meaning that Turkey will adopt a new and mellow policy on the Cyprus question. On this occasion we wish to draw attention to certain important points connected with Denktas' visit to Ankara.

President Denktas was met by the prime minister and the foreign minister at the airport in Ankara. We believe that this is the first time Denktas has been welcomed in this manner. Another point is the extremely complimentary words which the honorable head of state used in speaking about President Denktas.

All this indicates that the Turkish Government fully supports Denktas. This is indeed a great advantage for Denktas in the intercommunal talks. Nevertheless, we also wish to draw attention to the difference between the tough statement Denktas made, particularly about the United States, at his arrival in Ankara and the mellow and dignified attitude he adopted after his contacts. It is understood that the Turkish Government is justifiably deeming it fit to preserve, at least for a while, the mellow atmosphere which has come about through its contribution. For this purpose it has chosen a resolute but mellow policy.

FOREIGN MINISTER DEPLORES IMPOSITION OF VISA REQUIREMENTS

TA241528 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1510 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 24 Oct (AA)--Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen "regrets" the decision of Benelux countries to require visas from Turkish citizens wishing to enter their territory.

He added the Turkish Government had already decided on certain administrative measures which would render it unnecessary for other countries to require visas, and further plans were being made for legislative measures as well.

PRESS REACTIONS TO GREECE'S REINTEGRATION INTO NATO

NC241159 [Editorial report] On 23 October 1980, CUMHURIYET, on pages 1 and 7, carried comments from former National Defense Minister Hasan Esat Isik on Greece's reintegration into the military wing of NATO. In this connection, Isik says: "The Turkish Government has taken a bold decision on the assumption that Greece will behave sensibly in the future." Stating that Greece should be overjoyed at Turkey's consent to its return to NATO--before the areas of control and responsibility over the Aegean have been determined--Isik adds: "And yet, Greece is organizing demonstrations which are protesting its return to the military wing of NATO. And Greek Premier Rallis proclaims that Greece will not forego its claims over the Aegean. These actions do not augur well."

Isik further states that for a valid evaluation of Greece's return to the military wing of NATO, one has to become familiar with all the details of the Rogers plan, and adds: "If Greece continues to maintain its excessive claims after its return, Turkish-Greek relations will become more tense than they are today, and eventually, the southern flank of NATO stands to gain nothing from Greece's return." Isik continues: "If Turkey's consent is not to prejudice its rights and responsibilities, we must be very careful about the military plans of NATO concerning the Aegean. In addition to seeing that our control and responsibilities within NATO extends to the middle of the Aegean, we must also insist on the disarmament of the Greek islands and on the reduction of the Greek area of control at Limni to reasonable dimensions. Furthermore, Turkey and Greece must jointly determine their national airspace, so that the Turkish and Greek forces do not oppose each other and are positioned according to the joint defense needs of NATO. If we fail to show the necessary sensitivity, NATO military headquarters may adopt decisions--as it did in the past--which could facilitate the creation of anti-Turkey faits accomplis by Greece in the Aegean. Greece must not abuse the confidence placed in it for the future. I hope it will not. Because Turkish and Greek relations may then assume great dimensions. If, however, Greece fails to show sagacity, we must not forget that Turkey comes first, followed by our responsibilities as a member of NATO, and we must act accordingly."

On 23 October 1980, MILLIYET, on pages 2 and 8, carried a commentary by Semi Kohen: "Athens' Return." The commentator says: "After secret negotiations and bargaining, which lasted for several weeks, Greece has at last reentered the military wing of NATO. This is a gratifying development for those who favor the improvement of Turkish-Greek relations and who do not wish to see the NATO defense system weakened in the region." "In fact, the Rogers formula introduces an 'interim regime' concerning the question of control and command areas in the Aegean. The status which Greece had preserved before 1974, when it abandoned the military flank of NATO, is no longer valid. At this moment, there is not an established status. A temporary arrangement is coming into force whose technical details are as yet unknown. The definite status of the control and command areas will be determined through subsequent negotiations."

The writer then goes on to say: "By consenting to the Rogers plan, Greece has, at one point, made an important concession. As will be remembered, Athens wanted to return to the pre-1974 status."

After explaining the reasons which had led to Greece's departure from NATO, Kohen continues: "In the end, Athens must have realized that this sentimental reaction served no useful purpose, for the Cyprus dispute has not been resolved as a result. A section of the Greek Cypriot community and the Greek opposition consider Greece's reintegration into NATO, before any improvements have been made toward the settlement of the Cyprus dispute, as a substantial concession. However, the Greek Government appears to have sensed that its return to NATO cannot be used as a weapon in the Cyprus dispute, and that if it was used, it would boomerang."

After dwelling on the advantages to Turkey of Greece's return to the military wing of NATO, the writer says: "By agreeing to Greece's return to NATO, Turkey has had to forego its right of veto, but in evaluating this, we must take into account 'the sacrifices' Greece has made. What was the purpose of keeping Greece out of NATO or constantly looking upon it as an enemy? What would be the value of a veto, if Greece eventually decided to abandon NATO altogether? Those who think that this formula serves Greece's interests more than Turkey's should pay attention to what the Greek opposition is saying."

On 23 October 1980 TERCUMAN, on page 4, carried an article by Fahir Armaoglu: "Greece in NATO." Among other things, the writer says: "The West has been highly gratified by Greece's return to NATO, saying that the southeastern flank of NATO has again gained strength. At this moment, it is difficult for us to share this optimism. Because this flank is now divided into two separate headquarters, one in Izmir and the other in Larissa, whereas in the past there was only one headquarters, in Izmir. "The southeastern flank has thus lost its integral status and it has been converted into a system of 'cooperation.' The effectiveness of this cooperation from now on depends on the importance which Greece will attach to its relations with Turkey. Otherwise, nothing much can be achieved through the present agreement, and the military structure and the plans of the southeastern flank may have to undergo extremely serious changes." The writer then concludes: "Time will reveal everything. Turkey has ventured a gesture of goodwill. What is actually important is the proper evaluation of this good will by Greece and our Western allies. It is particularly important that this goodwill should not be based on binding situations. Another important aspect is that it is now Greece's turn to show some effort."

FOREIGN MINISTRY MEETINGS WITH GREECE SCHEDULED FOR DECEMBER

TA260720 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0500 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] The problems between Turkey and Greece will be discussed in bilateral meetings to be held in December in Athens and Brussels. The meetings will be held at the level of the secretaries general of the Foreign Ministries of the two countries. The first of the meetings will be held in Athens on 3 and 4 December. The Aegean Sea, Aegean airspace and Aegean continental shelf issues will be discussed.

SWAPO'S NUJOMA HOLDS TALKS WITH GENSCHER

[Excerpts] Bonn, 24 Oct (DPA)--The South-West African People's Organization [SWAPO] which is engaged in a guerrilla war, is prepared to take part in internationally supervised elections as a precondition for Namibia's independence and to respect the results. This was stated by SWAPO leader Sam Nujoma to journalists in Bonn today following political talks with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. At the same time he made it quite clear that he believed South Africa wanted to prevent such elections, despite protestations to the contrary, because a SWAPO victory, which Nujoma regards as certain, would mean the loss of South Africa's influence over Namibia.

Speaking at a dinner last night Genscher welcomed SWAPO's willingness to accept the relevant Security Council resolution without reservations and described this attitude as an "important point in common between SWAPO and the Federal Republic." The minister expressed disapproval of the fact that South Africa--although it had agreed to the UN plan in principle--was now delaying its implementation. Genscher went on to say that the Federal Republic had a vital interest in a free and independent Namibia. This was also in the interests of about 30,000 Germans and citizens of German stock in the former German colony.

Nujoma described Bonn's commitment to a peaceful solution in Namibia as proof of German sympathy and support for the Namibian people, but he criticized the close economic cooperation between the Federal Republic and South Africa, mentioning the transfer of technological knowledge in the nuclear sphere and German investments.

The Bonn Foreign Ministry said that a large part of Genscher's talks with Nujoma had been concerned with the future of the Germans in Namibia, and that the SWAPO leader had expressly talked about "Namibian citizens of German stock." Speaking to journalists, Nujoma said that the Germans had the same rights as other citizens: "We are also fighting for the liberation of the German Namibians." Nujoma will visit Hamburg on Sunday as the guest of the Africa Institute there.

STEEL COMPANY SIGNS COOPERATION AGREEMENT WITH USSR

DW271440 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 27 Oct 80 p 13

[Text] Baden-Baden, 25/26 October 1980--The Korf Steel Corporation of Baden-Baden has concluded an agreement on cooperation in the field of steel technology with the USSR State Committee for Science and Technology.

The signing took place in Moscow on 23 October by the deputy chairman of the Soviet State Committee, Prof Dzhermen M. Gvishiani, and the chairman of the board of the Korf Steel Corporation, Dr Willy Korf.

The cooperation under this agreement relates primarily to the operation of small-scale steelworks on the basis of the direct reduction process as well as of scrap metal. It is generally known that the Korf group operates six small-scale steelworks of its own in the world and, beyond that, shares in the construction of many such installations.

The agreement between Korf and the USSR, which initially runs for 5 years, is aimed at utilizing the advantages of small-scale steelworks in the USSR as well. It is generally known that the Korf Corporation cooperates closely with the USSR's steel industry as the supplier of four direct reduction installations of the Midrex type which are under construction for the Stariy-Oskol project near Kursk, so that this new agreement amounts to an intensification of the cooperation practiced to date.

COMMISSION ON TECHNOLOGICAL COOPERATION WITH PRC MEETS IN BONN

LD271544 Hamburg DPA in German 1357 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 27 Oct (DPA)--The People's Republic of China and the Federal Republic aim to expand their cooperation in science and technology. This is the purpose of the first joint commission for scientific-technological cooperation which began today in Bonn. The commission is headed by Hans-Hilger Hausenschild, state secretary for research, and Shao Dongwan, vice minister of the State Scientific and Technological Commission.

During its 3-day meeting the commission, which was set up during a visit to China by Research and Technology Minister Volker Hauff in 1979, will first examine the state of joint projects already agreed upon in the fields of energy planning, raw materials and materials research, and ore extraction and oil prospecting. A program for cooperation in other fields over the next few years will then also be elaborated. On this it was said that it might possibly be decided to undertake a joint pilot project with regard to the utilization of renewable energy sources, with particular emphasis on biosubstances and wind energy for electricity production in the rural areas of China.

CDU'S KOHL CALLS UPON SPD, FDP TO REVIEW EAST-WEST RELATIONS

LD271452 Hamburg DPA in German 1311 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 27 Oct (DPA)--The CDU has suggested to the SPD and the FDP that there should be a thorough assessment by all the parties of Eastern and inter-German policy. Party Chairman Helmut Kohl said in Bonn today, with the approval of the CDU Presidium, that such an assessment of East-West relations and the inter-German situation ought to reveal the common foundation of policy on inter-German relations and of foreign policy on a realistic basis. Kohl also stressed, however, that "the CDU is not prepared retroactively to accept a share of the responsibility for the Eastern and inter-German policy pursued by the Federal Government so far." Kohl gave assurances that the historic fundamental decision taken by the first chancellor, Konrad Adenauer, to join the West and to support the political unity of Europe and the alliance with the United States remained the basis of the inter-German and foreign policy of his party. This also applies to the 1980's.

Kohl's offer of solidarity in foreign and inter-German policy has also been understood in Bonn as a rejection of demands and commentaries calling for a change of course by the CDU and CSU notwithstanding its basic principles in this field.

Kohl reaffirmed that the CDU continued to support a policy of understanding and cooperation in all spheres with the Soviet Union and the other Warsaw Pact states, "but the Soviet Union must accept that it cannot unilaterally dictate the conditions of our policy." A realistic foreign policy means the readiness to firmly oppose the interests of the other side with one's own interests. "On this basis there must be a struggle for a peaceful balance of interests, whereby the West must never abandon its contant aims of peace and freedom." Kohl said it was particularly urgent to give the Eastern and inter-German policy an unmistakable and clearly-defined concept of realistic detente. This was an indispensible demand by the Union. East and West understood detente differently. For the West, detente meant human rights and balance; for the East, repression and preponderance. "Only clarity in concepts and aims can guarantee a clear policy which can be understood by friend and adversary," Kohl said.

According to Kohl, the events in the GDR and in Poland show an insoluble contradiction between real detente and the communist domination over their own population. The East was placed time and time again under pressure to turn back the wheel of detente because the people did not relinquish the idea of freedom and used every opportunity to expand their area of freedom.

East Berlin's policy of putting up barriers made it plain that the internal problems in the societies of the Warsaw Pact had led to a massive hardening of Soviet strategy. As a result, the SED did not shrink from carrying out drastic measures burdening the GDR population and at the same time violating obligations it had entered into in treaties.

FDP SEEN PREPARING SEPARATE DEFENSE CONCEPT

DW271358 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 27 Oct 80 p 39

[Text] The Free Democrats intend to deprive the military people of the planning function for the Bundeswehr for the next several years.

Hans Apel had predicted a "dramatic debate" on the future of the Bundeswehr for early 1981. However, the fight will start earlier than would be to the liking of the defense minister: The Free Democrats plan to appear for the coalition talks on security policy with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on Thursday of this week with a concept all worked out.

The liberals want to remove the power-hungry generals and arms experts from making the decisions on armament and equipment in the next several years. The FDP instead wants a group of parliamentarians supported by independent experts to have the say-so. An FDP deputy said, "Hans Apel has hard times ahead."

The reason for the smaller coalition partner's unusual plan is that Apel's coffers are empty. The inventory of the past few weeks brought to light that even with an increased defense budget the arms already ordered cannot be paid for. There is not just the lack of DM10 billion for the "Leopard 2" tank, the "Tornado" multipurpose bomber, the "Alpha Jet" ground combat plane, the F-122 frigates and the motor torpedo boats of the 143-A class. There is no money for urgent construction measures--barracks, housing, depts--either. Experts think an additional DM21 billion is needed at this time.

It is unclear, moreover, what the Americans will demand of the Germans after the November elections. In any event, whether the name of the new president will be Jimmy Carter or Ronald Reagan, greater contributions to the NATO alliance will become due and payable.

The commission on the "structure and armament of the German Armed Forces in the nineties" suggested by the Free Democrats should therefore first ascertain what can be handled in the next few years in financial and personnel respects and whether military strategy and funds are still in harmony.

"The generals," said Deputy Juergen Moellemann in justifying his party's demand in a speech to the FDP working group for security policy, "keeping thinking in categories of materiel battles: Tanks against tanks, airplanes against airplanes, ship against ship. This must cease."

His colleague Kurt Jung warned against "gigantism" in the Defense Ministry. Experience has shown that many arms ordered by top German military people are prone to breakdowns and require too much personnel and maintenance. Heading the FDP's list of deletions are the tactical combat plane 90 (OKF 90) and the new German-French tank; the liberals declared self-confidently that the trouble that will emerge with the alliance and the French must simply be accepted. Party boss Hans-Dietrich Genscher agreed.

The FDP military politicians are receiving support from the parliamentary leftists of the SPD faction. At their request SPD Bundestag member Karsten Voigt formulated a 3-page letter addressed to "Dear Comrade Schmidt": "Arms projects already decided on which are in a phase of preparatory planning should be examined critically with regard to financing and with regard to their effects on security policy."

Copies of the letter were passed to SPD chief Willy Brandt and SPD faction chairman Herbert Whener, but not to Hans Apel. The defense minister has caused irritation among the coalition deputies so often in past months with his sudden decisions on such issues as the combat tank and crosses of honor for soldiers that he confessed to his Hamburg friends in a contrite way: "I am becoming less and less popular in the party."

Horst Jungmann knows the reason. The North German SPD deputy says that Apel hardly ever appears at meetings of the defense committee and the working group. If he does appear, he is impatient and knows it all. Jungmann: "We are overruled too often." The FDP's Moellemann complained publicly prior to the elections that the defense minister only gives parliament "orientation data but no detailed information."

The parliamentarians have also noted that Apel does not lead the people on Hardthoehe [location of Ministry of Defense] as strictly as he pretends. Although the armed forces plan for the next 12 years should be presented in January, it is not even finished in outline. The army, navy and air force inspectors keep writing letters to each other, with each trying to achieve advantages for his branch.

Neither Inspector General Juergen Brandt (an FDP deputy said: "A bad disappointment"), nor Hans Apel have so far put their foot down. "Up here," says a Hardthoehe expert, "Everybody is fighting against everybody, and nobody knows what will come of it."

In view of these skirmishes, the Free and the Social Democrats do not want to have a dramatic debate behind closed doors, as Apel planned, but they want a frank and unconventional one. FDP military politicians decided with Genscher's agreement that "there must be no taboos."

COMMENTATOR CRITICIZES RESULTS OF OSTPOLITIK

DW271430 Bonn DIE WELT in German 27 Oct 80 p 1

[Peter Boenisch commentary: "The 11th Commandment"]

[Text] The situation Walesa and his comrades are in looks threatening, which saddens not merely Poland.

Our relations with the "GDR" are in poor shape again. Nobody can be happy about that.

The politicians are looking in and around Bonn for new ways out. The adversaries of Ostpolitik are not jubilant either, that is honorable. Everybody is trying to save what can be saved from the ruins of hope.

In this situation it is almost embarrassing how Klaus von Dohnanyi (SPD), state minister in the Foreign Ministry, leaned back casually like "a little Stresemann" (foreign minister in the twenties] from head to toe, stating to the television audience: "There is no alternative to detente."

Naturally--and regrettably--there is an alternative. The others show us how. They cause tension [spannung], and for us all that remains of detente [entspannung] is the ["ent"].

Naturally one should not do the Soviet communists the favor of responding to their delimitation policy with delimitation on our side. But one must not give the impression either that we are horrified, paralyzed and irresolute subjects with which one can do as one pleases. This is exactly the impression that is created by the continual repetition of the formula that no alternative exists to what one is doing (or not doing), regardless of how much of a beating one gets for it. Who could be surprised that one will get a beating again next time? The builders of the Wall are not philanthropists.

Genscher's careful statement that one must not conjure up a glacial period by talking too much about it is a good one. But one must also know that one cannot eliminate it through talking either. But does every worshipper of detente know that? Some of them pretend that detente is the 11th commandment.

Why is it so hard for these people to realize that they have made a mistake on a decisive point: Our Ostpolitik has not made the "GDR" freer by even an iota. The "change through rapprochement" has turned into "trade after rapprochement" which contributed to a situation where people over there have more automobiles than before and more datchas. They do not have more political leeway. On the contrary: Honecker has purchased his own road to socialism--meaning the relative prosperity of the "GDR"--from Moscow through unconditional obedience.

Viewed from the angle of a national communist, Honecker is a prosperity separatist. If Thaelmann were still alive he would expel Honecker from the KPD.

Honecker, by his treason against the entire idea and the uninhibited propagation of the new "socialist fatherland" that calls itself "GDR", has achieved a situation where his subjects are better off than all the others in the socialist camp. In so doing he has steered the opposite course of the Poles, so to speak. In Warsaw national identity came first. In East Berlin it is an international solidarity which begins at walls of the Kremlin and ends at the Berlin Wall. While the Poles stood by the Church, the "GDR" decided in favor of consumption. In this way they are living better than their Polish neighbors, yet with less freedom. Their room for maneuver is smaller. They are totally on the Soviet leash.

It is painful, albeit inevitable, to have to realize and admit that the "GDR"--far from being a sovereign partner--is the gundog of the Soviets in Europe. Even a Soviet Union that has become weaker internally is still so strong that the "GDR' has to obey any command from Moscow.

Anyone wishing to improve inter-German relations will not manage to do so with old incantations or by talking soothingly to the barking dog, but solely by means of a policy of power, understanding and alliance which will make an impression on the Soviets.

IMPLICATIONS OF EC STEEL AGREEMENT EXAMINED

DW271307 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 27 Oct 80 p 3

[Editorial by Brussels correspondent Erich Hauser "Compromises in Luxembourg"]

[Text] Peace has been reestablished between the nine European Community partners. With the agreement of the Federal Government, the Brussels Commission will receive the necessary crisis authority for managing the European Community's steel production as soon as the final details have been clarified. Last Wednesday's statements in Bonn by Federal Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald were probably more in the character of theatrical thundering. Had the Federal Government not been fully occupied in early October with the Bundestag election campaign, the compromise that has now been achieved in Luxembourg with the European Community Commission and the eight other partners could have been achieved without much ado.

The fact that no basic differences of opinion exist between the liberal federal minister of economics and the allegedly power-greedy Brussels European Commissioner Etienne Count Davignon was publicly noted by Otto Graf Lambsdorff in Luxembourg: There are no fundamental differences between the current "production quota cartel" of the European Community's steel industrialists and the planned temporary production dirigisme by the European Community--as Lambsdorff stressed explicitly. Neither have anything to do with free market economy.

Agreement exists with regard to the fact that the European Community's steel industrialists are unable to handle the present steel consumption crisis through voluntary cooperation. Therefore Bonn sees no other way to prevent a destructive price war by steel producers than to take dirigisme measures and set up controls by the European Community Commission. All the other European Community governments realized this prior to the 7 October session of the Council of Ministers, where Bonn--had it examined the problems in time--could have achieved what has now been achieved by Lambsdorff, namely, that certain West German steel interests will be taken into consideration under the new dirigisme measures.

The preservation of national interests within the framework of the European Community is and was involved: Fishery matters with regard to the British, agriculture with regard to the French and others, and steel particularly with regard to the Germans, a field where they are the "biggest." French Industry Minister Andre Giraud therefore stressed with great pleasure in Luxembourg that Bonn has now recognized the so-called "Luxembourg compromise," enforced by President Charles de Gaulle in 1966, which rules out majority decisions of the Council of Ministers when "vital national interests are involved," and that not by an actual veto, but through negotiations lasting until a compromise had been achieved that was acceptable to all partners.

Followers of the theory of "state monopoly capitalism" (Stamokap) would have been absolutely pleased by the latest EC Council of Ministers meeting. Rarely do the ministers of the nine countries fight so unequivocally for the interests of their big industry, only--and this contains plenty of learning material for many a theoretical socialist--some ministers must fight for nationalized combines, like the British Steel Corporation, which prove particularly incapable of adapting to world market developments--for instance, the industrialization of the developing countries.

In any event, thanks to the forthcoming power of dirigisme on the part of Brussels, the EC steel industry, and thus also ours, will weather the current period of weakness in worldwide steel demand with as little friction as possible. The alarming figures of imminent manpower dismissals fanned by industry and by Bonn will likewise turn out to be mere "theatrical thunder." The Metalworkers Union with its equal codetermination right in the steel companies has the option of protecting the jobs. The artificially created excitement was useful when it came to looking after our interests in the EC, even though the same result could have been obtained in a more diplomatic way.

The upshot is that we are definitely not better Europeans than the others, but the EC remains the organization in which our interests, too, are better protected than they would be through unilateral actions. All theoreticians in the Federal Republic must probably acknowledge at long last that for fundamental production branches such as agriculture, coal and steel the "free market economy" exists only on paper.

GISCARD STILL FAVORED IN 10 OCT LE MONDE OPINION POLL

[Unattributed report: "Some 71 Percent of Communist Voters Would Follow Instructions for Second Round"]

[Text] PARIS MATCH has published the 10th "Public S.A." opinion poll on the presidential election. The poll was carried out between 8 and 10 October and involved 1,000 people. According to the voting intentions recorded, Mr Giscard d'Estaing maintains the 36-percent share of the vote which he had in September while, if he stands, [PS First Secretary] Mitterrand would win only 20 percent (down 2 percent); the president of the republic would win only 31 percent (down 2 percent) if the PS candidate is [PS leadership member] Rocard, who would win 28 percent (up 2 percent).

In either case, [PCF Secretary General] Marchais would stay at 13 percent, [RPR Chairman] Chirac at 10 percent, and [RPR leadership member] Debre at 6 percent, and the hypothetical ecologist candidate varies from 10 to 8 percent.

If Mr Chirac were the RPR's only representative, he would win 13 percent, Mr Giscard d'Estaing 37 percent, Mr Mitterrand 21 percent and Mr Marchais 12 percent; if the RPR representative were Mr Debre, the outgoing president would win 39 percent.

In the second round Mr Giscard d'Estaing would win 60 percent (up 2 percent) against Mr Mitterrand, who would obtain 40 percent (down 2 percent), and 51 percent against Mr Rocard, who would obtain 49 percent (down 1 percent). The opinion poll shows that 71 percent of Mr Marchais' voters are determined to follow his instructions in the second round.

PREMIER BARRE RETURNS FROM STATE VISIT TO TUNISIA

LD261341 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] Premier Raymond Barre has arrived back in Paris after a 2-day state visit to Tunisia. Before leaving Tunis, he said that he has two main impressions of his trip: First, Tunisia is a strong country certain of its future; second, this country is notably capable of playing its own role in the Mediterranean to ensure peace in this region and the rest of the world.

LE FIGARO EXAMINES SIZE, DIRECTION OF 1981 DEFENSE BUDGET

LD271141 Paris LE FIGARO in French 23 Oct 80 p 5

[Text] Even though the budget which Mr Joel le Theule will submit to the National Assembly today has been prepared by Mr Bourges, it would be a mistake to look for a personal imprint on it. In fact, it represents quite closely a normal implementation of the programming law which was adopted in 1975, and trends similiar to those which could be observed in the past 3-4 years, even though more apparent, can be detected in it.

First, let us discuss its importance compared with public expenditure as a whole. As we know, this expenditure will increase 13 percent next year. However, the defense budget--104,443,000,000--will increase 17.88 percent. Its share of gross domestic product will increase in the same proportion--it will amount to 3.85 percent next year, compared with 3.75 percent in 1980 and 3.67 percent in 1979. This was to be expected. [paragraph continues]

However, in order to realize the extent of the effort made, you must remember that at the end of Mr Pompidou's presidency, the military budget hardly exceeded 3 percent of the gross domestic product.

But to what does this increased effort correspond? It will also be seen this year that the trends disclosed by the preceding budgets have been confirmed. Part III of the 1981 military budget, which represents operational expenditures--Fr54,758, 000,000--will be 16 percent larger than last year's, whereas, as we have seen, the entire budget is to increase 17.88 percent. This means that Part III now amounts to only 54.36 percent of the total and is, consequently, smaller compared with previous fiscal years. This undoubtedly represents a step toward a sounder military budget and is closer to the 1969 situation when Part III (operations) and Part V (equipment) were equal.

As far as this is concerned, the new budget improves at second sight. In fact, in equipment expenditure--Fr 47,685,000,000 this year--it is necessary to distinguish between program authorizations, which relate to arms construction both in the current year and in coming years, and payment credits, which concern only the current budget. The latter are to increase by as much as 19.68 percent, that is, considerably more than the military budget as a whole, whereas program authorizations, which concern the future, are to increase 22.64 percent. This imparts to the 1981 defense budget its real character.

But what programs are we considering? Obviously, they are consistent with the objectives of the programming law and you will merely note that provisions for army and navy equipment have been implemented regularly. It appears that the air force budget has come off best in relative terms, and this will probably compensate for the difficulties observed this year, especially as a result of the inadequacy of credits for fuel and training of crews. Among other things, it is planned to build 22 Mirage-2000 aircraft, whose construction, as will be seen, has fallen behind programming law provisions, and 20 Transall transport aircraft.

The Nuclear Share

Once again, however, one-third of the equipment funds are devoted to nuclear armaments, in other words around Fr16 billion. The programs planned will be financed, such as the mobile surface-to-surface missile whose construction was announced by the president of the republic at his last press conference. Similarly, the necessary funds are being allocated for the construction of the sixth nuclear submarine which should be completed in 1985 and for refitting the five submarines of the first generation. At the same time, however, new programs are being studied. The most important of these also relate to the submarines and concerns the design of new types of submarines, either big submarines carrying 40 missiles or smaller submarines which, like the existing models, would have 16 missiles. Provision is also made for financing research into the development of "MIRVed" warheads with which each missile is to be equipped, so that the number of warheads on each missile will be increased from 7--the number planned for the M-4 missiles with which the second generation of nuclear submarines will be equipped--to 20.

There will probably be no serious opposition to the efforts being made to modernize the deterrent forces and to equip the armed forces. However, it will also be noted at the same time that manpower levels will remain what they have been for several years: as if the development of French nuclear power would have no effect on the structure of its armed forces. Will this be an opportunity to revive debates on national service, its duration, its cost, its organization and its profitability? In any case, in keeping with the president's very definite views, the government has no doubts that the existing structure of the French forces is the best one.

L'HUMANITE CRITICIZES GROWING RALLY-SOCIALIST RAPPROCHEMENT

[Editorial by PCF Central Committee member Rene Andrieu: "Return to Cro-Magnon?"]

[Text] RPR Assistant Secretary General Meo stated yesterday, specifying that he was "weighing his words," that the present policy is leading France "to bankruptcy and revolution." Since the RPR regularly votes for government policy in the National Assembly, we must conclude that it wants to lead France to bankruptcy and revolution.

Indeed the RPR leader's remarks highlight the uncomfortable nature of their attitude: It is difficult to be both inside and outside and, for the sake of the voters, to dissociate yourself from government action which only exists thanks to you. That is called demagoguery.

This is particularly true since the RPR is not content with merely supporting the budget. It welcomes Giscardian diplomacy's increasingly marked swing toward Atlanticism and anti-Sovietism, merely wishing that this swing were even more rapid and brutal. In so doing, it is turning its back on the independent course which General de Gaulle wished to give our country's foreign policy.

It will be noted that, on this basis, there have been a growing number of indications recently of a rapprochement between the PS and the RPR. Furthermore, this rapprochement is not limited to [RPR President] Chirac's friends, but extends to all the other majority parties. Mr Lecanuet, Mr Blanc, Mr Pinton and Mr Fourcade never tire of praising the Socialists' evolution since the abandonment of the joint program and are calling on them to go a step further.

The idea of areas of agreement with the Socialists is gaining ground in the RPR, as LE MONDE recently reported, pointing to consultations "in Strasbourg, at some provincial rallies, in individual department councils, in the Paris City Hall or at the Correze fair." According to the same newspaper, RPR Senator Poncelet and PS Senator Debarge meet regularly to ensure the liaison between the two parties.

In addition, one of Mr Chirac's other assistants, Mr Dechartre, has just published an article by [PS leadership member] Michel Rocard in his magazine and has written that he hopes to see greater agreement between the Socialists and the RPR. Mr Chirac himself mentioned with satisfaction, when speaking to young employers a few days ago, the "positive evolution" in the PS, particularly in the foreign policy sphere.

It is easy to see that the days are over when we were alone in explaining the break in the leftwing union by the PS swing to the right. This change of course is recognized--and praised--today by all the majority parties. Do not try and tell us that that is an unhappy love affair, or a hopeless serenade. Although he takes some stylistic precautions for the benefit of leftwing supporters, F. Mitterrand takes care not to cut himself off. Quite the reverse; he is increasing his contacts.

In addition, there are the long love affairs of the past. For decades the PS sat alongside the right or enjoyed its support, because it followed rightwing policy.

A few days ago F. Mitterrand accused the Communists and the right of belonging to the Cro-Magnon era. His taste for invective sometimes leads him to be imprudent. However, since he has reduced the question to that level it is tempting to throw his remark back at him: Is the Cro-Magnon man (under the Fourth Republic) not rather the man who say alongside Queuille, Laniel, Pleven, Faure, Mollet and some other famous specimens from the age of compromise? History has already given its answer.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC CENTER PARTY RELEASES POLICY DOCUMENT

[Unattributed report: "CDS Wants To Broaden Its Base While Retaining Its Ideological Identity"]

[Text] "While committing itself" to the Democratic Alliance blueprint, "the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] is not ignoring the development of its own doctrinal identity and will continue to work actively toward broadening its social and cultural base." This is stated in the document entitled "The Christian Democrats' Policy Line" approved by the party's national council and released yesterday at a press conference by Freitas do Amaral. The topics analyzed in the document include the presidential elections, the next Democratic Alliance government and the revision of the constitution.

Freitas do Amaral stressed that this is the "first document since the foundation of the Democratic Alliance that underlines and assesses the CDS' specific characteristics." While expressing the personal opinion that the Democratic Alliance's member parties will still be allied in 1984, the CDS chairman confirmed that "the Democratic Alliance is not aiming at a merger of the parties in the medium or long term," and that this justifies the ideological and political elaboration of the CDS' own characteristics.

Analyzing "the Democratic Alliance's legislative mandate," the document released by the center party's national council states that "unity and cohesion have proved to be the key to securing a majority and to the Democratic Alliance's success and therefore to the country's stability and progress." Next it points to the objectives of consolidating this unity and cohesion by strengthning it in a "shared expression," while explaining that such an approach is "incompatible with any form of complicity, even by omission, with any kind of tendency toward persecution, radicalization or intolerance in Portuguese society, whether in political relations, labor relations or even cultural relations."

The document also announces that "the Christian Democrats will strengthen their commitment to a social and family policy and to creating the structural reforms which the Portuguese economy and society need." The document adds that the CDS will give priority to "the development of aspects of planning in the government's activity, especially in education, health, social security, family benefits, transport, housing, supplies and prices."

Freitas do Amaral explained that the indication of these areas of action does not signify "any intention, even implicit," to define stances with regard to the distribution of posts in the new executive. The CDS chairman also gave an assurance that "no negotiations are going on with regard to forming the second Democratic Alliance government" and that none will begin until after the presidential elections.

Still on the subject of the government, Freitas do Amaral described as "unfounded" the president of the republic's interpretation of the presentation of a new program and confirmed that a confidence motion will be introduced "so that the Assembly of the Republic can authorize the government to remain in office until January" with a view to a vote on the plan and on the overall state budget.

Priority to Presidential Elections

At present the CDS gives "political priority" to activity in connection with Soares Carneiro's candidacy, with regard to whose success Freitas do Amaral seemed optimistic.

General Soares Carneiro's candidacy satisfies six conditions which the center party regards as fundamental: to be "a president capable of ensuring the utmost cohesion and solidarity of the ruling bodies"; "committed to guaranteeing the institutions' stability and contributing to the supremacy of political over other forms of power, whether economic or military"; "who will adopt an unequivocal stance in favor of a modern, open and European society"; "who will wholeheartedly and unconditionally reject the Marxist leftwing model"; and "who will unambiguously reflect the country's real Euro-Atlantic nature."

One final characteristic concerns the revision of the constitution, with regard to which the CDS advocates that the candidate, "while very concerned with seeking adequate inter-party consensus, must recognize and treat the referendum as a suitable democratic instrument for surmounting any serious parliamentary deadlock that might occur."

With regard to Ramalho Eanes, Freitas do Amaral said that since the PCP granted him its support for the second or even first round of the elections, he had lost hundreds of thousands of votes. He added that "having politically betrayed his 1976 voters, General Ramalho Eanes has now betrayed a considerable proportion of the electorate which he wanted to secure in the 1980 elections even before the event."

"PCP's Evident Tactical Difficulties"

Asked about the withdrawal of Mario Soares' support for Eanes, the center leader refused to comment on the Socialist Party's crisis, but said he was not surprised by the "stances adopted by the PCP, whose tactical difficulties are evident."

Next he accused the president of the republic of being "Third World-oriented and Melo Antunes-ish" in foreign policy, of advocating the "reinstatement of Revolutionary Council members in a new state council-type body," of having a "socialist, and in some respects collectivist, plan incompatible with EEC membership" and of being "in favor of a form of presidentialism which in Portugal would imply personal authoritarianism."

NATO Bases in Portugal

The issue of the establishment of new NATO military bases in Portugal was also discussed at the press conference.

"The U.S. administration," Freitas do Amaral said, "has hitherto never asked to anchor an aircraft carrier in a Portuguese harbor on a permanent basis. What it has asked to do is to send a team of experts to Portugal to visit various ports" to lay the foundations for a possible future proposal in this regard. The experts were authorized to visit the country and have already completed their mission, though it is not yet known what decision the United States will take.

Portugal has also received a "request to reexamine the potential uses of existing bases." The request "is being examined "by the government."

The CDS holds a "basic position in favor of strengthening NATO's potential," the CDS chairman stressed. The press conference was also attended by Basilio Horta, Lucas Pires, Oliveira Dias, Rui de Oliveira and Robeiro e Castro.

CANDIDATE SOARES CARNEIRO ADDRESSES THE NATION

LD271619 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Unattributed report on Portuguese presidential candidate Gen Antonio Soares Carneiro's 22 October television address: "Planning Will Avoid Disappointment With EEC"]

[Excerpt] "Some enterprises already have a definitely European standard while others will be moving in this direction, as the government takes the necessary measures in this connection both in the domestic plane and in its negotiations with the EEC," Presidential candidate Soares Carneiro said yesterday during the spot allocated to the Social Democratic Party under the television law.

Soares Carneiro stressed "the need for adequate planning at the various levels of economic life to ensure that Europe is not an illusion, but a great hope for the future."

Asked about the significance of 25 April [1974 revolution], he said that the event "marked the end of an autocratic regime and was welcomed by the Portuguese people's growing hopes." "Later," he observed, "it became debased by the action of forces with totalitarian aims, which also destroyed themselves."

The presidential candidate emphasized that he did not allow his image to be used during the general election campaign, "unlike Ramalho Eanes, who contributed his figure to the campaign of a defeated force." He stressed that he now reflects "a position in harmony" with the parties which are putting forward his own blueprint for an institutionally organized society.

In this connection Soares Carneiro pointed out that "the duties of the Revolutionary Council must be distributed among other bodies and in this regard, bearing in mind the subordination of military to civilian power, we must be able to depend on the legislative capability of the Assembly of the Republic."

He also described as "irregular" the "simultaneous holding of the posts of president of the republic and armed forces chief of general staff."

Discussing the regional autonomy of the Azores and Madeira, describing the political and administrative statute already approved for the Azores as "a step in the right direction," he said that "autonomy is indispensable for national unity."

During a meeting with Social Democratic Center Party cadres, Soares Carneiro confirmed "the need to consolidate a real democratic state within which the people's will effectively prevails."

The Democratic Alliance candidate said in this connection that it is necessary "to defend and reassert our national identity," stressing that the plan "to stabilize Portuguese society" constitutes an "investment in the future."

MDP-CDE ISSUES STATEMENT ON PRESIDENTIAL RACE

LD272208 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] The Portuguese Democratic Movement [MDP-CDE] has sought an urgent meeting with the president of the republic and is due to see him tomorrow at 1230.

Yesterday in Lisbon the party, which was the Portuguese Communist Party's partner in the electoral coalition United People's Alliance [APU] held a national conference from which the following communique emerged on the subject of the presidential elections:

[Begin recording] [Unidentified spokesman] An MDP-CDE national conference yesterday, attended by over 200 district delegates from throughout the country including the Azores and Madeira unanimously approved the following decision:

This stand by the MDP-CDE should be taken as a stance of the party, independent of the APU, on the lineup of presidential candidates as known today, taking into account the current situation.

1. The MDP-CDE does not promote any candidate nor does it back any party candidate.

2. The MDP-CDE does not identify itself ideologically with any of the candidates put forward.

3. The MDP-CDE does not directly back any of the candidates.

4. The MDP-CDE holds the view that in the current situation the fundamental objective is to defend the democratic regime and to defeat General Soares Carneiro.

5. Whereas General Ramalho Eanes's candidacy is harmonious with the democratic order and is a nonpartisan candidacy, it best identifies with the essence of the presidency of the republic as an organ of power and is in the best position to fight the anti-democratic candidacy of General Soares Carneiro. The MDP-CDE recommends that the vote go to General Ramalho Eanes. [end recording]

NEPSZABADSAG INTERVIEWS PCP SECRETARY GENERAL CUNHAL

AU241431 Budapest NEPSZABADSAG in Hungarian 10 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Peter Sereny article: "We Are Continuing the Struggle; Alvaro Cunhal's Statement to a NEPSZABADSAG Reporter"]

[Text] What is happening in Portugal? How could the right wing win the elections? What prospects are there for a struggle that has made some revolutionary achievements in the dangerous new situation? These questions preoccupy many people in our country. On Thursday, PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal received our reporter Peter Sereny at the PCP's Lisbon headquarters and answered questions posed by NEPSZABADSAG.

[Question] How do you appraise the election results and the position of individual political forces?

[Answer] The main consequences of the elections is the strengthening of the majority of the reactionary parties forming the government in the Assembly. However, that majority does not really express the Portuguese people's political will. Since the extreme right-tinged government has been in power--which has conducted a campaign of intimidation and violence that went on for several months and used for its own election propaganda the television, radio and daily press just as much as the state apparatus and the material and other means of the state--the democratic character of the elections was not ensured. Immediately before the elections the government also implemented a whole array of measures and made certain promises. Although they were limited and short-term promises, they were addressed to genuine problems of the Portuguese people. All this contributed to the fact that hundreds of thousands of voters let themselves be intimidated, influenced or misled. Both during the campaign and the casting of votes, illegal acts and frauds and violent acts of an overtly fascist nature continued on the part of the government coalition parties.

The Socialist Party, which received 27 percent of the votes at the 1979 elections and retained it in the present elections, considered itself as the only alternative and announced that it would attain an absolute majority on its own. The Socialist Party also revealed that under no circumstances would it enter into an alliance with the PCP, although a democratic majority is impossible without it.

The leftist groups together received more than 200,000 votes, but they were regionally dispersed. They obtained only one deputy's seat, which means that 150,000 antifascist votes were completely wasted.

As compared with 1,121,374 votes (19 percent) in 1979, the PCP and the United People's Alliance received 1,000,967 votes (17 percent) in 1980 and the number of their deputies decreased from 47 to 41. However, it should be recalled that the PCP received 785,594 votes in 1976, which shows that it has retained almost two-thirds of the votes won between 1976 and 1979.

The relative number of votes cast for the government coalition parties is considerably greater than the actual social and political base of the reactionary forces. Backward and politically passive people account for a large portion of those who voted for them. In contrast, the camp of the United People's Alliance voters represents, for the most part, a very active force.

[Question] What is the Communists' position on the government that is to be formed following the elections?

[Answer] The fact that a government is formed by parties that possess a majority in the Assembly by no means authorizes the government to accept a program and conduct practical activity contrary to the constitution and democratic legality, the observance of which are mandatory not only for the citizens, but particularly for organs of state authority.

In our opinion, it was a mistake not to dismiss the present government--that, or resignation and recommissioning would have been a lawful solution--following its entering on the path of infringements of law and undermining acts. We feel that if the new government embarks on the same path it should be dismissed.

So much for the process of forming a government and the institution system, regarded from the aspect of constitutionalism. Looked at from a political viewpoint: Portugal needs a democratic government whose policy is based on consolidation and continuation of revolutionary achievements and the democratic system. However, forming such a government cannot be expected in the situation that has developed as a result of the elections.

[Question] What is the PCP's policy with regard to cooperation with other democratic forces, including the Socialist Party?

[Answer] The PCP has been consistently advocating understanding and joint acts with all democratic forces and between the PCP and the Socialist Party in particular. The PCP resolutely censures the Socialists leaders' policy and alliances with rightwing forces, while at the same time abiding by a policy of unity, because that is a fundamental necessity to attain a democratic majority and a democratic alternative.

The present elections serve as a clear lesson in this respect. All antifascist parties together obtained more votes than the government coalition parties, but the divided nature of the votes let the victory pass to reaction.

As for the Socialist Party's attitude: One must differentiate between the leadership and party members in general. The leadership, notably Secretary General Mario Soares, persisted in an anticommunist policy and rejected understanding and joint action with the PCP. However, a definite trend approving unity is developing among the Socialist Party's members and sympathizers. We noted many signs of that trend during the election campaign, and such signs are multiplying amid the new dangers threatening democracy following the elections.

[Question] Sa Carneiro's government conducted an offensive against he achievements of the April 1974 revolution, the constitution and the land reform in particular, What can one now expect, following the elections?

[Answer] One can expect the government to intensify its offensive against the achievements of the revolution and the constitution. Conditions will be more difficult, but the struggle against such an offensive will continue on the level of both the masses and the system of institutions. We will soon examine the specific forms of acts in the new situation that has arisen as a result of the election results. However, we will pursue the struggle within the framework of the constitution, democratic legality and the institutional system of the republic.

[Question] The Assembly now elected has the means for certain modifications of the fundamental law. What is the Communists' position on that issue?

[Answer] The new Assembly has the right to modify the constitution, but modification is only legal if it conforms to relevant stipulations of the constitution itself. There are formal restrictions to modification of the constitution, such as the requirement, for instance, that modification calls for a two-thirds majority of votes by the deputies. In addition, there are also objective restrictions, such as, for instance, the constitutional stipulations prohibiting restoration of large estates and monopolies, barring the abolishment of civil rights, making observation of the principle of apportionment at elections mandatory and so forth. We support modification of the constitution in accordance with legal stipulations, and we also have proposals to submit in this respect.

[Question] What impact will the results of the present elections have on the December presidential elections?

[Answer] The PCP will only determine its position on the presidential elections when it has analyzed the results of the Assembly elections, when the parties' stance following the elections will have become known and when issues related to the formation of the new government are clarified.

[Question] The new state organization that has come about following the Portuguese revolution has institutionalized the political role of the armed forces through the Revolutionary Council. Do you regard a continued institutionalized participation of the April captains in Portugal's state life as necessary?

[Answer] The armed forces' presence in Portuguese political life is a fact. Those who demand the subordination of the armed forces to civilian power are not at all against the armed forces' political conduct, but would like to see the Revolutionary Council disbanded, the April soldiers removed and a reactionary military hierarchy restored that would support by force the liquidation of the April achievements and the democratic system.

The PCP is in favor of the institutionalization of the armed forces' role in political life, which should under no conditions be delivered to the mercy of the alignment of forces, permitting thereby free rein to military revolts and coups against the state.

The democratic forces and the Protuguese people remain in need of the soldiers of April, and it is the legitimate right of these soldiers to play a role in the nation's political life, the organs of state power and functions affecting the armed forces. Of course, those who want to return to the fascist past and hate the 25 April 1974 revolution hate the soldiers of the armed forces' movement--because it was they who overthrew the fascist government--and would, indeed, like to punish them for their heroic act of liberation.

[Question] What are the PCP's expectations regarding the new government's international activity?

[Answer] The future government will have a foreign policy extremely similar to the present one, that is: Serving imperialism, lining up with the most aggressive U.S. circles intensifying Portugal's NATO participation, sacrificing Portuguese interests on the alter of the Common Market monopolies and a policy of African intervention and neocolonialist revenge, anti-Sovietism and a hostile attitude vis-a-vis the socialist countries.

However, because such a policy is profoundly harmful to our national interests and because its negative consequences in the eyes of broad strata of the population are obvious, certain "corrections" are expected to be made in the policy of anti-Soviet and anti-African provocations.

Portuguese interests require broadening of foreign relations and friendship and cooperation with all peoples of the world. Precisely such a policy was initiated by the April revolution at that time. This is the policy for which we take up the cudgels, one that will ultimately assert itself within a future democratic turnaround of Portuguese politics.

NORWEGIAN, SWEDISH PREMIERS DISCUSS ENERGY, INDUSTRIAL COOPERATION

LD271115 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 23 Oct 80 p 4

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA reports: "Talks on Industry Between Faelldin and Nordli"]

[Text] Stockholm, 22 October--Prime Minister Odvar Nordli traveled to Stockholm on Wednesday for a lightning visit and met his Swedish counterpart Thorbjoern Falldin at Harpsund [Swedish prime minister's country residence].

Falldin came straight from the Riksdag, where the representatives had just defeated a motion of no confidence proposed by Swedish Social Democratic opposition leader Olof Palme.

Under Secretary Per Vassbotn told NORSK TELEGRAM BYRAA that the two prime ministers had talks on how the negotiations on energy and industrial cooperation between the two countries are progressing.

No special projects were mentioned. The talks dealt more with the framework for Norwegian-Swedish cooperation in the oil and industrial sectors. The meeting took place after an invitation from Prime Minister Fälldin, but another meeting has not been arranged, Vassbotn said.

The Norwegian delegation consisted of the new oil and energy minister, Arvid Johannesen, and Industry Minister Lars Skytoen, as well as Prime Minister Nordli.

DENMARK

PRESS COMMENTS ON DEFENSE PLAN; MINISTER SOGAARD REPLIES

LD100949 [Editorial report] Copenhagen's BERLINGSKE TIDENDE of 2 October 1980 carries on page 1 a Christian Broendum report of the effect the new defense plan that has been put forward by Danish Defense Minister Poul Sogaard would have on the age of men liable to be recalled for refresher exercises. New legislation, if accepted by the other political parties which normally support defense legislation, would mean that men up to the age of 36 would be eligible for recall for up to 3 weeks per year as against the present annual recall of 1 week. This report was the last in a series of three on the consequences of the new defense plan.

On page 10 of the same edition of BERLINGSKE TIDENDE, an editorial comments on the defense minister's plan. The editorial is critical of the plan and sees its consequences as a considerable weakening of Danish defenses, and is not the "zero-growth solution" the government promised. "Instead of a zero-growth solution, the defense minister has put forward a minus-solution. The framework for the defense forces that has been proposed in the defense minister's note on defense structure up to 1985 will mean a steady deterioration in Danish defenses as a whole and marked weakening of the defense of Sjaelland and consequently Copenhagen." The editorial concludes with a reference to the Danish plan's significance in the NATO context. "Sogaard's sketch for a future defense plan is an indefensible foundation for interparty defense negotiations, and it must be unacceptable for the allied powers who would commit themselves to involving their forces in an attempt to come to Denmark's aid."

An editorial in Copenhagen's AKTUELT of 2 October also comments on the new defense proposals, and expresses understanding of the budgetary problems that now face the government. It considers the scaling down of the Danish defense forces to be reasonable.

"Denmark will not run away from its alliance commitments or abandon its defenses, but it is an illusion to believe that it is possible for us to keep up with the arms technology race in every field. We must have a credible defense, not an unrealistic one."

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE of 4 October carries a rejoinder article by Defense Minister Poul Sogaard in which he answers the criticisms leveled in the editorial on 2 October. He points out that the writer has distorted the facts, in that the plans that he put forward in fact contain nothing new, but built on ideas that have been current in Danish defense thinking for a considerable time. He concludes this article by stating: "Finally I would like to emphasize that in my plans for the defense forces' future development I have striven--on the basis of a given budget--to marry goals and resources and to achieve the greatest possible defense effectiveness."

The main editorial in the same issue of BERLINGSKE TIDENDE, entitled "Sogaard's Defense," dismisses the claim that BERLINGSKE TIDENDE has distorted facts in its criticism of the new defense plan. It claims that it was merely making an appraisal of the possible effects the defense minister's new plans would have for Danish defense, and did not make the claim that the government was proposing to make direct cuts in defense spending. The editorial remains critical of the idea of a zero-growthdefense budget.

"Poul Sogaard points to the regulation of prices and salaries according to the retail price index, and this is indeed an excellent system, as far as it goes. But since 60 percent of the Danish defense budget goes in salaries, it primarily ensures that we still have the best paid soldiers in the world, and this money does not give greater combat strength to Danish defense."

The editorial concludes: "No doubt the defense minister does--with the best of intentions--strive, as he writes, 'to achieve on the basis of a given budget the greatest possible defense effectiveness,' but the real problem is exactly this, that the greatest possible effectiveness that can be achieved with the budget, which he and the government consider to be given, is not large enough to prevent serious weakening and deterioration of the defense of Sjaelland and the capital."

More on Minister's Response

LD270841 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 21 Oct 80 p 5

[HR report: "Now the Politicians Must Have a Chance To Deal With Defense"]

[Excerpt] "Leading defense circles" are once again expressing dissatisfaction with the latest proposal for a defense plan--and in a statement to AKTUELT Defense Minister Poul Sogarrd replied with a sharp reaction: "Give the politicians a chance to deal with the matter in a proper way. We have a sketch that first and foremost points to the next 4 years, but also extends beyond that. I must say quite clearly that things do not look as bad as some people would have us believe. We are trying to give Danish defense a realistic content--in relation to the money it is possible to grant."

"Leading defense circles" are now expressing dissatisfaction and saying that the latest proposal for a defense plan does not meet the demands that must be made on a properly functioning defense force in the next decade.

None of the more senior officers in the defense high command wish to comment on the proposal, but defense high command chief Lt Gen G.K. Kristensen told RITZAUS BUREAU that "the defense organization we have today will hardly be able to be maintained in the latter half of the eighties if we neglect to strengthen Danish defenses in relation to what we have today and if the West German defense forces are not strengthened.

"It is true that we must strengthen Danish defenses," Defense Minister Poul Sogaard said. "We will strengthen them as well as we can on the basis of economic possibilities, and this is what we are trying to do.

"There are some circles which are trying to spread defeatism around Danish defenses, but I find it difficult to believe that this is the intention of the circles that are now expressing their views.

"We are trying to draw up a defense plan for 1981-1985. What happens in the latter half of the eighties will have to depend on later budgets, but it would be advantageous if the politicians were given a chance to reach agreement on the political framework, and we could also find a plan that would make for a realistic defense force within this framework," the defense minister said.

PAPER VIEWS U.S. CAMPAIGN DEBATE ON SALT, REARMAMENT

LD281631 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 23 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "A Question of War and Peace in the United States"]

[Text] It is a frightening sign of the times that the U.S. presidential election--like the West German Bundestag election at the beginning of this month--seems in the final phase of the campaign to be a question of who is for war and who is for peace. Thus far Reagan has not been branded a war risk as Strauss was in West Germany, but it is not that far away.

Just like Strauss, Reagan has mostly himself to blame. Reagan has said that if he becomes president he will set the unratified SALT II agreement aside and call for new negotiations with the Soviet Union. Second, he has given his support to the continued expansion of U.S. defense potential to create a "security margin" in relation to the Soviet Union. At first he spoke of "predominance", but now he is using the new concept of a "security margin." Judging by all appearances there is nothing to choose between the two ideas. At any rate he wants to make the voters believe that it will once again be possible for the United States to enter into a situation in which the country could talk to the other superpower from a position of strength.

It is not particularly clear how Reagan envisages this will happen. It seems mostly as if he wants to play some sort of "rearmament card." According to his own pronouncements, the Soviet Union in the last couple of decades has devoted itself to "the biggest arms buildup in human history." If the United States were now to make extra efforts to further increase its own rearmament, the Soviet Union would have difficulty in responding to this challenge to an arms race since the Soviet Union is already at full capacity, Reagan says. Carter, too, is accusing the Soviet Union of an unparalleled arms buildup. According to him, the Soviet Union has been increasing its arms spending by "at least 4 percent per year for the last 15 years." This leads Carter to propose 4 to 5 percent increases in U.S. defense spending over the next 5 years. Carter has rejected the idea of predominance. Nor does he speak of security margins like Reagan. The incumbent President merely says that the United States must see to it that the nation remains "unsurpassed" in defense matters.

With less than 2 weeks to go before election day, it is interesting to see that Reagan has to a certain extent been forced to trim his sails so as not to appear all too warlike. In a 30-minute television appearance on Sunday evening which cost him $150,000, Reagan assured his audience that his prime objective is to create lasting peace in the world. The fact is that Reagan, who would have preferred to concentrate on what he sees as weaknesses in Carter's deconomic policies, is now finding himself forced instead to deny that he has a warlike nature in every campaign appearance he makes.

In his television address on Sunday, Reagan broached the idea that the unratified SALT II agreement should be set aside and the Soviet Union should instead be invited to negotiate a new SALT III agreement.

To make doubly sure of this gambit, the Republicans drummed up some of their foreign policy giants on Monday: former Secretaries of State William Rogers and Henry Kissinger, former Defense Secretary Elliot Richardson and Senate Minority Leader Howard Baker. According to Baker, Carter ought also to be aware that the SALT II agreement in its present form "has no chance, either now or after the election, of getting through." This is why something new is needed.

Kissinger, who in his time was involved in the negotiations which produced SALT II, came out for Reagan by saying that things had changed since SALT II had come into existence. This is why he considers a new agreement to be in order. As far as the Soviet reaction to such a development is concerned, Kissinger expects that the Soviet leaders would "indignantly" reject "candidate Reagan's" proposal, but "President Reagan's" proposal would be accepted in Moscow.

What seems like playing with words in an election campaign is of course much more serious than that. The fact is that many measures and steps have been taken during President Carter's time to increase U.S. defense readiness. What is worrying is that his challenger Ronald Reagan has been able to build his campaign on calls for further defense efforts.

The picture of inferiority in the face of the Soviet Union's war machine is hitting home in both the Democratic and Republican camps. The final result, no matter what the circumstances, will not be disarmament, but a continuation of the arms race.

The question is whether it will be at Carter's or Reagan's speed. The only glimmer of light is that at the moment Reagan himself seems to be worried that he has perhaps gone too far in the eyes of certain groups of potential supporters.

LEADERS CONGRATULATE NEW SOVIET PREMIER TIKHONOV

LD271944 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1700 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] President Urho Kekkonen and Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto today sent congratulatory telegrams to the newly appointed Soviet premier, Nikolay Tihonov. President Kekkonen says in his telegram that the trustful and good neighborly realtions between Finland and the Soviet Union have a firm foundation in the 1948 treaty of friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance.

NORWAY

PAPER FORECASTS DIFFICULT FISHING TALKS WITH EEC

LD271047 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 23 Oct 80 p 32

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Fisheries Meeting With the EEC"]

[Text] Norway and the EEC open negotiations on 23 October to fix the total permitted catch of fish in the North Sea for 1981 and the allocation of the quota among individual countries.

According to information given to NORSK TELEGRAM BYRAA the negotiations in Oslo, which will continue later in Brussels, will be extremely complicated with a serious danger of a reduction in, or even a suspension of, Norwegian fishing in EEC member nations' fishing zones.

The fundamental reason for this development is the enormous overcapacity of Western European fishing fleets and fishing industries, which have led to drastically reduced fish stocks in both the North Sea and the Barents Sea, NORSK TELEGRAM BYRAA was told.

Norway is interested in preserving its traditional prawn fishing off Greenland, its mackerel fishing west of Ireland, and especially its fishing for cod cusk, ling and spiny dogfish in British waters.

But for Norwegian fishermen to have quotas in these waters, Norway must have something to offer the EEC countries in return, and it is here that the difficulties really make themselves felt. Norway now has even less than usual to offer the EEC countries in the Barents Sea because of the low cod stocks there.

The North Sea quota war is also due to the lack of a joint fisheries policy in the EEC. The fact that the EEC nations have not been able to reach agreement on effective regulations to protect fish stocks led this year to overfishing of mackerel.

PAKISTANI FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS TALKS WITH OFFICIALS

BK280313 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 0200 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] The foreign minister while on his way home had a meeting with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington in London yesterday. Shahi later told the ISLAMIC NEWS AGENCY that discussions covered mainly regional issues including Afghanistan and the Gulf war. He also held talks later with Blaker, the British minister of state at the Foreign Office in charge of Southwest Asia. Shahi is due in Paris today and is expected to hold talks with the French foreign minister.

PYM ORDERS INQUIRY INTO LEAK OF DEFENSE CUT PLANS

LD242200 London BBC Television Network in English 2000 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] The defense secretary, Francis Pym, has ordered an urgent inquiry inside his ministry to try to find out how documents--at least one marked Secret--got into the hands of the PRESS ASSOCIATION and through them on to television, radio and the newspapers. Apart from the breach of security, the documents are about proposals to cut defense spending. What's been revealed is politically embarrasing to the government, which committed itself to more spending on defense. The papers show that the Treasury has asked for cuts substantially higher than those proposed 3 months ago. One gives details of protests from the three service chiefs worred about the effect on new weapons spending. Here is our defense correspondent:

[Christopher Wain] Inevitably suspicion will fall on senior officers or civil servants, many of whom have privately been voicing concern about the effect of the present round of defense cuts. This isn't the first time there's been such a leak. In 1978, figures about the loss of servicemen resigning because of law pay were also revealed to the PRESS ASSOCIATION. At that time all three service chiefs took joint responsibility. The government could not face a mass resignation and so it all blew over. The same thing may be about to happen again because the internal memorandum quotes protests by all three chiefs of staff. Admiral Sir Henry Leach, the first sea lord, protests that the Trident missile program, which will cost 5 billion pounds, has been included in the basic navy budget rather than a special fund. General Sir Edwin Brammall, the chief of the General Staff, complains of inadequate funding for the army's new tank, the Challenger, and Air Chief Marshal Sir Michael Beetham, worried about replacing the RAF Jaguar strike planes, also complains of lack of money.

The contents of the documents have already provoked criticism from the Conservative right while the opposition defense spokesman, William Rodgers, has said the plain fact is that the Iron Lady's sword has gone limp in her hand.

Meanwhile, Mr Pym on his way back way from Brussels has told M15 to find the mole. It remains to be seen whether the chiefs of staff will once again take joint responsibility. The Treasury letter was clearly marked Secret, meaning that it's an offense for anyone to convey, receive or reveal its contents. The prime minister is very sensitive about security matters and she doesn't like departmental battles between the Treasury and the senior cabinet minister spreading into Fleet Street. When Mr Pym calls in at Number 10 he is likely to be told so in no uncertain terms. It's come at a particularly embarrassing time for the government. Not only are there British warships on station in the Gulf in case of a possible emergency and more British troops being sent out to Hong Kong, but today was the day when the foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, made a speech stressing the need for high defense spendings.

[Begin Carrington recording] And the sad fact is that the prospects for arms limitations are better if our willingness to maintain adequate defenses is apparent to all, and the point is particularly applicable to the U.S.-Soviet talks involving theater nuclear forces which are now beginning in Geneva. And I welcome this development; all of us must.

We, the British Government have supported U.S. efforts to open negotiations since our offer was first made last December, and I believe that we have brought the Soviet Union to the negotiating table just because the NATO allies have agreed on a program to modernize our own theater nuclear forces in parallel with the U.S. offer to negotiate, and this gives the Russians some incentive to reach agreement. [end recording]

[Announcer] Lord Carrington will next week visit Hungary for talks with the foreign minister and go on to Poland to meet the man recently appointed to their foreign affairs post.

POLLS SHOW LABOUR PARTY LEAD, FOOT GAINING ON HEALEY

LD231139 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 23 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] The battle for the Labour leadership develops against a background of a reduced Labour lead over the Conservatives.

Labour are still 3 per cent ahead, the same as earlier this month immediately after their conference, which compares with 9 1/2 per cent in mid-September, according to the latest Gallup Poll conducted exclusively for THE DAILY TELEGRAPH:

	Today	Early Oct	Sept	Aug
Con	40	40	35 1/2	38 1/2
Lab	43	43	45	44
Lib	14	13 1/2	16 1/2	14 1/2
Other	3	3 1/2	3	3

The bulk of the interviewing was completed over the weekend, before Mr Foot's announcement that he would be a candidate in the leadership election. At that time Mr Healey was by far the most favoured of the four current candidates.

Gallup asked about each of the candidates whether or not he would be a good leader of the Labour Party. Two in three (60 per cent) respondents thought Mr Healey would be a good successor to Mr Callaghan, 23 per cent had the same opinion of Mr Foot, 22 per cent of Mr Shore and 18 per cent of Mr Silkin. Mr Benn has not put himself forward as a candidate, but 15 per cent considered him a good potential leader.

Among Labour supporters a similar pattern was found: Mr Healey (68 per cent), Mr Foot (30 per cent), Mr Shore (24 per cent), Mr Benn (21 per cent), and Mr Silkin (19 per cent).

Despite being 3 per cent behind in party support the Conservatives lead by 3 percent on having the best policies and by 6 per cent on having the best leaders. It remains to be seen whether the new Labour leader can shift public opinion on these matters.

On the wider political scene, unemployment continues to dominate the public's mind. Now 68 per cent say it is the most urgent problem facing the country, compared with 64 per cent last month, and this was before the recent announcement of a further increase in the number of unemployed.

Despite this growing concern about unemployment, approval of the government's record as a whole shows a slight improvement over last month, though Mrs Thatcher's personal popularity remains fairly static.

The survey was based on a nationally representative quota sample of 1,028 electors in over 100 districts between Oct. 15 and 20. The "don't knows" excluded from the voting figures amounted to per cent, and the main findings in detail from other questions were:

Taking everything into account, which party has: (A) The best policies? (B) The best leaders?

Poll on Labor Leaders

LD271715 London THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 26 Oct 80 p 2

[David Lipsey report: "Foot Trims Back Healey's Lead"]

[Text] The barbs Denis Healey and Michael Foot will launch against the Tories in Wednesday's Commons debate on unemployment will be double-edged. Wednesday is also the day when nominations close in the Labour leadership battle--and the two men are locked together in what promises to be a close-run race.

Foot's decision last Monday to stand has transformed what had begun to look like a Healey benefit. As MPs prepared to return to Westminister, THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH tested the views of the 80 Labour members whom we had polled the week before, to gauge the strength of the Foot challenge.

The 80 are a carefully-balanced cross-section of the whole Parliamentary Labour Party. We spoke to all but six of them: The unavailable six, in our view, are unlikely to have changed their minds.

We find that Foot has at one bound overtaken the other challengers to Healey (See table: Twenty-eight per cent of our sample say they'll back Foot in round one. That is enough to give him more votes than Peter Shore (13 per cent) and John Silkin 13 per cent) put together.

The election uses the exhaustive ballot system, in which ballot follows ballot until one man has an overall majority. In this system the bottom candidate in each round is eliminated. But the second-to-bottom man can go out, too, if a switch of all the bottom man's votes to the man immediately above him would not be enough to carry him past another candidate. On present trends, that could easily happen to both Shore and Silkin. That would mean a straight Healey-Foot run-off in the second round.

Foot is doing so well mainly because he has pinched the leftwing vote from Shore and Silkin. Eighty per cent of leftwingers in our sample go for Foot. Many see him as a temporary leader who could be replaced when the party decides in January on a new method of electing a leader in which unions and local parties will have a say.

At first glance our results look like bad news for Healey. His promised vote is down--to 38 per cent from 46 per cent last week. It is widely assumed that Shore and Silkin voters will all go for Foot if their men are eliminated. But our results suggest that if Shore falls, Healey stands to pick up just as many of his votes as Foot--and he might even pick up a few votes from Silkin.

Most of Healey's losses since last week are MPs who are now wavering between Healey and Shore. If, as we expect, Shore drops out, they are likely to return to the Healey fold.

Healey still appears to have the edge, though he is more likely to win on a second or third ballot than in round one. A below-par performance next Wednesday, or a slip in Healey's tactics, and Labour could yet fight the next election under Michael Foot--who would be in his seventies by them.

The state of the race (last week's pools in brackets):

Denis Healey	38	(46)
Michael Foot	28	(non-run)
Peter Shore	13	(18)
John Silkin	13	(25)

(Figures are rounded to nearest percentage whole number)

EDEK PARTY TO SUPPORT HOUSE CENSURE OF MIKHAILIDHIS

NC250659 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 25 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The Socialist EDEK Party will support any motion of censure against House President Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis, the party leader Dr Vasos Lissaridhis said yesterday.

Mr Alekos Mikhailidhis, deputy leader of the Democratic Party, was elected by the House as its president as member of the then largest single party in the House. But with the seccession of Mr Mikhailidhis from the Democratic Party and the formation of a new party with only six seats, including himself, there has been talk about challenging his status as House president but no such question has arisen during the House sessions so far.

However, Dr Lissaridhis said yesterday that if a question of vote of censure was raised his party would support it because the EDEK had opposed the election of Mikhailidhis as president.

Dr Lissaridhis was speaking at a press conference during which he surveyed the general situation, political as well as economic, advocated total abolition of the British bases and said that the country needed a change which only the EDEK party could provide. The Socialist leader strongly attacked Greece's decision to rejoin the NATO alliance and said that the Greek and Cypriot people would strive to frustrate it.

He further said that he would continue to take part in the National Council meetings provided, as he said, that he had the right to inform the people about what was happening.

Dr Lissaridhis criticised the way the intercommunal talks are held away from the public limelight. "It is absurd for Turks and foreigners to know the Greek Cypriot proposals and yet the Cypriot people themselves should not know them", he said.

He did not expect general parliamentary elections could be held earlier than April or May.

Dr Lissaridhis said that he had not voted for the budgets last year and will not do so now because government philosophy about budgeting had not changed.

EDEK Internal Views Outlined

NC241544 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Speaking at a press conference today on the internal situation, EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis said that the inter-Cypriot talks were being held in the people's absence, that the National Council was informed about some of the proposals that were submitted a posteriori, and that it was not aware of the remaining ones. He also said that he did not consider himself bound to conceal proposals from the people that were already known to Turkey and its allies; that he did not accept behind-the-scenes discussions or solutions in the people's absence; and that only under these conditions would he participate in the National Council.

Lissaridhis said that he had already disagreed with the acceptance of bizonality, the way in which the dialogue was being conducted and with the proposals on the question of rapprochement. He also maintained that the Cypriot problem was being diverted because of the tendency to convert it from a question of invasion, occupation and violation of international principles and resolutions to an intercommunal dispute and an issue of minor arrangements and constitutional details.

Lissaridhis suggested, among other things, that there should be proper internationalization and defense shielding [thorakisi], mobilization of resources and people, and the creation of a sound militant spirit. He also advocated the creation of a broad popular front for national salvation that would be based on a joint minimum program.

Referring to the condition of the Cypriot economy, Lissaridhis said its collapse would have dramatic repercussions on the future of the nation. Lissaridhis called for a change through the nationalization of banks and monopolies, a change in the taxation system, redistribution of the national income, agricultural reform, a cleansing of the cooperative movement and parliamentary control over quasistate organizations.

Finally, the EDEK chairman reiterated his position that Greece's reintegration into NATO was a fatal blow for the cause of Cyprus.

O AGON: U.S., EEC SEEK CYPRUS PROBLEM SOLUTION

NC260735 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 26 Oct 80 PP 1, 12

[Text] The U.S. plan--particularly its provisions on Famagusta--will probably soon be in the limelight again. Yesterday, authoritative political observers expressed the view that, following Greece's reintegration into NATO and the improvement of relations with Turkey, one should expect some positive developments in the Cyprus problem.

The same circles added that these developments will be shaped by the United States and the EEC, which desire and seek a settlement of all pending issues and differences, including the Cyprus problem. This is so because they believe that it would be inconceivable to fully restore relations between Greece and Turkey while the Cyprus problem is in a dangerous state of suspense.

According to the same observers, strong covert moves and consultations are expected to take place shortly in order to open the road for peaceful and fair Cyprus solution.

These covert moves will take place in Nicosia and in various Western capitals, as well as at the UN headquarters. Un Secretary General Waldheim is expected to play an important role in all of this, as has been the case in the past when the U.S. plan on the Cyprus problem was submitted.

This plan which, as is well known, provided the framework for a Cyprus solution. This plan envisaged the return of displaced persons to Famagusta under the protection of the UN peace force, which was to be in control of the city until the final settlement of the Cyprus problem.

According to the plan, the Turkish troops were to withdraw from Famagusta and a "buffer zone" was to be established. The security of this zone was to be undertaken by the UN Force in Cyprus.

The same observers concluded: In any case, it is too early to make full and sound appraisals. This could be done when Western initiatives, which are now in the preliminary stage, take a definite shape.

NEWSPAPER DISCOUNTS REPORTS OF U.S. CYPRUS PLAN RESUBMISSION

NC270721 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 27 Oct 80 P 1

[Text] There have been no reports, nor does the government of the republic have any information, on the likely resubmission of the U.S. plan for the settlement of the Cyprus problem. This statement was made to our paper by very well-informed sources when they were asked about press reports connected with the decision of the Greek Government on Greece's reintegration into NATO.

The same sources described these reports as "subjective assessment" and stressed that the government of the republic has been closely watching every activity connected with the Cyprus problem. Moreover, the stand of the Cyprus Government toward the U.S. plan--as it had been submitted to it--is well known. These circles observed that the pertinent noise is due to various reports and to various activities and events--the Carter statement, Turkish press reports, Greece's decision on reintegration into NATO.

The same authoritative sources stressed that the Cyprus problem is not mentioned at all in the conditions regarding reintegration and that it must be considered certain that no political government in Greece will ever abandon Cyprus' rights. They also stressed that there are special reasons to believe that no political government in Greece will ever sell out Cyprus.

As for the noise that resulted from Cyprus' concern about Greece's reintegration, the same sources stated that the Cyprus Government's permanent policy is not to interfere in the internal affairs of Greece or of any other country. Cyprus has the right to show concern about happenings that affect it--particularly in connection with NATO which is considered to be equally responsible for the tragedy in Cyprus--but this cannot and must not be interpreted in any way as "interference" in Greece's internal affairs.

GOVERNMENT ON HOUSE DEBATE ON GREECE'S NATO REENTRY

NC241223 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] In a statement in connection with yesterday's House debate on the question of Greece's reintegration into the NATO military wing, the government spokesman reiterated the government's stand that the reintegration is an internal affair of the Greek Government, in which the Cyprus Government cannot have any interference. The spokesman added: as for Greece's interest about Cyprus, this has been repeatedly reaffirmed and the Cyprus Government knows that whatever Greece's position is in various international organizations, its interest about Cyprus is always unabated.

The spokesman concluded: The Cyprus Government believes that Greece's interest in Cyprus will not be affected at all by its reintegration into NATO and that Greece's support will be continued.

DENKTAS DISCUSSES TALKS WITH TURKISH OFFICIALS

TA251127 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that Turkey considers it its duty to meet the needs of the Turkish Cypriot community in any situation and that it has done whatever is necessary in this direction. Denktas said: We are convinced that it will do the same this time as well.

Denktas, who visited Turkey to hold talks with the new Turkish Government and exchange views on the Cyprus problem, returned to the island today. He was received with a military ceremony at Ercan State Airport. In a statement to journalists at the airport, Denktas said that the issues were discussed in agreement and joint conclusions were reached. Denktas noted that his visit was very positive. The president stated that one of the joint conclusions reached was the conviction that the Cyprus problem can be solved through intercommunal talks and the importance attached to the intercommunal talks. Denktas said: We hope that a bizonal federal system protecting the rights and laws of the two communities and respecting the separate status [as heard] will be realized as soon as possible and that the Cyprus conflict, which has been continuing since 1963, will be solved peacefully. Turkey has always encouraged and supported us on the subject of the intercommunal talks. The same encouragement and support continues.

Replying to the question if recent developments will quicken the process of the intercommunal talks, Denktas said: If the talks are to continue in a serious manner, it is not yet possible to speed them up.

In reply to the question if any work was done on economic issues during his contacts in Ankara, Denktas noted that he voiced the outlines of the economic requests of the federated state and that Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay will discuss these subjects in detail during his official visit to Turkey on 5 November.

The president was received at Ercan Airport by Legislative Assembly President Oguz Korhan, Turkish Cypriot Peace Forces Commander Lt Gen Dogan Kromors, Legislative Assembly Deputy President Semsi Kazim, Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay, Turkish Cypriot Security Forces Commander Brig Kemal Yavuz, ministers, deputies, Turkish Embassy officials and other officials. Turkish Ambassador to Lefkosa [Nicosia] Inal Batu and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Kenan Atakol returned to Cyprus together with Denktas.

DENKTAS DENOUNCES GREEK CYPRIOT PARTICIPATION IN MEETINGS

TA271256 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] President Rauf Denktas, replying to reporters' questions this morning, has said that UN Secretary General Waldheim's attention will be drawn to the fact that the Greek Cypriots have not ended their attacks against the Turkish Cypriots despite the resumption of the intercommunal talks. He stressed that a Greek Cypriot administration that lives off the British bases and receives money from the CIA cannot be considered impartial.

Replying to a question on the meeting to be held in Paris between 6 and 7 November--with the encouragement and participation of the Greek Cypriot administration and with the aim of securing the implementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus--Denktas said that this meeting was contrary to the agreement on the resumption and spirit of the talks. Expressing his regret over the issues, Denktas said: According to the summit agreement, the UN resolution to be implemented is the one accepted by both sides, the one thus rendered valid. UN resolutions adopted in our absence and in spite of us are not valid and, thus, they cannot be implemented. There is a valid resolution. This resolution is a general one and does not refer to the existence of a government in Cyprus. Noting that special intercommunal agreements were reached and implemented in connection with various aspects of this resolution, Denktas said: For example, the population exchange agreement reached during the third round of the Vienna talks and later implemented is one of them. The UN resolution was [word indistinct]. (?One should be) serious and realistic concerning the Cyprus problem.

Denktas said that half of the Turkish Cypriot community was tired of the 11-year Greek Cypriot atrocities and inhuman treatment and had crossed over to the free region to build new lives. Noting that most of these Turkish Cypriots have become refugees several times since 1958, Denktas said: These Turkish Cypriots cannot be displaced in accordance with the whims of the Greek Cypriots. The Greek Cypriot leadership cannot change these realities by deceiving the world through resolutions which have been and will be adopted. We are going to focus the attention of Mr Waldheim on the Greek Cypriot attacks which have been continuing despite the agreement reached on the resumption of the talks, Denktas added.

In response to a question on the recent statement made by Archbishop Khrisostomos, Denktas said: It is regretful that the church continues to interfere in Greek Cypriot politics. The church was the casue of all the trouble in Cyprus. As long as the church does not retire from politics, this institution, which has pledged to undermine every agreement reached, will continue to be a terrorist organization on the island. Looking down from peaceful and tranquil northern Cyprus, one can see that southern Cyprus has much to suffer in the hands of the church. The church's involvement in politics forces the Turkish Cypriot side to remain vigilant.

Upon being reminded that the Cyprus issue will be discussed at the nonaligned conference to be held in India in February, Denktas said: The presence of the Greek Cypriot side--which has knelt in front of U.S. presidents and begged them to solve the Cyprus problem on the behalf of NATO, which lives off British bases and allows U.S. aircraft to use these bases, which receives money from the CIA, which has kept silent during the invasion of Afghanistan and which is notorious for its inhuman acts in Cyprus--at such a conference as the representative of Cyprus is unacceptable to the truly nonaligned countries. I find it useful to note once again that the Greek Cypriots are representing themselves and not the whole of the island. It has officially been disclosed that Makarios had proposed to the United States the establishment of bases in Cyprus. I am amazed that despite all these facts the nonaligned group still considers this illegal administration to be the Cyprus Government.

Upon being reminded that a Commonwealth meeting will convene in Cyprus in November, Denktas said that a deceived and indifferent world tolerated the Cyprus realities for its own interests thus leading to these results. The Commonwealth's insistence on this wrong attitude, which adversely affects peace, should have created a legally and morally unacceptable situation from the viewpoint of Britain, the leader of the Commonwealth. To consider this administration, which has implemented Hitlerite methods against a quarter of the island's population for 11 years, as the representatives of the Turkish Cypriots--who, for 11 years did nothing other than try to secure their rights, status, lives and property guaranteed by Britain as well--does not become the British Government. This is a low attitude. We have repeatedly stated this and we will continue to do so.

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU ENDS VISIT TO INDIA, RETURNS 25 OCTOBER

CHAMBER CONTINUES DEBATE ON GOVERNMENT'S FOREIGN, NATO POLICY

AT241035 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2030 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Recorded "highlights" of the Chamber of Deputies continuing debate on the government's foreign and NATO policy. The highlights include statements by State Deputy Panayiotis Kanellopoulos; EDIK Chairman Zigdhis; Foreign Minister Mitsotakis; PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou; Prime Minister Rallis and EDA Chairman Iliou]

[Excerpts] [New Democracy state deputy and former Prime Minister Panayiotis Kanellopoulos] I will request my colleagues to allow me to remind them of certain remarks which I made from this same rostrum on 22 May 1980 when I spoke on the policy statement of the Rallis government.

At that time I said, and I am quoting from the Chamber's official minutes: "I only partly agree with the government on the question of Greece's return to NATO's military wing. Rather, in principle I do not agree but if the government believes, because it does have the majority, that it must proceed, then it should proceed also bearing in mind the reservations which I will present."

First of all, these sentences also include my own reply--it may be wrong--to the remark made by the leader of the majority opposition party that it is essential to present the agreement to the Chamber and even that in accordance with the Constitution it must receive 3/5 of the Chamber's votes for ratification.

This sentence also includes my reply. Perhaps it is wrong; this is not required for our return to NATO. You know as well as I do all the facts and documents, and I do not think it is essential to consider or that it is feasible and possible to consider this as a new agreement.

Proceeding, I explained the reasons why I did not consider return to NATO as essential and I primarily explained these reasons in the following remarks: "I do not wish to disappoint those who have great confidence in such institutions and such alliances. I assure you that I do not have any confidence in them and for the reasons explained by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou"--he had explained the reasons why he did not have confidence in the eventuality of a world war--"but also because of the fact that if, God forbid, there was a world war and if this world war is a nuclear one, then there is absolutely no importance in whether we are within NATO's military wing or not because there will only be one battle, the battle of absolute destruction. Even if we suppose that nuclear energy is not used during a third world war and if we suppose that both the great fronts control themselves by using only conventional weapons, then the speed of action as provided for, if it is provided under NATO's plans, cannot be of a nature that could cope with the danger."

I then concluded, "Do not believe that our return to the military wing will guarantee the future of Greece in the eventuality of a danger, no matter whether this is direct for our country or worldwide."

This is what I said at that time and this is what I repeat tonight. What I said at that time coincides with what opposition leader A. Papandreou stressed in reference to the possibility of a world war. It is a fact that in the eventuality of a world war there is absolutely no importance in whether we are within NATO or within any other alliance.

This, however, does not mean that I considered a possible return as dangerous or even harmful. I simply said, and at a moment when the government should have said it so that the foreigners could hear it, that we have no need of NATO. I said what all the governments should have said a long time ago so that the foreigners might hear it, that we have no need of it, so it is they who should come to us asking, offering exchanges for what we really do not need.

It is a fact that we do not need this in the eventuality of a world war. But we do need it in time of peace. We need it in periods of peaceful development. As to whether we needed it or not, this was also proved as early as 1976 when we demonstrated that it is we who wanted to return. Even as early as November 1976, actually in 1975, the government had already made its proposal on the special relation with NATO's military wing.

I must tell you, worthy friends, that I do not know what that proposal was. I do not know because I had never been briefed as I believe others had not been briefed on what had happened until only a short time ago. This is the first time that a briefing has been undertaken, a briefing of party leaders and certain others, among whom I also find myself, who on the basis of the regulations have rights equal to those of party leaders.

This took place for the first time Saturday, or rather on Sunday and Monday when a full briefing on all took place on all points and all documents. I regret that friend EDIK leader Zigdhis did not agree to have an indirect briefing, but a briefing through a responsible official, on issues related to the country's security and our fatherland's future. None of us is permitted to say, "I insist that the prime minister should communicate with me." At a time when there is a hostile climate can you say, "I am not interested in being informed on the facts unless the prime minister presents them to me personally?"

Thus everyone was briefed and we are now cognisant of the facts, for the first time, I repeat. Perhaps in the past Mavros, during a different period of the Chamber and perhaps Papandreou, during the past three years, were briefed by Prime Minister Karamanlis. I personally had never been briefed.

I was briefed, however, and I have reached certain conclusions. Before I state my conclusions, however, I must reiterate that these remarks which I made on 22 May 1980, are remarks on which I insist and which coincide with the remarks of A. Papandreou on the eventuality of a world war, but which are limited to the interpretation which I gave them; that in case of a world conflagration or a danger directed exclusively against Greece then NATO will, in the first instance, prove to be another Maginot Line, and in the second instance it will remain disinterested.

However, NATO also exists in times of peace. We never ceased to be members of the political wing of NATO. We did cease to have advantages which in 1974 we thought we could give up for certain reasons at that time--advantages which are related to our participation in NATO's main organizations.

My conclusion, the conclusion I've made from studying the facts and documents, is that our return to NATO's military wing is not dangerous for Greece and that, in principle, is not harmful. It would have been dangerous if NATO were in a position to drag us into war or even political adventures which would not be in harmony with our national interests. It is not able to do this. This is impossible. It cannot make a decision which is not based on unanimity. If it attempts to make a decision which affects Greek interests then we will raise our voices and use the veto. If the veto is not taken into consideration or if there is a clash, then we will withdraw. This would be the last resort in the case of a moral clash between one member and all the other members of the alliance. Therefore, this means that our return is not a dangerous thing.

Briefly, let us consider whether or not it is harmful. This is the point on which the honorable leader of the majority opposition party has concentrated his attention. He is fully aware of the very same facts and documents as I. I did not reach the same conclusion--that concessions were made, that compromises were reached. Naturally, on one critical matter we proceeded to a unilateral attestation; we stated our opinion or rather what our resolve is in reference to this critical matter. What is this critical matter? It is simply the critical matter of the FIR.

Naturally there was no withdrawal. The probable dangers which you underlined, honorable leader of the major opposition party, certainly do exist. You stated that since we have agreed to place this matter under discussion and since the starting point is the one upon which we do not consider our withdrawal as correct, then how can we agree to negotiate and how, indirectly, do we not abandon this starting point? This is truly correct. However, I believe that the government, which is comprised of patriots who are as equally ardent as you and all others in this hall, will never thus retreat from issues which are critical with respect to our sovereign rights; a retreat which could possibly harm national interests.

The future is not known in any agreement. The future depends upon skill and constant negotiations. A total of 5 years of negotiations resulted in the agreement concluded last Saturday between the government and General Rogers and, as of the other day, between the government and the NATO Defense Planning Council. Negotiations will continue and it is always possible that Greece will raise its voice in veto at any time our sovereign armed forces are "technically" assigned to NATO headquarters--provided this assignment is purely technical--and such an assignment prevents the Greek Government from exerting full control over its armed forces.

I cannot basically disagree with our return provided, on the basis of the facts upon which I was briefed, Greece makes no concessions or compromises harmful to national interests.

Therefore, since and despite the fact that NATO is not likely to serve in case of a world war--because in such an event nobody will serve--I believe that with proper skill by the Greek Governments, our participation in the political wing of the alliance will be useful. And because I also feel that we are living through a turn in our domestic political life which is somewhat critical and perhaps dangerous, I have resolved to give a vote of confidence to the Rallis government. [prolonged applause]

[Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis] Ladies and gentlemen, colleagues: The government has requested a vote of confidence, more generally of its foreign policy but specifically on the question of Greece's return to NATO's military wing. I will not refer to the history of the last few days which all of you and all of the Greek people know. I will limit myself to saying that although the texts are secret and this could not be otherwise--and I will explain to you why they are secret--the government, I believe, conducted the fullest and best possible briefing of the opposition than has ever been done in the past. We specifically provided such a full briefing to the leader of the major opposition party and we did the same with respect to all other opposition parties whether they are recognized by the Chamber's regulations as parties or not.

In general, we also attempted to do this through the press, to the degree that we were permitted, in order to honorably and correctly inform the Greek people on the facts. We regret that Zigdhis' case was a lamentable exception. He refused to be briefed, yet tonight we heard him severely criticize an agreement that he did not bother to be briefed on. This is his personal affair; I will not dwell on it.

The agreement accepted by NATO's Military Committee, the consequence of which was Greece's return to NATO's military wing, was the result of long efforts made by all sides. I do not wish to refer to the history of our withdrawal from NATO.

I do not want to discuss the significance of the Atlantic alliance, what NATO means and what it guarantees for us. More or less I believe that the Greek people have been briefed on this. I do not want to criticize our withdrawal. We withdrew under conditions which the prime minister and minister of national defense and others described. This was a correct reaction at the time it was undertaken. The problem arose in the aftermath.

It was soon determined, dear colleagues, that although certain reactions and results supporting our views were brought about--since it is well known that the embargo and other responses from international organizations followed--these reactions were not enough to cancel out what had taken place. It was soon determined that any further insistence by us along this line would not serve our national cause; it did not serve it and, as a result, it did not serve Cyprus.

Our request for return to the military wing of NATO under a special relationship was then submitted. The protracted course of this case, which has passed through many stages, started at that time and reached its final conclusion with the agreement on the basis of the Rogers proposals.

Everyone knows that, in the past, the agreement came up against reaction from Turkey. It is known that it confronted the so-called Turkish veto. It is also well known that the New Democracy government determinedly insisted that return be to the benefit of Greece with the prerequisite that this return take place under conditions which we requested and which responded to the just Greek cause and to Greek interests.

We recently reached a critical bend. This is when the policy of the Greek Government truly hardened, when we even spoke about time limits which were constrained as a result of developments. At this point, it is essential that I reiterate something I have often said: The Greek Government never set a time limit as an ultimatum. It simply expressed the viewpoint, which I will immediately explain to you, that time limits were constrained as a result of developments. At the same time, I reiterate that in the final stages the government linked the presence of U.S. bases in Greece to our return to NATO's military wing in an emphatic, absolute way.

A period of difficult efforts followed. The Greek position, the Greek policy was firm, unshakable and proud from the national viewpoint, without being provoking to anyone. We explained that in order to return to the military wing of the alliance--obviously a return in the interests of Greece, but a return which would also be a gesture serving the general interests of the alliance--we should have conditions acceptable to us. It was essential, if you want me to repeat a term I have often used, that we pay no price for this return.

I rejoice because at this moment I can state that our difficult efforts were supported by the entire political world of Greece. Now, speaking from this official rostrum, I must address just praise to all. At the same time, however, I must also offer an explanation. We who were asking for return under nationally acceptable conditions requested such a return because we believed that our return to NATO would benefit our just Greek cause. We never concealed the fact that we were striving to win the issue, that we were not going to lose it, or that we would fail to grasp the opportunity offered us provided the conditions, after these protracted and difficult negotiations, were ones which we wanted.

Perhaps the opposition had contrary views. This is the opposition's own affair. We respect its policy. Our policy, however, never wavered nor did we ever leave any doubt about the final goal we were striving for. Thus, when after protracted and difficult negotiations, which basically were conducted at the military level by the military experts under the initiative of General Rogers, we finally reached a text which was acceptable to the Greek side, we immediately accepted it and things moved very quickly.

It is unjustifiable to speak either of surprise or of a staged situation. This was a protracted effort, a struggle which led to results which we consciously strove for and which we believe serve our country's interests.

What does this agreement state? I regret, as I said earlier, that this agreement cannot be released publicly because never before have such NATO documents been released publicly. No country has done so at any time. However, I want to use this opportunity to absolutely and emphatically clear up certain issues which have been touched upon.

First, I must say that it is unthinkable to talk about national sovereignty. The NATO alliance has nothing to do with the national sovereignty of countries. NATO administration never refers to national territories of any NATO country. It never refers to territorial waters, land or airspace. We always speak of the international area. The question of national sovereignty was never raised nor is it being raised now. It never was the subject of any conversation. This statement is absolute, emphatic and is not subject to questioning from anyone. NATO is an alliance of free democratic countries, and you must understand that we are not alone. All countries which are members of the alliance would refuse to cede national sovereign rights over their own territory, their own national area.

The second [indistinct interruptions, bell ringing]. Dear colleagues, Cyprus was not a member of NATO. Why don't you be patient and you will hear? [confused interruptions] The second issue I wish to explain is that which refers to the airspace of 6 or 10 miles.

It is a fact that Greek airspace, in accordance with Greek laws, has been 10 miles since 1931. I emphatically state that this airspace is still 10 miles, that the legislation was not altered, and that this matter was not the subject of any discussion during General Rogers' deliberations. There was only a reference to the 6-mile limit mentioned in a certain NATO document dated 1960 and which was brought into force under the general agreement signed. This, however, was in force from 1960 to 1974 and it referred exclusively to NATO goals and functions. Greece, dear colleagues, never accepted any violations of the 10-mile airspace and, each time there has been violations in the past, Greece has reacted accordingly. Greece has maintained and continues to fully uphold its rights. [applause]

The agreement reached with General Rogers is generally satisfactory to the Greek side. This is because, as the prime minister has already stated, it deals with NATO regulations under which Greece had participated. The meaning of this is obvious. It also refers to the Greek replies to NATO and, specifically, to what we have fundamentally and conventionally referred to as the Haig-Davos agreement. We believe that this is a good foundation and a good starting point.

In 1974, there were certain unresolved pending issues. These issues remain unresolved today. There is also an additional issue which deals with airspace. This is an issue which must be settled. The PASOK chairman was sufficiently correct in his analysis yesterday of the airspace issue. He should permit me to utilize his own statement as a basis for explaining my views, hoping that in this way we will understand each other.

Papandreou said that when we speak of airspace we are addressing three separate issues. This is correct. The first is what is called the early warning area. In the case of Greece and up to 1974 when we were members of NATO, it ended east of the Athens FIR, according to Papandreou. The FIR has been discussed so many times that I believe it is not necessary for me to explain it. This is correct. What Papandreou did not add, however, and which I will add now, is that under the agreement we have reached, the FIR once again ends where it used to end. The early warning area once again ends where it ended in the past. I must add that the same applies to cross tell--described as exchange of information--in other words, on either side of the Athens FIR--not for 20 miles, Mr Papandreou, but 30 miles on either side--where the mutual exchange of information is obligatory.

In essence, the early warning area and the cross tell area have the same basic significance and I can assure the Chamber that with respect to these two issues things remain exactly where they were in 1974.

The second area of operation is airspace, rather, the second function is the area for tactical air operations. These are, in fact, aggressive operations. Until 1974, this area coincided with the limits of the FIR and it continues to remain within the limits of the FIR.

The third area which remains to be settled refers to the responsibility of command, I would say, command over air defense. This must truly be settled because establishment of the Turkish headquarters at Smyrna has generated the automatic requirement, which has been agreed upon as a result, of the establishment of a Greek headquarters at Larisa--not in Athens--for the delineation of limits between the two headquarters. These limits will in fact be delineated, as Papandreou told you, under the initiative of the U.S. commander and the concurrence of the two local commanders.

However, Papandreou said something yesterday which I must read to you. Papandreou states: The prime minister has correctly observed that from the moment of establishment of the Turkish headquarters at Smyrna its operational control was limited to within Turkish sea, land and airspace. This is true. It is true that when this headquarters was established the NATO supreme commander defined the operational control of this headquarters in exactly this way, in other words, within Turkish territorial waters. You understand that this was done in our absence and without consultations; it then becomes a strong argument for Greece in the final settlement which will follow.

I would like to make another reply to Mr Papandreou because he said that on this point there is no veto power. In fact, the specific consultations which will take place at a specific time have not been provided with a veto. There will only be a decision. Therefore, Papandreou well knows--and if he does not know, then I am telling him now--that there is always the possibility of recourse to the command and even to the NATO Ministerial Council over any such decision. Consequently, dear colleagues, the gap which indisputably does exist here will, we believe, be filled by negotiations which will certainly be protracted and difficult. We have no objections to this but, in the meantime, the temporary status which exists does satisfy us. And we believe that it will end in a settlement which will be satisfactory to the Greek side because serious military reasons support our views; basically, the international area of the Aegean is delineated in such a way by the many Greek islands within it that, because of today's high-speed supersonic aircraft, one can fly through international space in a fraction of a second and enter into the national Greek area. Thus the necessity and the logic of developments, we believe, will finally lead to a correct decision.

Consequently, with reference to airspace things are satisfactory to the Greek side. Things are also satisfactory with respect of seaspace. There is no doubt, and Papandreou has agreed on this as well, that the Greek naval commander will remain and maintain the limits of his operational command.

The task force concept--this is rather difficult to translate, but I would say a special aggressive operation--is under discussion at NATO; it is an unresolved issue which existed from 1964 to 1975, so it was under discussion for 10 years. It remains in the planning stage, an embryo, if you wish; it was never incubated. It continues to exist and meets with both acceptance and rejection among the other NATO partners. It is an issue which will most certainly be discussed but it is not an issue which will create problems for us. I repeat that basically, and apart from the fact that we will have our own views which I do not need to analyze at this moment, the Greek naval commander will remain and maintain the bounds of his operational responsibility.

As a result, dear colleagues, we have absolutely no reason not to be satisfied with the agreement we have reached. We do not believe that we have defeated anyone. Nor are we boasting at this moment. The views which were accepted were the correct views, the just views which Greece accepted because, as I said earlier, they basically serve its own interests. But they also serve the interests of the alliance at this difficult time through which the world is passing. I will return to this question later.

Consequently, I will summarize in order to be clear; Mr Papandreou, there is no question of sovereignty. Such an issue was never discussed; in principle, it does not exist for NATO. There is no question of 6 or 10 miles; this exists, as I said earlier, as a provision in a specific NATO document. The positions of Greece, with regard to the rest, remain firm. There is no problem over airspace or air command; there is no problem of naval command. This is an agreement which is correct and honest, which interferes with nobody, and which serves the interests of the alliance in general.

The second subject which we must explain is our manner of return. Did we or did we not return under a special relationship? It is essential to clearly explain this because doubt exists over this issue, both among you and among the Greek people.

We did return under a special relationship. The answer on this is also emphatic. What does special relationship mean in this specific instance? Special relationship refers to the volume [ongos] of forces which we have assigned to NATO in times of peace and which are considerably smaller than the forces we had assigned prior to 1974.

Secondly, it refers to the level of commitment [last three words in English]. Papandreou and, I believe, also Averof referred to this yesterday. The level of commitment of these forces varies in each instance. There are four degrees of commitment: from the one in which commitment is fuller and NATO jurisdiction is greater, to the one in which the liaison of the unit with NATO is much more free. I do not want to tire you, but I have here in front of me the full list of forces allocated and the level of their commitment.

Consequently, we are returning under this special relationship and it means what I have just explained: a smaller number of forces at a lower level of commitment to NATO.

Colleagues, I believe that these were the specific points of the criticism conducted on the agreement we have accepted. At the same time, however, there has been a more general criticism of NATO which refers to its usefulness and to the expediency or lack of expediency for Greece's return to its military wing; in other words, its return as a full member of NATO.

Dear colleagues, before discussing this point I would like to refer to the question of Cyprus. Greece withdrew because of the second invasion of Attila in Cyprus and as a sign of protest against NATO. As I said, it soon became clear that Greece' stay outside the military wing was not serving Greek interests. From the moment this did not serve Greek interests, it did not serve the interests of Cyprus either.

The fact is that with our return to the military wing, the position of Greece is strengthened internationally and its defense potential increases; its stronger defense and better international position also directly reflects upon Cyprus. Greece supports the efforts of Cyprus and this will be continued fully, unstintingly and unreservedly, thanks to the greater potential Greece has today--from the moment it was relieved of one of its own heavy burdens and strengthened its international position. [applause]

The intercommunal dialogue continues and is now passing through a critical phase. I do not want to make any forecasts. I only wish to say, Mr Chairman of PASOK, that Greece unreservedly supports this intercommunal dialogue.

You did not have the opportunity this time to expound your views on the Cyprus issue because the subject was not called for. I do not know whether you insist upon the views which you expressed on 22 May before this Chamber in answer to the policy statement in which for the first time you turned against the intercommunal dialogue, stating that this dialogue would lead unquestionably to great compromise and finally to the partition of Cyprus. How then is this the case? If you truly continue to believe that the inter-Cypriot dialogue is leading to where you said it would, then I must tell you that you are the only one in the world who supports this viewpoint.

I would also like to clear up another thing. Could our return to NATO in any way affect our relations--our good relations, as Papandreou stated--with the socialist countries, particularly with the Balkan countries, our Balkan neighbors? On this, dear colleagues, we must be absolutely clear. We established our relations with the socialist countries upon this foundation: that they belong to their alliance and we belong to our own alliance, the Atlantic alliance. We have never wavered, we have never concealed our basic position. On the contrary, wherever we talked and continue to talk, whether in neighborly and friendly Bulgaria, Romania, tomorrow in Yugoslavia or I do not know where else--with the Czechoslovak premier more recently--our position has been: Each belongs to his own coalition and each must be interested in world peace and detente while holding onto the political-social system of one's preference and within the opportunities offered to us.

Consequently, Greece is certain that nothing can interfere with and nothing can alter the policy it has followed.

Now I will come to the basic issue: Why does out return to NATO benefit the country?

There is no doubt, dear colleagues, that NATO is what we have often repeated: It is an alliance which truly does not act automatically. This fact makes it operate in a counterbalanced way; it is not only not against us but, in all probability, is in our favor. Consider, for example, an involvement in Murmansk and whether or not we should automatically become involved in a war with neighboring Bulgaria because there is an involvement in Murmansk. It is a fact, in any case, that NATO does not act mechanically.

I do not know what sort of aid NATO would offer us in the event of a world war. I greatly fear that Papandreou is right when he told us so emphatically that if there is a world war it would be immaterial for me or you to define which geographic area we find ourselves in because humanity simply would not survive. I believe, Mr Papandreou, that you are right on this. I will remind you of this when we talk about the bases issue, perhaps. But this is another matter.

What is certain and what is happening is that the first strategic goal of NATO is discouragement. NATO discourages and protects its members from local clauses and local wars. [indistinct interruptions, bell ringing] It is characteristic that in the restless postwar world, ever since the two alliances--NATO and the Warsaw Pact--were established, there has not been a single instance of attack against a country which belonged to an alliance. On the contrary, all countries which from time to time were drawn into such war adventures were all Third World countries. It is certain that an attack against a country which belongs to a great alliance would lead to a world war and this is the most discouraging factor.

Why should we forget? Let us refer to our own national tragedy--the tragedy of Cyprus. This was the invasion of a country which belonged to the Third World. It was a nonaligned country. It was a neutral country. We continue to believe that Greece must continue to progress along the Kemal Ataturk-Elevtherios Venizelos line in its pursuit of a friendly, just solution to our differences through negotiations.

The fact is that the atmosphere has improved; I do not believe that anyone of you will argue that the atmosphere of 1974 and the invasion of Cyprus or that of the periods of crisis during subsequent years still exists. Unfortunately, things have certainly not been settled yet. Consequently, the balance of power, particularly in the Aegean, is a basic goal and permanent concern of Greek foreign policy.

We are particularly sensitive on this issue. I wish to stress this emphatically. I also want to remind you that recently our reaction toward the friendly Federal Republic of Germany was very severe when it granted exclusive aid to Turkey without maintaining the balance it had kept to that date. The problem of Aegean balance, however, to which Papandreou and the other gentlemen of the opposition so correctly refer with such emphasis, describing it as a great problem, is related to our presence in the military wing of NATO.

We would be hypocrites and we would not be telling the Greek people the truth if we had not informed them that, in the event we finally withdrew from the Atlantic alliance, we would be turning the West toward Turkey with Western supplies of moral and material support and economic aid, and offers of armaments--American and European. I would like to know where we would find the means to meet our own needs if this aid we now get from the West would be stopped?

Naturally, there is no doubt that, when faced with absolute necessity, a country will do whatever it can to protect itself, to protect its integrity. It is another thing, however, to find oneself in such dire need, and it is another thing to--allow me to use the colloquialism--go begging, to ask to be deprived of the aid you already have.

Let us not forget that today's Iran, which once had the almighty arsenal of the shah, is in danger of losing the war because it does not have the spare parts for its U.S. war equipment. In the last analysis, this has nothing to do with new weapons, modern weapons, new arms systems, it concerns spare parts which are so essential for the use of these arms. Consequently, colleagues, our stay within NATO's military wing benefits Greece, if only from this viewpoint.

Let me now mention something which has already been stated--that had we finally withdrawn from NATO there is no doubt that, since alliances cannot tolerate gaps, the gap in command which we would have left behind would immediately be filled by someone else. As a result, our position from this viewpoint would have become even weaker.

Colleagues, the government has a clear-cut foreign policy. We wanted to lead Greece into a unified Europe and we achieved it. We will be members of the EC as of the first day of the new year. We wanted to become a full member and participate in the military structure of the Atlantic alliance. We are leading Greece with wisdom and determination and with a purity of line toward this goal which we believe is useful for the nation. However, I would like to ask: Where would you, dear colleagues of PASOK, lead Greece if authority fell into your hands under the democratic process?

I do not want to criticize at this moment. We will have many opportunities to restate and discuss our basic differences during the months that follow. I cannot help asking, however, I cannot avoid expressing this question: Papandreou said that if he wins the election--naturally with the slogan "Out of NATO"--then the government would not decide to abrogate the agreement but it would turn to the newly-formed Chamber and ask for its opinion. Given that in democracies the majority and government are the same, what else can such a resort to the Chamber mean? Or will it, Mr Andreas Papandreou, be an excuse for you to claim the necessity of 3/5 of the votes of the Chamber which will be the only power to decide on Greece's withdrawal from the alliance?

Colleagues, I am closing on what I have already had the opportunity of telling you. We are satisfied with the step we took. We feel that in the sector of foreign policy we took one more step forward. We believe that we are on a good course.

The government is happy about the way in which this dialogue is being conducted in the Chamber today. We do not even object to the demonstrations which, in a democratic manner and within the law, are taking place on the streets of Athens. It must be made clear, however, that it is the representatives of the nation and the legal government of the country which make the decisions and that we will firmly continue along the course which serves our national interests without being diverted and without taking into consideration these demonstrations. [prolonged applause]

[PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou] Allow me to start almost at the end in order to reply to the foreign minister. I refer to Cyprus, to the Cyprus issue. First I will refer to the position which I expressed here in May of this year. The gravest mistake in the handling of the Cyprus issue--and at this point I do not wish to refer to who has what responsibilities--the gravest mistake is that we, both the Cypriots and the Greeks of Greece, have allowed the creation of the impression that the Cyprus issue is a matter between two communities, the Greek and Turkish communities.[applause]

At a time when such strategic mistakes are being committed, then how can one find a correct course? When I said that I do not believe in the intercommunal talks, I meant exactly that. This is an international issue; it is an issue for the United Nations. Apart from the fact that it is an issue for the guarantor power, it is also an issue for Greece.

Turkey has utilized the Zurich agreement in order to occupy Cyprus. At a time when the foreign minister states that Cyprus was a nonaligned country, does he forget that there was a Greek obligation signed under the Zurich agreement? No matter how we may disagree over the Zurich agreement, at least this aspect of the agreement should have become an object for exploitation and use by the Greek state. [applause]

I am not optimistic with reference to the progress of the intercommunal talks. The greatest issue is the presence of Turkish troops and, if you wish, of British, Anglo-American, bases in Cyprus. The question of Cyprus concerns liberation from a yoke. It is not a discussion between two communities. We must stress that there were no serious problems between the two communities in the island's long history until Mr McMillan very cleverly brought Turkey to the negotiations table and the ERE, National Radical Union, government of that time accepted this. [applause]

It is difficult for me to understand how it is possible at this very moment that we should speak about improved and friendly relations with neighboring Turkey when the Turkish Army occupies 38 percent of the island. In other words, I ask myself: How far have we gone, if you like, from the viewpoint of a basic, I would say, national sensitivity, that we can--as I have said--march side by side and in uniform with those who today occupy Cyprus.

It is also worthy of wonder, in any case, that while the government knows about the role of the United States in the invasion of Cyprus, the role of Sisco [U.S. ambassador in Athens at that time]--and the leader of EDIK correctly referred to the issue; when we know the role played by Sisco and Kissinger and the United States in Cyprus, then how can we say we will rely upon this alliance?

This is an alliance which has swept aside our democratic political institutions, as well as our territorial integrity and our national entity, if you wish, with regard to the Cyprus issue.

At this moment I would like to make an announcement to the Chamber which the chairman ought to have made and I ask him to do so. We have just been authoritatively informed that the Cyprus House of Representatives has authorized its chairman to express to the Greek Chamber of Deputies its concern over the Rogers agreement. [applause]

[Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies G. Papaspirou] I call upon the prime minister of the government.

[Prime Minister Rallis] Deputies, speaking of the message he received from Cyprus, the foreign minister [as heard--apparently referring to Papandreou] said what he had to say. You will permit me to add: The Cypriots have a right to be concerned. They have a right to ask the chairman of the House to express their concern to the Greek Chamber. That is why yesterday I spoke so emphatically and perhaps, directly, in answer to the statement of PASOK on Cyprus. At a time when the major opposition party describes an agreement under which Greece is returning its forces to an alliance from which it never withdrew, to an alliance in which it has remained for 28 years, as is known, an alliance from which Makarios begged us not to withdraw, at a time when the major opposition party takes this opportunity to state that Greece is setting its signature on the partition of Cyprus, then why should the Cypriots not feel concern? [prolonged applause]

I have wondered, dear colleagues, why such concern had not been expressed as early as Sunday at which time the PASOK statement was made known. I did wonder. The only thing I can do to put things right, to heal the damage caused in Cyprus--damage, I hope, only to the morale of the Cypriots--is to state that the Greek Government will continue to support the Cypriots with the same warmth, the warmth with which all Greek Governments have supported them during the past 30 years. And it hopes that its participation in NATO's military wing will further facilitate this support, that the Greek Government will be in a position to furnish even greater support in the future in comparison with the support it has furnished in the past. [prolonged applause]

MITSOTAKIS DENIES U.S.-NATO PLAN FOR CYPRUS PROBLEM

AT272006 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] As soon as he returned this evening from Luxembourg, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis categorically denied all reports concerning the existence of a NATO or U.S. plan for the solution of the Cyprus issue. Mitsotakis added that the channeling of such inaccurate reports obviously damages Cyprus' case.

SECURITY COUNCIL APPROVES LAW ON CONSTITUTIONAL ORDER

TA271519 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1507 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 27 Oct (AA)--The National Security Council adopted the "Law on the Constitutional Order," which provides for most of the 1961 Constitution to remain in force until a new constitution is adopted, with certain exceptions. The exceptions are the following:

The new law "temporarily" transfers to the National Security Council the functions and powers of the Parliament, while it transfers to the chairman of the Council the prerogatives of the president.

It bars any appeals of unconstitutionality against communiques, decrees and laws promulgated by the National Security Council.

It bars any appeals for repeal or suspension of Cabinet decrees, ministerial decisions issued since 19 September or for any decision or action affecting civil servants.

The Council may amend the 1961 Constitution by laws which will go into effect on the date of publication or on the designated date.

The law on the constitutional order will be in effect as of 12 September 1980.

Text of Law

TA271812 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Oct 80

["Text" of law on constitutional order approved by the Turkish National Security Council on 27 October]

[Text] The reasons that necessitated the seizure of the administration by the armed forces--who acted with a feeling of historic responsibility on behalf of the great Turkish nation, realizing the 12 September 1980 operation within the chain of command and completely seizing the administration--the aims of the operation and the composition of the National Security Council have been publicized through the communiques issued by the National Security Council and the Council president's speech broadcast over radio and television.

Article 1. The Constitution of the Turkish Republic dated 9 July 1961 and numbered 334 and its amendments remain in force until a new constitution is approved and goes into effect, excluding the exceptions cited in the following articles.

Article 2. The duties and authority attributed by the Constitution to the Turkish Grand National Assembly, the National Assembly and the Senate are temporarily fulfilled and exercised by the National Security Council; and the duties and authority attributed to the president are temporarily fulfilled and exercised by the National Security Council president and head of state as of 12 September 1980.

Article 3. The communiques and decisions approved and issued by the National Security Council and the laws that have been published and that will be published in the future cannot be claimed to be unconstitutional.

Article 4. The provisions cited or that will be cited in the communiques and decisions of the National Security Council, the Council of Minister decrees that were issued and that will be issued as of 12 September 1980 and trilateral decrees [bearing the signatures of the president of Turkey, the prime minister and the ministers concerned] cannot be repealed or suspended.

Article 5. The procedures and decisions pertaining to civil servants, implemented or made as of 12 September 1980 by the ministers or by officials authorized by the ministers, as well as those that will be implemented or made in the future, cannot be repealed.

Article 6. The provisions that are cited and that will be cited in the communiques and decisions of the National Security Council and the laws that are approved and published and that will be published in the future by the Council, which are not in accordance with the Constitution of 9 July 1961 and numbered 334, take effect as amendments to the law on the date they are published as shown in their text.

Article 7. This law takes effect when it is published in the Official Gazette, retroactive to 12 September 1980.

EDICT BANS SUSPENDED ORGANIZATIONS FROM CEREMONIAL ACTIVITIES

TA271825 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] The General Staff Martial Law Services and Coordination Directorate has announced that organizations whose activities have been suspended will not be able to participate in ceremonies during national days. The announcement said: The political parties, labor unions, organizations and similar establishments will not participate in ceremonies during national days and will not lay wreaths on their names on monuments.

SECURITY COUNCIL APPROVES AGREEMENTS ON TERRORISTS, NARCOTICS

TA271751 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The National Security Council ratified two laws that approve international agreements aimed at the prevention of terrorism and narcotics smuggling. The European agreement on the prevention of terrorism stipulates that persons participating in terrorist activities are not considered political criminals and are to be extradited. The 1971 [words indistinct] agreement, also signed by Turkey, concerns the struggle against the trade and smuggling of natural and synthetic narcotics.

NEW REGULATIONS LIMIT NUMBER OF PERMITS TO CARRY ARMS

TA261521 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] An amendment to a regulation limiting the number of permits for carrying or possessing arms was published in the Official Gazette today. According to the new regulation, persons who have previously obtained permits from governors in accordance with earlier regulations are not permitted to carry or transport the arms cited in their permits in inhabited areas. These people will be able to transport their arms in inhabited areas only when the arms are unloaded and placed in a bag or box or in the glove compartment of the vehicles.

Only persons with diplomatic immunity and foreign embassy and consulate employees, as authorized by the Interior Ministry, will be allowed to carry arms. Retired officers, noncommissioned officers, specialist sergeants; retired governors, district officials and subdistrict officials; retired judges and prosecutors and those who have retired from the security services will be permitted to carry arms.

Bodyguards, watchmen, cashiers, tax collectors, personnel in charge of public funds and certain personnel employed in private or state banks or in factories who need to be armed will be able to carry arms registered with their place of employment during their hours of duty. According to the new regulation, governors will be able to grant new permits for possession of arms to persons whose old permits were canceled.

FORMER RPP DEPUTY ARRESTED FOR RACIAL PROPAGANDA

TA242052 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Former RPP Mardin Deputy Serafettin Elci has been arrested by the Ankara Martial Law Command Third Military Court. According to information obtained by a Turkish Radio and Television [TRT] correspondent, the Ankara Martial Law Command Public Prosecutor's Office has filed a suit against Elci for making propaganda aimed at trying to partially or fully eliminate civil rights stipulated in the Constitution based on racial considerations or for trying to weaken or destroy national sentiments. Elci, who has been interrogated at the Martial Law Public Prosecutor's Office, was arrested by the Third Military Court to which he was referred. He was sent to the Mamak military prison.

NSP MEMBERS SURRENDER TO MARTIAL LAW COMMAND

TA242046 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Nine National Salvation Party members, for whom arrest warrants had been issued in absentia, have surrendered to the Ankara Martial Law Command. Abdurrahim Bezci, Mazhar Sayatli, Ahmet Oguz, Mustafa Guner Yazgan, Mehmet Okur, Ali Oguz, Abdullah [name indist[illegible]], Ali Riza Ozturk and Yasin Hatipoglu were sent to prison.

Meanwhile, there were objections to the arrest of Nationalist Action Party leader Alpaslan Turkes and the other administrators of the party. Their files were sent to another court affiliated with the Ankara Martial Law Command following these objections.

FORMER NSP MINISTER SURRENDERS; NAP MEMBERS IN COURT

TA271533 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1410 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 27 Oct (AA)--Ex-minister and NSP member Fe[illegible]m Adak, for whom a warrant of arrest had been issued, today gave himself up to the military prosecutor attached to the Ankara martial law commander.

Another NSP officer, Korkut Ozal, for whom there is a warrant of arrest, is currently under treatment at the emergency traffic hospital in Ankara following injuries he received in a traffic accident, sources said. He will be transferred to a military hospital Tuesday.

Twenty-eight NAP members taken under custody in Kirikkale and 15 right-wing militants apprehended in Kayas, both towns of Ankara Province, are appearing before a military court Monday with the prosecution demanding their arrest. The objection of the lawyers against the arrest of NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes and other NAP officers is being examined by another military court in Ankara, martial law authorities said. In Midyat, in the southeastern province of Mardin, 133 persons for whom warrants of arrest had been issued have surrendered to the public prosecutor. They were wanted on charges including murder and robbery.

REGIONAL MARTIAL LAW COMMAND RELEASES ARREST FIGURES

TA271830 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Statement issued by the Press and Public Relations Office of the Navy and Bilecik, Bolu, Bursa, Kocaeli, Sakarya and Zonguldak Martial Law Command--date not given]

[Text] From 26 September to 24 October, 1980, 420 violations of martial law occurred in the region under the responsibility of the navy and the Martial Law Command. Three persons were killed and six were wounded in these incidents.

A total of 802 persons were captured during the incidents and in separate operations. Of these, 236 were subsequently released. The Martial Law Military Court ordered the arrest of 91, and the Martial Law Command Judicial Court ordered the arrest of 24 persons. Twenty-eight of the incidents, 7 percent, were perpetrated by militant rightists; and 138, 33 percent, were perpetrated by militant leftists. The reasons for 25 incidents have not yet been determined. The remaining 229 incidents involved other martial law crimes.

During searches, the Martial Law Security Forces found 26 rifles, 106 pistols, 2,317 rounds of ammunition, 20 pistol cartridges, 2 pistol silencers, 1 timebomb, 3 dynamite bombs, dynamite sticks, 11 dynamite fuses, 88 blasting caps, [words indistinct], banned pamphlets, placards and documents.

DELEGATION MEETS WITH USSR ON BORDER DELINEATION

TA241543 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1520 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 24 Oct (AA)--The Turkish-Soviet joint committee on redrawing of the border line along the Arpacay dam reservoir met for its 5th session in Ankara Friday.

Turkish diplomat Asaf Inhan headed the Turkish delegation, while Soviet Ambassador S. Kuznetsov led the Soviet delegation, that will review various questions that crop up during redrawing of the border line along the reservoir and dam under joint construction by the two countries.

A statement from the Foreign Ministry said the joint committee would meet through 25 November, working on draft protocols containing definitions and maintenance rules which had been agreed upon at the April 1980 session of the committee held in Moscow.

AGREEMENT WITH U.S. RESCHEDULES $350 MILLION DEBT

TA241536 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1505 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 24 Oct (AA)--Turkey and the United States signed an agreement today rescheduling repayment on $350 million of Turkey's debts to the U.S. Government or which carry U.S. Government guarantee. Signing the agreement in Ankara were U.S. Ambassador James W. Spain and Secretary General of the Treasury Nazif Kocayusue-Pasaoglu of Turkey. Repayment of the loans totaling $350 million has been postponed for 10 years, including a 5-year period of grace.

Ambassador Spain noted while signing the agreement the rescheduling was being made within the framework of OECD. The way was now opened for the release of $200 million of the $295 million financial aid promised by the United States at the April meeting in Paris. He believed Turkish authorities would succeed in solving current economic difficulties.

The secretary general of the treasury noted the success of Turkey's stability program launched in January depended in large part on external financial aid, including both direct aid and debt rescheduling.

LIRA DEVALUED AGAINST FOREIGN CURRENCIES

TA252037 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The value of the Turkish lira has been readjusted against the U.S. dollar and other foreign currencies following recent developments in the international monetary market. The new exchange rates will be effective as of tomorrow. According to an announcement by the Turkish Central bank, the Turkish lira has been devalued by 2.53 percent against the U.S. dollar and by 4.1 percent against the British pound. The Turkish lira was revalued by .98 percent against the FRG mark and by .45 percent against the French franc.

According to the new readjustments, the exchange rate of a U.S. dollar has been raised from 82.70 to 84.80 liras and of a British pound from 198.36 to 206.5 liras. The exchange rate of an FRG mark has dropped from 45.85 to 45.40 liras and of a French franc from 19.76 to 19.67 liras.

IRAQI INDUSTRY, MINERALS MINISTER PAYS VISIT TO PROMOTE RELATIONS

Arrival at Airport

TA251807 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Text] Iraqi Minister of Industry and Minerals Tahir at-Tawfiq arrived in Ankara aboard a special plane at 1945. At Esenboga Airport he was received by Minister of Energy and Natural Resources Serbulent Bingol. In a statement at the airport, At-Tawfiq said that he arrived in Turkey to extend President Saddam Husayn's best wishes to Head of State Gen Kenan Evren, to brief on the continuing Iran-Iraq war and to exchange views. Bingol said that both countries wished to develop relations between Turkey and Iraq.

Contacts, Press Conference, Departure

TA261703 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] Iraqi Minister of Industry and Minerals Tahir at-Tawfiq concluded his official contacts in Ankara and returned to Iraq today. At 0915 he met Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and conferred with him. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu received At-Tawfiq at 1000. The Iraqi minister was also received by Head of State Gen Kenan Evren at the Cankaya Mansion at 1100.

A statement issued by the Press and Public Relations Department of the Head of State's Office noted that At-Tawfiq extended to Evren a verbal message from Iraqi President Saddam Husayn on developments in the region and on the relations between the two countries and expressing the latter's good wishes.

Turkmen also attended At-Tawfiq's meetings with Ulusu and Evren. After concluding his contacts, At-Tawfiq held a news conference at the Iraqi Embassy at 1600.

Pointing out that he extended a message to Evren from Saddam Husayn, the visiting minister announced that he is also taking a message to Husayn from Evren. Noting that during his contacts he discussed the development of relations between the two countries, At-Tawfiq said that he also supervised Iraqi delegations currently conducting talks in Turkey preliminary to signing agreements on various subjects.

The Iraqi minister also noted that, in his contacts, he briefed Turkish officials on the Iraq-Iran war situation. Stating that the war between Iraq and Iran will not stop the oil flow to Turkey, At-Tawfiq said that his government will not spare anything in order to meet Turkey's oil and other needs. He also noted that the economic and commercial relations between Turkey and Iraq will continue in mutual understanding.

At-Tawfiq said his government appreciates Turkey's attitude toward the war between his country and Iran.

The minister then replied to journalists' questions. At-Tawfiq said he did not bring to Turkey a proposal to mediate between Iran and Iraq and that his government does not want any government to interfere in this issue. The Iraqi minister said Iraq wants to have good relations with all its neighbors. However, Iran shelled Iraq 15 times between 4 and 22 September and despite the notes presented by Iraq, continued its aggressive attitude and thus forced Iraq to engage in war. Also noting that Iraq attained its goal during the first 2 weeks of the war, the Iraqi minister declared that unless Iran agrees to solve the problem through negotiations, Iraq will continue with the war.

Referring to the release of U.S. hostages in Iran, At-Tawfiq said that this is a problem concerning those two countries. However, Iraq hopes that the release of the hostages will not lead the United States to lose its impartiality regarding the war between Iran and Iraq.

At-Tawfiq flew back to Iraq at 1800 today.

GENERAL EVREN LAUDS UN EFFORTS IN ANNIVERSARY MESSAGE

TA241226 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The 35th anniversary of the UN Organization is being celebrated worldwide today as UN Day. In a message issued on this occasion, Head of State Gen Kenan Evren said that Turkey was determined to continue its effective contribution to the organization's activities, aware of all the responsibilities entrusted on member countries within the framework of its charter.

Recalling that the United Nations Organization was founded in 1945 by the participation of 51 countries which included Turkey, General Evren said that the organization played an effective role in the preservation of global peace since then and has made intensive efforts for the reduction of armed conflicts and tensions and for their peaceful solution.

In his message General Evren said the UN efforts to ensure the independence of colonies were praiseworthy. Recalling that in recent years the United Nations was engaged in intensive work for the establishment of a new economic order in a bid to reduce imbalances in wealth among nations, General Evren said that he hoped that work within this framework would result in concrete solutions.

In the last part of his message, General Evren said: Turkey which has based its foreign policy upon the motto, peace at home, peace in the world, by Ataturk, its great leader, is firmly determined to contribute effectively to all the UN activities. Turkey is aware of the responsibilities entrusted to it within the framework of the UN Charter for the solution of problems which threaten world peace; for mankind to live in a more just order, in peace and harmony and for the establishment of a happy world community.

EEC OFFICIALS DOUBT UK WITHDRAWAL FROM COMMON MARKET

LD281403 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 28 Oct 80 p 6

[Alan Osborn dispatch: "Labour 'Quit EEC' Call Fails to Stir Envoys"]

[Text] Luxembourg--The recent Labour conference vote calling for Britain's withdrawal from the Common Market and the possibility that the party may soon have a leader committed to withdrawal have caused surprisingly little anxiety among EEC diplomats and officials. This seems partly due to a growing feeling that for many reasons British public opinion may be ready to swing back in favour of membership.

"Of course one cannot expect any sudden change but it is my belief that the low point in disapproval of the Community in Britain has now been reached," says a Belgian diplomat. "More important, I believe the left in Britain will retreat significantly from its pledge for withdrawal when all the repercussions are considered."

Indeed, there is almost open disbelief in Brussels and other EEC capitals that the Labour Party will ever carry out the process of withdrawal.

"I think life here would be far more difficult for us if Mr Shore were to become prime minister but I do not regard my job as at risk," says a British secretary at the Commission.

There has been no consideration in Luxembourg of the legal or political problems that would arise if Britain did decide to leave but it is noticeable that the tempo of favourable pronouncements and news about Britain's membership is being stepped up.

However, the main reason why many are sanguine about the future is that the march of world economic and political events coupled with fundamental reforms in the EEC institutions will come to make the idea of withdrawal seem increasingly misguided. A striking example of this is occurring in the steel industry where Britain's has been the strongest voice in calling for a Community policy to enforce production cutbacks. The belief is that in empowering the Commission to set compulsory quotas, Britain may be spared further damage from cheap exports from Germany and other countries.

In textiles the Community has negotiated limits on sales by the major suppliers to the EEC. Such moves, with their definite protectionist flavour, seem likely to spread, with even cars a possibility before long.

While it is true that outside the Community Britain could put up the shutters just as easily, the huge strength of the Nine in world trade makes it possible for Brussels to strike a much harder bargain and resist retaliation.

Equally important in the opinion of some observers is the process of political cooperation, or the forging of common positions on foreign policy issues. This has now reached the stage when even a non-member country like Norway is seeking ways of being associated with it.

Through the political cooperation processes Britain has been able to have a far stronger say on such matters, at detente and East-West relations, the Middle East, sanctions against Iran, GATT trade negotiations and Third World aid than she could expect to alone.

On trade itself, put forward in the early seventies as one of the main reasons for entry, there is now evidence that membership has not been the disappointment widely reported until now.

Even excluding North Sea oil, British exports to the rest of the Nine rose by 22 percent last year compared to a 5.5 percent rise in sales to the rest of the world.

In the first six months of 1980, 43 percent of Britain's visible exports went to the Community and 41 percent of its imports came from other EEC countries compared to 30 and 34 percent respectively in 1972. Germany has now replaced the United States as our largest single export market.

Though anti-marketeers claim that Britain could leave the Community but retain a free trade agreement with it, officials say this is not the major point. It would be the absence of a British voice when vital industrial issues are determined that would be the most damaging. Moreover, it is inevitable that the flow of investment from the United States, Japan and other outside countries would be increasingly diverted from Britain to the continent. If anti-marketeers have a credible alternative economic option to EEC membership then nothing has been heard of it in Luxembourg.

Some time over the next year the entire financial structure of the EEC will have to be drastically overhauled, for the simple reason that the existing sources of finance will no longer be enough to cope. It is obvious to many in Brussels that the CAP is, in fact, doomed in its present form and its demise can only help Britain.

LE MONDE CITES EEC DELIBERATIONS ON MIDEAST, MADRID PARLEY

LD281523 Paris LE MONDE in French 28 Oct 80 p 6

[Unattributed report: "The Nine Seek To Make Their Venice Middle East Statement More Specific"]

[Text] The Nine EC foreign ministers, who were joined for the first time by their Greek colleague, Mitsotakis, held one of their "informal" meetings to discuss international problems at Echternach near Luxembourg Saturday 25 October.

According to a French source, one of the main subjects of discussion was the drafting of a document which will be submitted to the heads of state and government at their meeting on the Israeli-Arab conflict in Luxembourg 1-2 December. After the mission which [Luxembourg Foreign Minister] Thorn made during the summer to various Middle East countries, they are aiming to implement the principles laid down in the Venice declaration in which the Nine revealed their viewpoint on an overall settlement last June. Several contributions were submitted by various member states on the four main sections of this settlement (Israel's security, withdrawal from the occupied territories, Palestinian self-determination and Jerusalem's status), which should make it possible to draw up a more specific document than the Venice statement. At present there is no question of contemplating other initiatives such as an appeal to the United Nations.

The ministers also discussed the Euro-Arab dialogue which is to be resumed after a long interruption caused by the divisions sparked within the Arab camp by the Camp David agreements. An initial meeting is planned for mid-November among secretaries of state, with a ministerial session scheduled for Mid-1981.

As for the Iraqi-Iranian conflict, it was discussed in the light of the letter which Baghdad sent to the European Commission chairman 18 October in which Iraq said it was prepared to accept a cease-fire. The Nine are not envisaging an initiative at present. Mr Thorn, Luxembourg minister and current Community chairman, also recalled that the Community will lift all sanctions on Iran if the U.S. hostages are released.

Finally, with regard to the Madrid conference, the ministers notably backed the French proposals on the organization and the aims of a conference on disarmament in Europe, including the proposal on extending the arms-limitation zone to the Urals. They reaffirmed their desire for detente and are approaching the Madrid conference, Mr Thorn said, "in the positive spirit of Helsinki. If Madrid is jeopardized it will not be our fault."

DPA: KREISKY FORESEES INCREASE IN FREEDOM IN POLAND

LD281948 Hamburg DPA in German 1736 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] Hamburg 28 Oct (DPA)--Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky thinks that a "new variant of the communist dictatorship" with a little more freedom on the Hungarian model may emerge in Poland. In an interview for the Hamburg weekly DEUTSCHES ALLGEMEINES SONNTAGSBLATT he said that tanks will go into action if liberalization is turned into democratization. In the event of armed force being used in Poland, detente would be dead "for a very long time." He added, however, that there were many reasons for proceeding "cautiously" in Poland.

KREISKY PAYS TRIBUTE TO ALEKSEY KOSYGIN

AU271440 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 25 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] Chancellor Kreisky has made the following statement on the occasion of the resignation of Aleksey N. Kosygin, USSR Council of Ministers chairman:

Premier Kosygin's leaving the government does not come as a surprise. Kosygin had been ill for a long time. He then returned to his office and contrary to his doctors' advice did not take it easy. It seems, however, that because of his condition he was not able to achieve what he had intended. A new serious illness has now induced him finally to resign. Despite all differences in our political convictions, I feel obligated to say that Kosygin made a very great--I am tempted to say inestimable--contribution to the improvement of relations between Austria and the Soviet Union before and after the conclusion of the State Treaty. Thus, for example, the negotiations on the reduction of our payment commitments in connection with the transfer of the Austrian oil fields were held on orders of Khrushchev and Kosygin, and on this occasion these payments were reduced from $10 million to $6 million.

Later on, it was also Kosygin whose sympathy for Austria again and again led to concrete and positive results in economic issues. He was exceedingly well versed in political questions, and he was "nobody's fool." He had very profound knowledge in many fields, primarily being familiar with the latest development of many technologies. He watched Austria's economic development with great interest and repeatedly made positive contributions to it. He is a man free of ideological spitefulness. He was very self-possessed in his argumentation and--despite his sometimes gloomy look--he had a good sense of humor. If the history of the period after the State Treaty is written--especially the chapter dealing with the relations between Austria and the Soviet Union--Kosygin will occupy a special place in it.

Kosygin has contributed much to the normalization of relations between the Soviet Union and Austria, which was not an easy task especially after a 10-year period of occupation. Only a few months ago he announced a visit to Austria which regrettably will not materialize. However, even after his resignation from the post of premier he will be a welcome guest in Austria.

CONFERENCE ON PALESTINIAN ISSUE TO BE HELD IN VIENNA

[Unattributed report: "Conference on Palestinian Issue in Vienna"]

[Text] The International Progress Organization (IPO), an international, nonstate organization with consultative status at the United Nations and UNESCO, will hold an international scientific conference in Vienna from 5 to 7 November on the legal aspects of the Palestinian issue with special consideration given to the Jerusalem problem. The conference will be attended by over 100 international law and human rights experts as well as politicians from the United States, Europe, Africa, the Middle East and Asia. It will be the task of the conference to contribute through scientific legal analysis to an objective and balanced assessment of the problem, and to work out proposals for its solution.

ECONOMIC INSTITUTES FORECAST ZERO GROWTH IN 1981

LD271130 Hamburg DPA in German 0957 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Summary] Bonn, 27 Oct (DPA)--The five leading eoconomic research institutes in the Federal Republic assess the country's economic development in 1981 even more unfavorably than the Federal Government. In their autumn report on the state of the world economy and the economy of the Federal Republic published today, the working group of German economic research institutes concludes that in 1981 there will probably be zero growth and that the number of unemployed will rise from under 900,000 this year to an annual average of somewhat over 1,100,000.

In its prognosis for 1981 published a few days ago the Federal Finance Ministry forecast economic growth of between zero and 1 percent and between 1 million and 1.1 million unemployed. Like the ministry, the economic institutes expect a drop in inflation from almost 5.5 percent this year to below 4 percent in the coming year. Wages are expected to rise by 5 percent as against a probable 6.7 percent for this year. The institutes also expect the German balance of payments deficit on current account of DM25 billion to DM30 billion this year to fall to about DM20 billion next year.

Comparison With Economics Ministry

DW281253 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 28 Oct 80 p 17

[Article signed Bar.: "Economists Optimistic Despite Zero Growth," presenting a comparison of the economic forecasts made by the five leading economic research institutes--referred to as "Inst." in the statistics table--and the Federal Economics Ministry--"FEM"--for the Federal Republic next year]

[Text] Bonn--The divergent data on economic growth given in the autumn analysis of research institutes and in the forecast of the Economics Ministry fails to reflect the nearly identical assessment of economic developments. The difference between the so-called zero growth rate of the five institutes and the real growth of 0.5 percent in the government prognosis arises from putting the turning point expected for 1981 at slightly different times. Besides, both forecasts do not reflect pessimism, they reflect optimism.

The conformity of the two forecasts is not just limited to the average basic figures of economic development expected for the year. The analysis of the course of events, too, arrives at rather identical findings. Both forecasts predict that the negative rates of change in the gross national product will continue at first. Later in 1981 positive growth rates are expected. Owing to the "negative excess," these rates will have to be remarkably high in the course of the year if, calculated for the year on average, the outcome is to be a change rate of plus or minus zero or even a slight real growth rate. The difference between the two growth figures lies in the timing of the turning point in economic development: In the government prognosis this turning point appears a bit earlier than it does in the joint forecast.

The nearly identical findings with regard to the figures are seen again in the high degree of conformity concerning the economic policy concepts of the institutes and of the Federal Economics Ministry, but this did not need to be so. It is attributable to their largely identical philosophies on economic policy.

1. In wage policy the institutes are more outspoken than the Economics Ministry. They recommend contracts with lower wage increases in 1981 than in 1980 and openly speak of a correction in distribution to the advantage of enterprise profits. Expressed in figures, the concepts are bound to be close together. In any event, the table indicates this.

2. In financial policy the Economics Ministry endorses the suggestion the institutes gave concerning a consistent consolidation of public budgets, but certain differences become plain here: The institutes advise accepting a greater deficit depending on economic developments, the Economics Ministry does not include this passage in its statement. This is due less to differences of opinion between the institutes and the experts of the Economics Ministry over the expediency of a financial policy with a corrective effect than it is due to the expectation of the federal economics minister that while the advocates of consolidation always need support, an expansionist financial policy will indeed find enough advocates.

3. The Federal Economics Ministry does not define its stance on the remarks by the institutes concerning monetary and currency policy. Possibly this is attributable to the massive criticism of the monetary policy actions of the Federal Bank in the recent past rather than to the recommendations for 1981. The institutes recommend that the Federal Bank expand the central bank money supply by 6 percent on the average in 1981. This recommendation is based on the assumption there will be an increase in production potential of between 2.5 and 3 percent and that there will be an inevitable increase in prices of 3.5 percent. In the opinion of the institutes these are the determining reasons for a stable monetary policy. They accuse the Federal Bank of having oriented its monetary policy too much toward defending the exchange rate of the German mark and thus having burdened domestic economic developments with unnecessarily great risks.

Economic Development in 1981 (Data in Percentages)

	1. Inst.	2. FEM
Real growth	0.0	0.5
Inflation rate (private-consumption)	4.0	3.75

Distribution of gross national product:
Gross income from private enterprise and private assets	4.0	4.0
Gross income from wages	4.5	4.0
Gross wage total per employee	5.0	4.5

Press Reactions

DW281054 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Press review on the economic forecast for 1981 by the five economic research institutes in the Federal Republic]

[Text] FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE writes: The shadows over the German economic situation constantly grow longer. After Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff had gently prepared the people for bad times last week, the echo from the economic research institutes has come promptly and unequivocally: They predict for next year a stagnation of the whole economy, with rapidly increasing unemployment figures as early as the coming winter. Surely it would be a mistake to cling to the slightly more optimistic prognosis of the Federal Economic Ministry, because there is practically no difference between an economic growth of 0.5 percent, which Lambsdorff considers attainable in 1981 on average, and a growth rate dropping down to zero.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG notes: The institutes hit the bull's eye with their clear warning to the SPD and FDP coalition parties not to impair the growth forces that exist in the economy in 1981 unnecessarily severely through a political deceleration to a standstill. After all, the danger is quite obvious that the Bonn austerity coalition will have to apply the red pencil not only to consumption expenditures such as subsidies and transfer payments, but also to investments by the state in order to manage its budget consolidation better. More than any predictable factors concerning foreign trade and the domestic economy, this tightrope walk in budget and finance policy will probably decide whether even a speck of growth may be expected by the end of 1981.

Essen's NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG also discusses the autumn analysis by the five leading economic institutes. It writes: Surely the recommended ceiling of 5 percent for the increase in 1981 incomes has been adapted to necessities, because nothing can be distributed that has not been accumulated beforehand. Coming to an understanding on a lesser increase in incomes will be facilitated by the decreasing inflation rate which will probably even show the figure 3 before the percentage point. Another factor is the tax alleviations promised for next year which so far Bonn has not dared touch. Besides, hopes are quite justified that the economy will overcome its low relatively quickly. Thus the men on the economic front assess the development more favorably than do the scientists and politicians. Granted, they too anticipate a restrained course of economic development, yet they do not expect a profound crisis.

The daily DIE WELT writes: The research experts are right in demanding that nothing be taboo, including social services. The policy should be aimed at combing through all state budgets and curtailing consumption rigorously so that there will be more leeway for investment expenditures. Since this state has gone to the limits of indebtedness, it has no medicine left for stimulating weak growth. In other words, too strong an austerity would be as wrong as halfhearted measures. The research experts compare this with a marathon runner. He needs endurance and he should not strain his muscles in sprints which use up a lot of energy. The state and various groups must do everything to make investments and services pay off and show the workers that a low wage increase with lower inflation rates can safeguard their real income a great deal.

WESTFALENBLATT of Bielefeld is of the following opinion: As regards next year's wage agreements, the state could set a good example through its public services wage policy. The fact that the current wage formula cannot be applied in view of these prospects will soon be noticed by the trade union, even if the DGB does not adhere to the wage policy recommendations in its comment on this autumn's economic analysis. The trade unions will demand an economic development program instead. But that would amount to treating symptoms and not eliminating the causes, because in connection with employment policy the solution of structural problems is more involved than a short-term stimulation of the labor market.

RHEINISCHE POST of Duesseldorf states: The reasons for the pause in growth have been recognizable for a long time, but they were disregarded or even ignored by large segments of the public, the parties to the wage negotiations and by many politicians. These were: First, the weakness of the world economy; second, considerable intensification of international competition; third, the Germans' lagging behind in this competition because of very high wage and energy costs, particularly vis-a-vis Japan; fourth, curtailment of businessmen's income through wage costs with an ensuing decrease in investments; and fifth, the shaken confidence of the businessmen with regard to finance policy developments. Compared with the weight carried by these negative influences, the expectations of the Federal Ministry of Economics and of the institutes seem rather optimistic. It remains to by seen whether a decisive prerequisite of the prognosis--a wage increase below 5 percent--will be fulfilled.

ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz stresses: The autumn analysis appeared at just the right time. With regard to the high aim of consolidating state finances, the scientists warn expressly against measures that would be too rough. Radical cures would inevitably bring us a deep recession instead of merely a drop in economic strength. A sense of proportion and care must be maintained not merely by the parties to the wage negotiations and the finance politicians of the government laender and communities.

The Federal Bank needs to revise its current policy aimed solely along a restrictive course, interest rates must be cut, even if the dollar were to rise to a temporary exchange rate of DM1.90 or more.

PAPERS ASSESS EVOLUTION OF U.S. POLICY TOWARD IRAN

Weinstein Article

DW281336 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 28 Oct 80 p 3

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "How the Election Campaign Has Changed the Middle East Strategy of the United States"]

[Text] Washington, 27 October--The U.S. election campaign may have a negative effect on the U.S. Middle East strategy. The regard for the hostages and the consequences which the release of the detained people may have on the election outcome have become elements of President Carter's election campaign tactics. He does not want to expose himself to a situation where success is required--one reason why he is publicly damping hopes that there will be a change in Tehran. But he also wants the optimism preserved in his constituency that the White House may come up with triumphant news by 4 November.

But this means that Middle East policy, too, must be subordinated to domestic ends aimed at Carter's renewed move into the White House. Granted, the government pretends to be neutral. The President, the vice president and the secretary of state angrily reject insinuations that they pursue an egotistical policy with their intensified sympathy for the fate of the hostages. Yet reality disproves such protestations. Washington has taken the side of Iran; and it did that so unequivocally that former Secretary of State Kissinger laconically said the other day that current U.S. policy can only be termed undignified by the allies of the United States.

How does the strategic situation appear viewed from Washington's angle? The President has called Iraq an aggressor. The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations supports a plan for a cease-fire which will reap Iran more advantages than it will Iraq. The question of how the demands could be met which Iran raises for the release of the hostages is being discussed openly. There seems to be a considerable inclination on the part of the government to fulfill even nonsensical and insulting conditions set by the Iranian revolutionaries. Even if the whole policy should again end up in a disappointment it must be noted that the United States under Carter has cultivated the impression that it has abandoned its neutrality for the sake of the hostages.

The White House is pursuing a strategy of advance concession. The price that must be paid for this can only be guessed at right now, with the first victim of U.S. Middle East policy possibly being Saudi Arabia. The Saudi Kingdom gave a signal through its wish that the United States make four AWACS plane available for the protection of Saudi air space. This showed in a demonstrative way that an Arab state, prompted by the concern over the stability in the Gulf zone, intends to publicly act in concert with the great power United States. This attitude on Riyadh's part is a signal which the Emirates and Kuwait understand as well.

Granted, the Americans and the Saudis have been allied for quite some time. Thousands of U.S. engineers, officers and military technicians are looking after the Saudi Armed Forces. U.S. depots exist there. The Saudis are politically supported with U.S. arms deliveries. The United States has concluded advantageous special agreements with Riyadh which safeguard the energy supply of the United States. But all that had more or less transpired in the darkness of covert diplomatic relations. The Saudis did not wish to emphasize excessively their friendship with the very world power which guarantees the survival of Israel.

Now they have taken off their mask, and the United States indeed seems to intend to honor this partnership by flirting with an adversary, namely Iran. After all, Riyadh regards Khomeyni and his revolutionary followers as the greatest danger to its existence as a state and economic power. Saudi Arabia fears two things: First, the feudal system feels challenged sociopolitically by the religious fanatics in Tehran, second, they take seriously the threat by President Bani-Sadr who told the French news magazine NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR that Iran might be tempted in the event of a defeat to drag its neighbors along into doom by bombing all oilfields in the Persian Gulf.

Thus the Saudis had, and wanted, to put their stakes on the Americans. This policy is now in jeopardy, because Riyadh, being an adversary of Tehran, supports the regime in Baghdad. But one cannot be allied simultaneously with an enemy and a sympathizer of Tehran. Husayn the strong man in Baghdad, already has loudly protested the fact that the United States, for the sake of the hostages, is courting the Iranians to a point where it is no longer possible to speak of neutrality. Yet at the moment the Iraqi dictator is playing a central part in the game for power in the Middle East. He wants to assume the predominant position on the Gulf which the shah held before him. His army is efficient and is not yet worn down technically. Allegedly the Iraqis have purchased a supply of military spare parts that will last for 12 years.

Granted, it is not certain whether Husayn will succeed in fully reaping his war booty. Nor does anyone venture to predict what kind of burdens Iraq would have to assume if it conquered Khuzestan. At the moment, however, the states bordering on the Persian Gulf are afraid of Iraq's strength. Saudi Arabia cannot afford to break with Iraq; on the contrary, it would have to move even closer to Husayn if it found itself compelled to give up its friendship with the United States because the United States approaches Iran. Saudi Arabia is concerned about being isolated.

It is still something like a patron saint of the small principalities. The Emirates, midget states such as Bahrain, look fearfully toward Tehran as the revolution could come from there. Followers of the Shi'ite religion in Kuwait, Bahrain, Dubai and other emirates worship Khomeyni, and in doing this are natural enemies of their emirs. The latter have therefore joined the Saudi policy against Iran. If the Saudi partner finds himself left out because of having sided with an America that supports Iran, the small Gulf principalities would have only Iraq left as an ally.

American-Iranian rapprochement would, therefore, initiate quite a few changes. In doing this America would run the risk of losing all its proteges. Not all American considerations are wrong which are aimed at supporting Iran. A doctrine in the United States says that Iran could not stand the loss of its oil province Khuzestan. It would then break apart in many separate republics. That again would stimulate radical powers to take hold of parts of the dead lion's skin. The consequence would be even more unrest and instability in the strategic Mideast zone. Therefore Tehran must be helped.

The core of this assessment of the situation is not wrong. The dead shah had made a similar assessment. But the reservation of another doctrine may also hold water: After the separation of Khuzestan, Khomeyni's regime would be stronger. The national resistance of the Iranians would grow; a war to reconquer would thus be programmed. A war of reconquest would mean an eternal danger for the West of becoming separated from its energy sources.

So it is at least uncertain whether some American backing of Iran which would have to be paid for with a front against Iraq and a possible breach with Saudi Arabia would change the strategic situation to the advantage of peaceful development. It is already difficult for America to maintain its privileged position in Saudi Arabia. Carter did not comply with the Saudi demands to equip the F-15 planes, ordered in America, with bomb sights. The President did not want to turn the Jewish voter groups in America against him.

The Saudis want to change the armament of their planes because they plan to use this weapon as a deterrent against Iran. The Israelis say that some day Riyadh will use the planes to attack the Jewish state. Eight days prior to the elections, the President was forced to give more significance to the Israeli arguments than to the request of the Saudis. If open American support for Iran develops, it could lead in Riyadh to a deep crisis in relations with Washington.

What do the American really have to offer to the Iranians? If the President releases the frozen money this does not mean according to U.S. law that Iran could have free access to the deposits. Supplies of American military materiel would be of little use for the Iranian Armed Forces. The equipment would have to be picked up in America by large Iranian planes. Tehran would have to ask many states for permission to fly over their territories. It is doubtful whether all governments would issue such rights. Then the materiel must be transported, distributed and eventually brought to the front.

In view of the rotten Iranian supply system this would take months. In addition, it would benefit an army and an air force consisting of one third active soldiers and two thirds revolutionary guards. These mixed units act like hostile brothers on the battlefield. Each ignores the orders of the other. If the hostage problem did not exist, an American Government would have to think about that reality for a long time before adapting its strategy to Iran.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Commentary

DW281300 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 28 Oct 80 p 12

[Commentary signed Vck.: "Cat and Mouse"]

[Text] Americans probably take a different view of it, and naturally the fate of their captured compatriots is at stake these days in Tehran. And yet it is a painful idea that negotiations on the liberation of the diplomats have become an issue in the U.S. election campaign. For Europeans the idea is appalling that influential Soviet diplomacy or merely the old and stubborn Ayatollah Khomeyni could decide in Tehran on who will be the head of state of the leading Western power in the next 4 years. How much more humiliation will President Carter take to win the election campaign in the last minute by appearing on television hand in hand with the rescued diplomats? The leading mullahs in Iran are playing the final round of the cruel game in a supreme way. Like a cat torturing a captured mouse, they enjoy the excitement aroused in the public and in the President of the United States. Every day of the continuing evil activities costs the West prestige in the eyes of the East. How long will the oil monarchies of the Arab Peninsula be able to endure the triumph of the Iranian revolution? More is at stake here than just the lives of the hostages.

SPD'S WEHNER CALLS FOR RENEWED CONTACTS WITH GDR

LD282052 Hamburg DPA in German 1456 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 28 Oct (DPA)—In a prereleased interview on the ARD Television Panorama program today, SPD floor leader Herbert Wehner said that mutual points of contact must be sought in the worsened situation between the two German states for the further development of relations. He said that calm should now prevail and opportunities must be taken "to bring to life again possible relations that have been disturbed or disrupted."

Wehner said that the cause of the latest measures by the GDR holding the Federal Republic at arm's length was the obligation which the GDR leadership wanted to and had to fulfill within the framework of the Warsaw Pact.

Both states in divided Germany were integrated in military alliances which were not only different but opposed to one another. Both German states needed opportunities to ensure that relations between them did not again deteriorate to the additional detriment of the people, "and now it is a matter of seeing where contact is possible and where much of what has been set in motion can also be continued," he said. This applied to both German states and also applied to the two world powers. Wehner assumed that the GDR leadership, in accordance with the statements made by SED chief Erich Honecker at the Leipzig autumn fair, was very interested in a further expansion of inter-German relations. This was also the position of the Federal Republic. "We must simply be interested in being guided by what is possible," Wehner said. The more talk there was about it and the more it became an object of debate, the more difficult it would be to repair the damage that had been done.

PRESS DISCUSSES GDR-POLISH TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS

DW291019 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Press review on GDR-Polish travel restrictions]

[Text] NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG writes: The "sovereign, stable and world-open" GDR, as the second German state likes to represent itself, isolates itself from more than just so-called class enemies on the other side of its Western borders. Now it does not even trust the people in Poland, to which the GDR feels "irrevokably and fraternally connected." The lively debates between the independent Polish labor union movement "solidarity" and the party and government leadership in Warsaw have obviously created extreme fear in the SED top leadership echelon. What mistrust between socialist allies, what cynicism, with the help of which the already existing animosities between the Germans in central Germany and the Poles are being heated up.

RUHR-NACHRICHTEN of Dortmund points out: East Berlin mentioned yesterday "temporary changes with regard to travel to and from Poland. The conclusions to be drawn, however, will probably have a long-term effect not only with regard to internal relations of the socialist camp with its member Poland, but also with regard to East-West relations. The delimitation vis-a-vis Poland means either that together with an increasing isolation of the country a general process of drying out the free trade union movement will be supported, or that Poland will be "prepared" for direct action by the Warsaw Pact states. Both things mean that the East bloc will be occupied for a longer time with highly explosive internal problems. The approach to the West will be everything but open. The resumption of detente policy is moving farther and farther away.

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN advocates the following view: Possibly Warsaw was forced into this temporary agreement to prevent the Polish trade union movement from slopping over to the GDR, to localize the domestic conflict, and thus to get a better grip on it in the next few weeks. By all indications Moscow is couneracting the Polish disease with an East bloc therapy which has been skillfully staged and excellently timed: It is not the Kremlin itself that acts in public but its allies. Thus obviously the sharp criticism from Prague against Walesa is aimed at splitting up the Polish trade union movement from the basis of personal defamation. What is added to all this now is the isolation campaign by the GDR. What will be the next step?

DKP EXECUTIVE MEETS IN DUESSELDORF

LD260312 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1657 GMT 25 Oct 80

[Text] Duesseldorf, 25 Oct (ADN)—The German Communist Party [DKP] will do everything to increase the FRG peace movement's extent and power, Kurt Bachmann, member of the Presidium, emphasized in the report to the DKP party executive committee which met in Duesseldorf on Saturday for a 2-day meeting. Bachmann rejected the deployment of new U.S. nuclear missiles in the FRG and Western Europe and demanded a reduction in arms expenditure as well as disarmament steps on the part of the FRG Government.

He also demanded the FRG's constructive help in the Vienna negotiations and a realistic FRG position at the Madrid meeting. Kurt Bachmann said: "We demand that our country's treaties with the socialist countries be adhered to and relations between the FRG and GDR constructively developed further." Bachmann continued: "Anyone refusing to respect the sovereign rights of the socialist GDR, anyone who refuses to recognize independent GDR citizenship and to negotiate accordingly, is placing obstacles in the development of normal relations between the two German states and blocking progress which is in the interests of mankind and peace."

Kurt Bachmann strongly appealed for the joint fight against neo-Nazism by all FRG Democrats and antifascists. The increasing neo-Nazi terror campaigns are possible only because the ruling circles have been refusing for years to take steps against neo-Nazism.

Leaders Attack Policy Toward GDR

LD261824 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1556 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Excerpt] Duesseldorf, 26 Oct (ADN)--The German Communist Party (DKP) is to hold its sixth congress in Hanover from 29 to 31 May 1981. This decision was made by the DKP Executive at a weekend meeting in Duesseldorf.

DKP Chairman Herbert Mies said that preparations for the congress would be taking place at a time when high demands are being made on communists. The international situation had become more complicated. Peace must be made more secure. The NATO decision on missiles and the new U.S. nuclear strategy are at variance with a policy of peace, national reason and social security. He said: "When the vital issue of securing peace and national existence is at stake as it is today, it is the primary duty of every communist and every party organization to participate actively and effectively in giving a new impetus to and broadening as far as possible our country's peace movement, the movement to prevent the deployment of new American nuclear missiles in the Federal Republic."

One cannot ignore, he said, that the FRG Government's switch to the U.S. policy of confrontation and its pace-setting role in implementing the NATO decision on missiles and in interfering in the internal affairs of socialist countries has put a heavy strain on FRG-GDR relations. He said: "Let no one try to deny the GDR's sovereign right to make foreign excahange regulations for tourists in line with its interests." Anyone who misuses the issue for an incitement campaign against the GDR is bent on attacking the policy of detente and making a policy change in relations with the GDR.

Big capital is seeking to set the basic policy lines for the 1980's in its interest and at an alarming pace. The DKP will support all forces which seek to influence the policy of the new coalition government by demanding the continuance of detente, the safeguarding of jobs, the raising of the purchasing power of the masses and calling for a stop to a further swing to the right. The situation calls for immediate social and political action.

JUDGE ISSUES ARREST WARRANT FOR ALLEGED GDR SPY

LD281624 Hamburg DPA in German 1215 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Summary] Karlsruhe, 28 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Prosecutor's Office said in reply to an inquiry today that the investigating judge at the Federal Court of Justice in Karlsruhe yesterday issued an arrest warrant against a 40-year-old man strongly suspected of intelligence activity for the East Berlin Ministry of State Security. The accused, who identified himself as university lecturer Rainer Koenig from East Berlin, is in custody. The Federal Prosecutor's Office did not say where he had been detained. Koenig is the eighth suspected East bloc agent to be arrested in the Federal Republic in the past 2 weeks. However, the Federal Prosecutor's Office stated that there was no connection between the alleged university lecturer and the other people arrested.

AGHA SHAHI HOLDS TALKS WITH GISCARD, FRANCOIS-PONCET

NC282046 Paris AFP in English 2027 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] Paris, 28 Oct (AFP)--Pakistani Foreign Minister Agha Shahi met today with his French counterpart, Jean Francois-Poncet, directly after holding talks with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing. Talks with both the president and the foreign minister dealt primarily with the conflict between Iran and Iraq, Pakistani sources said.

After his meeting with the president, Mr Shahi said that Iran and Iraq had agreed in principle to welcome a committee of representatives from six non-aligned countries and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). The committee, initiated by PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat, would be charged with a good-will mission and would not attempt to mediate the conflict, Mr Shahi said.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing, who said he supports neutrality by the major world powers in the Iran-Iraq conflict and peace initiatives by the United Nations or the Islamic Conference, today reportedly sent a letter to Iraqi President Saddam Husayn. The contents of the message were not known, however. Mr Shahi also discussed proposed UN resolutions regarding Afghanistan with Mr Francois-Poncet, the Pakistani source said.

Mr Shahi's visit followed a brief stay here on September 30 by Pakistani President Mohammad Ziaul Haq, who was returning from an Islamic Conference good-will mission to Iran and Iraq.

DEFENSE MINISTER: NO DECISION YET ON NEUTRON BOMB

LD281703 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Oct 80 p 42

[Excerpt] Henri Caillavet, (independent senator for Lot-et-Garonne) questioned the defense minister on the subject of the neutron bomb: "When the UDF includes in its program the possibility of a 'forward battle' isn't it agreeing with the U.S. idea of a graduated escalation, a 'flexible response'? Is the UDF expressing the president's thinking on this point, as it does on many others?"

Serge Boucheny (PCF senator for Paris) stated that the neutron bomb changes the conditions of our defense and is speeding up our integration into the NATO forces.

Defense Minister le Theule replied: "We are still at the research stage. Our strategic doctrine has not changed. We reject the idea of resorting to tactical nuclear weapons. The neutron weapon is only one element of our nuclear panoply and could play an essential deterrent role; its use would depend on the president's decision alone but, I repeat, the decision to manufacture the weapon has not yet been made."

Max Lejeune (democratic left senator for Somme) said: "The neutron bomb is attacked by some people. Why? Because it could paralyze an armada of tanks moving toward the West. It is, therefore, a specifically defensive weapon. I think that the government should pursue its development."

LOANS TO BRAZIL REALLOCATED TO OIL INDUSTRY

LD281145 Paris LE MONDE in French 26-27 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Brazilian Planning Minister Antonio Delfim Neto flew to Tokyo on Saturday after a 4-day visit to Paris intended to plan President Figueiredo's visit to Paris in January. He was received by Mr Giscard d'Estaing on Friday. He previously had had extensive talks with Mr Monory, Mr Cointat and Mr Giraud [Economy, foreign trade and industry ministers respectively]

The minister's visit made it possible to reallocate some of the loans granted by France under the terms of the draft financial agreement signed in Brasilia in April to the oil sector at Brazil's request. The French Treasury in fact granted to Brazil loans totaling Fr2.5 billion at a 7.5 percent interest rate with a moratorium of 10 years before repayment begins. In addition to that loan there are now two big loans made to Petrobras, the Brazilian hydrocarbons company, by a banking pool headed by Paribas. This money will be used to buy two off-shore platforms and drilling equipment. The facilities granted to Brazil should help Mr Neto in the negotiations he will have in Japan, which is apparently refusing to give Brazil any more credit until that country has restored some order to its overseas debt.

LE MONDE VIEWS FRANCO-ALBANIAN TIES IN WAKE OF MINISTER'S VISIT

LD281201 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] France's and Albania's desire to develop their relations in a common concern for independence and sovereignty was stressed on Tuesday, 21 October, during a dinner given by Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Olivier Stirn in honor of Albanian Deputy Foreign Minister Ksenofon Nushi who is on an official visit to France--a dinner which was also attended by Deputy Education and Culture Minister Anastas Kondo.

After the dinner Mr Stirn pointed out that this is the first time an Albanian Government member has been officially received at the Quai d'Orsay. The secretary of state recalled that his interlocutor had invited him to make an official return visit to Albania, an invitation which he accepted and which will also be a "first" in Franco-Albanian relations.

"The thing which characterizes Albania, perhaps more than the European countries," Mr Stirn said, "is its deep-seated desire for independence." France, he added, "appreciates this deep faith which the Albanian people have in their independence" and he welcomed the "untroubled cooperation between the two countries which is pursued with respect for the independence of each," in both economic and cultural spheres.

For his part Mr Nushi spoke of the influence which the French Revolution had on Albanian progressives in the 20th century and also of the impact of French culture and language in Albania.

"We are determined," he added, "to defend our independence and national sovereignty to the end. Albania is said to be isolated. We do not think it is isolated because we have diplomatic relations with 94 countries. We do not allow everybody to come to Albania because we have many enemies."

Mr Nushi also expressed the hope that the number of Albanian students in France will be increased, notably in the scientific disciplines. The deputy foreign minister, who arrived in Paris Sunday evening [19 October] was to go to Lyons this Wednesday to visit the Merieux laboratories. He will return home Thursday.

The first official Albanian visit to France, which was just taken place at Tirana's initiative, follows the talks which Nesti Nase had with Jean Francois-Poncet 1 week ago when the Albanian foreign minister made a stopover in Paris.

L'HUMANITE HITS U.S., GISCARD, MITTERRAND FOR BACKING ARMS RACE

LD290747 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 23 Oct 80 pp 1,9

[Jacques Coubard article: "General Rogers' Alibi"]

[Text] If American General Bernard W. Rogers is to be believed, the West must face up to the "monstrous challenge" with which the USSR has presented it by improving its defense system in the past 15 years.

The NATO supreme commander, who used the heavy artillery of psychological warfare at an American Chamber of Commerce meeting in West Berlin on Tuesday night, carefully refrained from explaining to his audience that the United States has remained in an "order arms" posture during this period.

The fairy tale about a "Soviet threat" and American laggardness was limited. Mr Carter knows something about this since he initiated this mendacious campaign. Accused by his rival in the presidential election of having neglected American military capability, he has been defending himself in nearly all his speeches. "Militarily we are the strongest nation in the world," he again stated on Long Island last week (THE TIMES of 27 October 1980).

The assertion that the Soviet military forces are stronger than ours, he stated on another occasion, is merely demagoguery on the eve of the elections. "After the campaign," Mr Carter explained, "you will realize that these accusations are unfounded." It remains, however, that the arms race in which he has involved America and its allies is very real and very dangerous.

But even though the anti-Soviet alibi does not hold water, it nonetheless encourages the capitalist countries to give a new impetus to the arms race and increase pressure on the peoples who reject the multinational companies' yoke. The Greek people, whose leaders have just fallen in step again with the Atlantic alliance, have not forgotten that in April 1967 the colonels' coup was merely the implementation of a NATO plan for putting an end to a development which displeased the Washington strategists.

As a faithful vassal, Mr Giscard d'Estaing loses no opportunity to put France at the service of those who dream about recovering the ground lost by imperialism to the peoples. The French naval forces' cooperation with the expeditionary forces deployed in the Gulf smells not only of oil, it also smells of counterrevolutionary action in a part of the world where a cartel of big companies held complete sway not very long ago.

The plan for creating a European fleet to watch over "the oil route," as proposed by Diligent, Giscardian representative to the Strasbourg Parliament, springs from exactly the same intentions. If it were adopted, France would follow in the wake of America without its Parliament being consulted. The same would happen to the European army which would witness General Rogers and his Bundeswehr colleagues becoming responsible for our country's destiny.

Both plans for military integration and the deployment of new American missiles in Europe are part of a strategy aimed at exerting pressure on our continent's peoples, including the French people, with a view to trying to prevent them from embarking on a path of democratic reforms which would challenge the power of the multinational companies.

It was under these circumstances that, harking back to the Socialist Party's old demons, Francois Mitterrand has rallied to General Rogers' banner, going as far in his zeal as to accuse Mr Giscard d'Estaing of not being zealous enough.

Let us note in passing that the NATO supreme commander did not conceal the fact that a renewal of the nuclear arms race implies "financial efforts." Such efforts would worsen the consequences of the crisis affecting capitalist countries. This means that French workers would have to contribute to any additional cost of the upkeep of the praetorian guard of the big feudal financial companies.

"The struggle for peace," Georges Marchais emphasizes in "Hope for the Present", "has now become absolutely necessary for the simple reason that what is at stake is the survival of all mankind. Preventing imperialism from resorting to warfare and ensuring the world's transition to socialism in peace and as a result of all peoples' free choice is becoming the supreme objective of the class struggle at the world level."

It is by building upon this analysis that the French Communists will do everything in their power to ensure that the meeting to be held at Kaiserslautern in the FRG next Sunday proves successful with a view to opposing nuclear escalation, demanding that negotiations on all medium-range missiles deployed in Europe be held, stopping the production of the neutron bomb and ensuring success for the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in which the 35 states which signed the Helsinki accord are to participate.

PCF COMMITTEE, EDITOR CRITICISM OF ELLEINSTEIN PUBLISHED

[Unattributed report: "Elleinstein No Longer Has Anything in Common With PCF"]

[Text] Jean Elleinstein's recent stances and initiatives have prompted the PCF committee for the Paris 12th Arrondissement to publish a statement asserting that "Jean Elleinstein has placed himself outside the party, its policy and its organization." In addition the weekly REVOLUTION publishes in this week's issue a letter by its director, [PCF Politburo member] Guy Hernier addressed to Jean Elleinstein. We are publishing these two texts below.

The following is the text adopted Tuesday [21 October] by the 12th Arrondissement PCF committee: "The Paris 12th Arrondissement committee has discussed the position of Jean Elleinstein, member of the Vincennes University Pablo-Heruda cell who is busy transferring to Sain-Denis.

"For months J. Elleinstein, who takes no part in any activity or discussion in his cell, has been using his PCF membership in order to level intolerable accusations at the PCF. His television appearances and the place he is given in the bourgeois press are merely and opportunity for violent attacks on our party's policy. "Recently he went further and sank even lower: He made a public appeal for people to oppose G. Marchais, the party candidate in the presidential election; he adopted the old anticommunist formula used by Guy Mollet alleging that the PCF has 'swung to the East.' Finally, in becoming a journalist on Mr Hersant's LE FIGARO-MAGAZINE he has given shameful support to the chief editor of this publication, Louis Pauwels, chronicler of the 'new right' and unanimously condemned for racist remarks a few hours after the Rue Copernic attack.

"There is unanimous condemnation in the party; Communists everywhere are angered by J. Elleinstein's remarks and even more angered by the fact that he continues to claim PCF membership when he no longer has anything in common with the PCF. For all these reasons the 12th Arrondissement committee thinks that Jean Elleinstein has placed himself outside the party, its policy and its organization."

This week's issue of REVOLUTION publishes a letter from Guy Hernier to Jean Elleinstein. The following is the text: "I have heard that you have accepted a regular column in LE FIGARO-MAGAZINE and the latest issue confirms that this collaboration has now started. I do not feel any need to tell you what I think of that. The anticommunist content of Louis Pauwels' weekly, open to the extreme right's worst ideologies, relieves me of that need. Nonetheless you know that when the REVOLUTION editorial board was formed, we all agreed that we would not ask for contributions from comrades or friends contributing to other weeklies. We did not imagine that this rule of simple journalistic ethics could be applied to a contributor to Mr Hersant's LE FIGARO-MAGAZINE. However, the facts are there. I am convinced that in taking this decision you realized that your were placing yourself outside REVOLUTION's staff. I take note of this fact."

PCP ACCEPTS BRITO AS PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

LD282156 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1930 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Excerpt] It was reported this afternoon that the Central Committee of the Portuguese Communist Party has proposed to a party national conference, in session since 1430 hours at Sacavem, the name of Carlos Brito as the PCP presidential candidate.

We have just learned that the conference has accepted the name of Carlos Brito.

Born in Lourenco Marques in 1933, Carlos Brito entered politics in 1951, and 2 years later joined the PCP. In 1955 he went underground working as a party functionary. In 1975 he became the PCP deputy for the Faro constituency to the then constituent assembly, having subsequently stood for election in the Lisbon district. He led the PCP parliamentary group during the first legislature.

The PCP Central Committee is also reported to have asked the Sacavem national conference to empower the Central Committee and its political commission to decide whether Carlos Brito's candicacy should remain effective until the poll takes place or whether it should be withdrawn before the election date. [7 December].

It should be recalled that the PCP had been collecting signatures to back a presidential candidate whose name had not been made public.

Added Details on Candidacy

LD290428 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0001 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Excerpts] A national conference of the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP] has approved by majority vote, with only four abstentions, Carlos Brito's candidacy in the presidential elections, in the wake of a proposal submitted by the Central Committee. Of the 29 delegates taking part in the debate at the conference, held in Sacavem, the only dissenting voice was that of a vital Moreira, one of those who obstained.

In Alvaro Cunhal's words, the candidacy of Carlos Brito--the second presidential candidate to be put forward by the PCP since the 25 April 1974 revolution, has four objectives: To carry out a campaign to explain the political situation; to help mobilize the antifascist electorate toward defeating Soares Carneiro; to induce conditions more favorable to the unity of the democratic and antifascist forces; and to strengthen the PCP.

Identical words were uttered by Carlos Brito on being nominated, who then added that his campaign would benefit from the lessons of past campaigns, and it would above all be very much geared to clarify the situation. Defining his task as a complex one, the Communist candidate went on to say that he would point out the negative side of Eanes's record as the president of the republic, which, he stressed, gives rise to serious difficulties in the workers' vote. On the other hand, Carlos Brito said that he would not fail to mention the positive aspects of the performance of the president of the republic, something which allowed him to state that the result of the overall balance has been positive for the democratic regime.

Reactions to the PCP's decision were quick. Jose Manuel Tengarrinha, speaking for his party, said that the Portuguese Democratic Movement [MDP] will not back Carlos Brito's candidacy, this stand having been already clarified by the decision, adopted by the party's national conference, not to back any party candidate. Jose Manuel Tengarrinha refused to comment on the PCP move in the context of Gen Ramalho Eanes' candidacy, but said that the MDP's stand did not mean any disregard for the person of Carlos Brito and that the stand would not cause any upsets within the United People's Alliance since this alliance will have been dissolved soon after the parliamentary elections, from the legal point of view.

The Popular Democratic Union [UDP] holds the view that Carlos Brito's candidacy is aimed at being used as a coverup for PCP support for Ramalho Eanes in the first or second round of elections. Rui Vasconcelos, of UDP's national secretariat, said that the Communist candidacy would not even serve to unite the PCP ranks. He added that the Communist move did not surprise UDP and said that in his view it was not an alternative candidacy to those of the right, since it would not manage to muster any consensus except within the PCP itself.

For his part, Joaquin Letria, the spokesman for Ramalho Eanes' relection campaign managers, said that Carlos Brito's candidacy goes to demonstrate the bad faith of those who chose to link Eanes with the Communist vote and expressed the view that "henceforth it would be very hard to deny that when reelecting Ramalho Eanes on 7 December we are not reelecting an independent, nonparty and national president.

PORTUGUESE CP WARNS AGAINST DIVISION OF 'DEMOCRATIC CAMP'

LD281459 Lisbon AVANTE in Portuguese 23 Oct 80 p 2

[Apparent text of PCP Political Commission 20 October note: "It Is Necessary To Avoid Splits in Democratic Camp"]

[Text] 1—Some recent events, specifically the Socialist Party secretary general's decision to suspend his party activity until the presidential elections, made following the Socialist Party National Committee's reaffirmation of support for candidate General Ramalho Eanes, have been causing some commotion among democratic forces and sectors, affecting the calm and lucidity which it is essential to keep in assessing the current political situation.

2—For its part, the PCP, in accordance with the line laid down by the Central Committee 13-14 October, deems it opportune to reaffirm at this precise moment that the central decisive and priority aim of the democratic forces, the workers and the Portuguese people remains that of defeating "Democratic Alliance" Candidate General Soares Carneiro. Despite the fact that the most recent events introduce further difficulties into an already highly complex situation, real conditions for the achievement of this aim, which is in keeping with the need to defend the democratic system and with the sentiments of the majority of the Portuguese people, still exist. It will be within this context of confidence, determination and a sense of its national responsibilities that the PCP will determin its stance on the presidential elections at the already announced national conference.

3—The delight with which the reactionary forces are celebrating and encouraging the manifestation of difficulties and tensions among democratic sectors clearly demonstrates that the "Democratic Alliance" is aiming at disorienting the Portuguese democrats, seeking to encourage discord among the democratic forces and within some of them in order to smoth the way for reaction's candidate—General Soares Carneiro.

The results of the legislative elections clearly demonstrate the need to avoid splits in the democratic camp and the need for a great concentration of efforts to ensure that the Portuguese democrats, despite the difficult and complex conditions, can successfully wage the coming great battle in defense of freedom and the democratic system.

NEGOTIATIONS CONTINUE AT CSCE PREPARATORY MEETING

Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Arrives

LD272108 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] Yuriy Dubinin, chief of the Soviet delegation at the preparatory meeting for the Madrid conference, today voiced a wish for negotiations without further delay on the solution of the problems which have brought the meeting to a deadlock. For 1 month, the Soviet representative said, we have been trying to get negotiations started on the main questions, especially that of how time is to be allocated at the main conference. Yet we have still not found a common language, though we shall continue to try.

This weekend, a Soviet deputy minister of foreign affairs, Mr Ryzhov, arrived in Madrid, without giving any reason for his presence. Observers at the conference are according some importance to Ryzhov's visit, believing that he could be carrying new instructions from the Kremlin on the preparation of the conference.

Soviet-British Confrontation

LD281924 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Correspondent Jose Manuel Salgado dispatch]

[Text] This morning's meeting of the preparatory session saw a confrontation between the Soviet delegation and the British delegation, the latter supported by the Americans. The Soviet side said that there are only two points on which agreement exists, and that this must be taken as a starting point. To this the British replied that there are many more than that, and that (?the proceedings are) approaching a critical point, in view of the little time left until the main conference is due to begin.

Both inside and outside the chamber, the Soviet side is continuing to stress its desire that an agreement should be reached, but the general tone is the same as it has been for some days past.

For their part, the neutral countries Austria, Finland, Sweden and Switzerland have formed a group which is meeting constantly outside the main sessions and which makes contact with the countries regarded to be the most important inside the conference. Yesterday it met the Soviet and the U.S. delegates. Today, apparently, it will speak with the Romanian and tomorrow the Spanish delegations. So if an agreement is finally reached on an agenda and a timetable set for the conference this may possibly come at the last moment and thanks to the efforts of those four countries.

DEFENSE SECRETARY DENIES SPENDING CUTS 'IMMINENT'

LD282028 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1505 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] Defence Secretary Mr Francis Pym today denied that last week's PRESS ASSOCIATION disclosures of secret documents meant that cuts in defence spending were imminent. He told the Commons that no decision had been taken and what were taking place were simply "routine discussions."

"We are going to increase our defence expenditure and we are going to maintain our deterrent capability, nuclear and conventional," he said at question time to loud cheers from Tory backbenchers.

Mr Pym was tackled about the leaks by Labour MPs. Shadow Defence Secretary Mr William Rodgers said it was "very bland" of Mr Pym "to dismiss the information leaked to the press last week as evidence of a routine discussion." Labour had been saying for months that the government was "living in a dreamland" if it thought its planned levels of defence spending could be sustained in a recession.

"The whole defence planning is now in a mess and the credibility of the government as a whole--and I regret to say Mr Pym's--is at stake," said Mr Rodgers.

But Mr Pym told him: "It is entirely reasonable for a chancellor of the Exchequer to seek to obtain government policy at a lesser cost. There is an annual round of talks about expenditure every single year and that is going on now and we will announce our decisions in due course." And later he told MPs that the 3 percent a year planned growth of defence spending remained the government aim.

Amid renewed Tory cheering, he maintained that the government had spent more on defence last year than the year before, was spending more this year and would spend more next year.

Fife Central Labour MP Mr Willie Hamilton questioned whether all the Treasury ministers had supported the decision to spend 5 billion pounds on the Trident missile project.

But Mr Pym reaffirmed the government's unity on the project: "It was a government decision. The government stands by the decision it made and it applies to all members."

Keighley Labour leftwinger Mr Bob Cryer first raised the issue of the "mole leaks" which, he claimed, "indicate that there have to be cuts in defence expenditure." He said that public opposition to the government's defence spending had been endorsed by the "excellent demonstration" in Trafalgar Square last Sunday. It was "disgraceful" that the government intended to spend so much on Trident at a time when it was halting expenditure on council homes.

NICOSIA HOSTS 3-DAY INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY CONFERENCE

NC281638 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] Today a 3-day international conference of solidarity for the national liberation movements and the people of the Arabian Gulf against imperialism opened in Nicosia. The conference is jointly sponsored by the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization, the International Secretariat of Solidarity for Arab People and the permanent secretariat of the Pan-Arabian Congress. The conference is being attended by 260 delegates from the Middle East, the Arabian Gulf area, Asia, Africa and Europe.

In a message to the conference read by Minister to the President Katsellis, President Kiprianou expressed the Cypriot people's gratitude for the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization which has always consistently supported the struggle for the restoration of independence and territorial integrity of Cyprus and for the securing of a peaceful and prosperous future for all Cypriots.

The president added: On the occasion of the holding of this international conference, I would like to express deep concern for the dangerous situation prevailing in many parts of the world, and particularly in our region--this is something that constitutes a threat to peace and security.

The president stressed that no problem in the world can be resolved without the implementation of the principles of the UN Charter. The president added that Cyprus fully supports the struggle of all the people endeavoring for their inalienable right to freedom and self-determination. He particularly stressed that Cyprus fully supports the Arab cause and the Palestinian people's fair struggle for freedom and justice, including the establishment of their own independent and sovereign state.

Lissaridhis Addresses Conference

NC291101 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 29 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] Speaking at the "international conference of solidarity with liberation movements and the peoples of the Arab Gulf against imperialism" yesterday, EDEK Chairman Dr Vasos Lissaridhis charged that the issue of resettlement [of Greek Cypriots] in Famagusta, created by the U.S. postcolonialist-imperialist circles, constitutes a trap with the obvious aim of misleading international public opinion and diverting the Cyprus question from the UN framework.

At the same time, in his lengthy analysis, the EDEK chairman said that the British bases on Cyprus and the U.S. bases on Crete and in Europe are being used as "support bases" in a chain of Pentagon military springboards in Turkey, Israel, Oman, Egypt and Somalia for the purpose of laying siege to the Arab Gulf.

Referring to the Cyprus issue, the socialist leader pointed out that the postcolonialist circles are trying to implement in the Middle East the policy of "Bantustanization" by using Haddad [free south Lebanon leader] in Lebanon and Denktas in Cyprus.

They are trying to mislead world public opinion, he said, by creating the impression that resettlement in a section of Famagusta constitutes an "acceptable" solution to the Cyprus problem.

Dr Lissaridhis stressed: However, such an event constitutes a trap, because the Cyprus solution lies in the implementation of the UN resolutions and decisions which dictate the withdrawal of all foreign troops and the return of all the refugees to their home.

Dr Lissaridhis also stressed in his speech that:

—The postcolonialist circles need Cyprus because it is close to the oil producing areas and has good communications capability in the region.
—Their goal is to convert Cyprus into a politico-military base of aggression against the progressive forces in the area. Therefore, the Cypriot people's struggle for independence and sovereignty is directly linked with the struggle of the Arab people and the Palestinians in particular.
—If we allow the postcolonialists and their proxies—Israel in the case of the Arabs and Turkey in the case of Cyprus—to establish rights on the basis of aggression and occupation, then we would be countersigning our own death certificate.

GREECE'S KKE DELEGATION PAYS VISIT AS AKEL GUESTS

NC280937 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 28 Oct 80 p 8

[Text] A three-man delegation of the KKE Central Committee arrived in Cyprus yesterday at the invitation of the AKEL Central Committee. The delegation is headed by KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis and includes A. Ambatielos, KKE Politburo member, and Androulakis of the KKE Central Committee's Press Bureau. The delegation was welcomed at Larnaca Airport by AKEL Secretary General E. Papaioannou, AKEL Politburo members A. Khristodoulidhis and A. Mikhailidhis, Politbuto alternate member and head of the international department Dh. Khristofinis, and by Central Committee member Khr. Tzionis.

Upon his arrival at Larnaca Airport, KKE Central Committee Secretary General Kh. Florakis made the following statement to our paper:

"This is the third time I have visited Cyprus, this very tormented country, and I am particularly moved. I do not conceal the fact that this time, along with my emotion, I also feel particularly uneasy. This uneasiness stems from the intensive efforts being exerted by the imperialists in order to give a NATOite solution to the Cypriot problem.

"The KKE delegation has come here at the invitation of the AKEL Central Committee. Naturally, our visit is not of a formal nature. We will discuss matters of general interest to the movement, questions of the eastern Mediterranean and, above all, matters related to the coordination of the battle by KKE and AKEL for a just solution of the Cypriot problem."

ARCHBISHOP KHRISOSTOMOS CRITICIZES ATHENS NATO DECISION

NC270827 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 27 Oct 80 pp 1, 10

[Text] In a strong criticism of the official Greek policy on Cyprus, as it is conveyed by concrete statements and facts, yesterday Archbishop Khrisostomos stressed that "Cypriot Hellenists are disturbed and they feel that they are being mocked and deceived by those whom they did not expect to do so."

His beatitude the archbishop was speaking at Ayios Dhimitrios Church at Akropolis quarter, Nicosia, and after strongly criticizing the division of Cyprus into many political parties, he said, among other things, the following:

"In our opinion, such a passive and, we can say, antinational attitude on our part is not unrelated with the shaping of Greece's policy toward us—a policy which is not the one we expected. And this is so because Greece, in whom we have always believed and whom we conside to be a true and genuine supporter in our struggle, has been leading us, more and more, every day toward disappointment as a result of its attitude. [paragraph continues]

"In 1974 it withdrew from NATO because of the Turkish invasion and declared at the same time that it would not return if the reasons for its withdrawal were not removed. But the reasons were not removed. The Turkish invasion which was carried out with NATO arms is continuing with all its consequences. Yet, Greece returned to NATO."

His beatitude also stressed: "We have no right to conceal our people's feelings about Greece's attitude toward our problem. Cypriot Hellenists are disturbed and feel that they are mocked and deceived by those whom they did not expect to do so. Cypriot Hellenists are deeply grieved by some statements made in Greece, that the only thing that Greece can do in order to pay its debt toward Cyprus is to succeed in the mentioning of the Cyprus problem during talks or in documents.

"Cypriot Hellenists are also grieved by some other statements in the form of the question: 'Who is going to drive the Turkish aggressors out of Cyprus?' May we be allowed to say that such statements--if they have been correctly reported--cannot be considered part of the history on Hellenic dignity?"

Thus, our people rightly ask: Could it be that we have been renounced by Greece for the sake of some other political expediencies or interests, or could it be that we have been discarded? Let us be allowed to recall that it has no right and it cannot do this. Even if Greece has forgotten that we are part of Hellenism that has preserved our Hellenic extraction for centuries and safeguarded it during frightful trials, Greece has no right to forget that if we are in today's tragic situation, we are not to blame for this. Those who are guilty and responsible for this situation are some others who were representing free Greece and who were expressing the policy of the national center.

It is with deep regret that we are compelled to recall unpleasant events. But the voice of duty and responsibility does not let us keep silent when, on one hand, we see the Turkish aggressors holding our lands and, on the other, threatening all the rest, while our natural supporters admit their inability to support us and abandon us to the mercy of the Turkish aggressors. Under these conditions our people ask themselves whether today's Greece is the one we were taught about by our parents, the one we got to know at our churches and schools, the one we read about in our textbooks, and the one we came to love and to consider as the motherland which--being a true mother--cannot renounce or abandon her children when in danger.

However, irrespective of how much we might be embittered or disappointed because of Greece's attitude, no matter how much it might look as if Greece is abandoning us, we will never cease to be Greeks. We will not betray our Hellenic extraction and origin.

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU DESCRIBES RESULTS OF VISIT TO INDIA

[26 October Statement by President Kiprianou of Cyprus on his return from India]

[Text] I have returned absolutely satisfied with my visit to India. We were accorded a really moving welcome and hospitality by the Indian president, Mr Reddy, Premier Mrs Gandhi, the members of the government, representatives of the Indian people and the Indian people in general. In India there is a great interest in Cyprus. India regards Cyprus as a very friendly country which it supports with consistency and will continue to support in its struggle for freedom.

During my visit I had the opportunity to discuss various matters of common interest. First of all, I briefed President Reddy and Premier Mrs Gandhi on the latest developments in the Cyprus problem in which they showed a lively interest.

I explained to them that a great effort is being made to make progress through the intercommunal talks. India favours the intercommunal talks procedure and at the same time supports an absolutely independent, territorially integral, nonaligned, sovereign, federal and united Cyprus. India holds the view that Cyprus can continue to play a serious role within the framework of the nonaligned movement.

Much was also said which we must regard as an expression of great appreciation of Cyprus' role in international affairs. In the present interdependent world, particularly within the framework of the nonaligned movement, it is not enough for us to ask for the movement's support. We too must do what we can to strengthen the movement. This matter is of particular concern to Mrs Gandhi, who, like the other nonaligned leaders, wants the movement to become stronger and to see the removal of points creating rifts, either because of differences between nonaligned countries or because of various pressures on, and outside interferences with, the movement.

In any case, every effort will be made so that the nonaligned movement, far from disintegrating, may be strengthened even more to become a really substantial force that can play a much more serious role on the international scene than it has in the past. Our cooperation with India is placed within this context. We shall be constantly in touch with the Indian leadership, and also with other countries, such as Yugoslavia, where I recently had the opportunity to hold similar talks with a view to strengthening the nonaligned movement.

I want to underline that, for Cyprus, nonalignemnt is the preferred policy, and we are determined not to abandon this policy no matter how many difficulties we may encounter. We shall follow the nonaligned policy with consistency and, faithful to the principles of the movement, we shall try to make our small contribution to the cause of world peace, confident that for our cause too our participation in the nonaligned world is a significant fact which should not be underestimated or be an object of derision.

Cyprus stands to benefit much from the nonaligned movement and, as stated by many leaders so far, can also offer the movement a great deal. This it will gladly do because our targets and ideals are the same. Naturally, we gave this matter much attention in view of the coming nonaligned foreign ministers' conference which will take place in New Delhi. The target of the conference will be to remove points of friction between nonaligned countries in order to achieve the unity necessary if the movement is to play its role in the cause of world peace and in the creation of conditions for establishing a new economic order in the world--which is a basic target--and also in ensuring mutual respect for all.

I wish to repeat that Mrs Gandhi did us an honour by the statement she made concerning the role Cyprus is expected to play in the nonaligned world.

We also had the opportunity to discuss bilateral issues. In this field, too, there is a desire by both sides to develop cooperation and also to continue the long existing friendship between the two countries. India and Cyprus are two cradles of civilization, two countries which, despite being apart geographically, have always been closely linked. They are also two countries whose great leaders Makarios and Nehru turned this friendship into something real, into practical cooperation. There is great regard for Makarios in India and there is of course great regard in Cyprus for Nehru and his successor, Mrs Gandhi.

India will establish a permanent embassy in Cyprus early next year to ensure closer contact and cooperation in all fields.

We discussed various international problems which disturb world peace and security. There was a convergence of views both on general and specific issues. I implicitly believe that my visit was very useful.

On this occasion, I wish to underline that visits of this kind and top-level contacts greatly contribute to understanding between countries regarding the problems they face and, at the same time, contribute considerably to close cooperation between them.

Regarding the Cyprus problem, I wish to add, and this I stressed also during my visit to India, that we want to see the dialogue make progress and we shall apply all good will to this end. Our side will make every possible effort for the dialogue to succeed. It is not the procedure which is to blame for the fact that no progress has been made so far. What is needed is to face the problem on the basis of UN decisions and the two top-level agreements. On our part, there should be the necessary steadiness and patience. This is not the time for statements which may hurt the chances of success of the dialogue. By this, I do not want to say that I am overoptimistic about the outcome of the dialogue. If the dialogue fails, we shall not hesitate to state this and say why it failed. But it will not fail because of our fault. Therefore, while the dailggue is continuing it must be approached very carefully.

This is not the right time for statements and manifestations of any kind which could be exploited by the Turkish side and could undermine the efforts being made. I have no reasons to believe that the Cyprus people have lost their militant spirit. There may be disquieting signs, but in the final analysis the Cyprus people have militancy, perseverance and a desire for a just solution. And they are not prepared to forsake their rights. Bearing all these in mind, we should at the same time conduct ourselves very carefully and responsibly and this concerns all without exception in these critical and delicate moments we are passing through.

I would like to give the assurance that we are handling and facing the problem of our country in a responsible manner. We should realize, however, that is is possible for us to be influenced by conditions either into taking wrong decisions or into following a policy which will undermine every effort for a just solution of the Cyprus problem.

I consider it useful to say this because in fact we are passing through a delicate phase in the dialogue and there is need for particular caution. Regardless of whether one is for or against the dialogue, the fact is that the dialogue is in progress and we should show the necessary patience and insistence to ensure the success and not the failure of the dialogue. I repeat that if the dialogue fails this will not be through our own fault.

I take this opportunity to stress once again that we are living in conditions of absolute democracy, but on the national question there should be absolute unity of targets and objectives. I, for my part, will make new efforts to achieve the necessary unity. There is need for a response by everyone in order to separate other differences from the national question over which we should not quarrel and which should not be a source of friction in our internal front. We should realize that the enemies of Cyprus want to see our internal front disintegrate. They do not want it to be strong, obviously, so that we will yield to the faits accomplis and so that unacceptable partitionist solutions may be facilitated. We should realize beyond any doubt that such a development would be disastrous for Cyprus and our people.

This is why on this occasion and with the impressions I got from India—where I was really greatly encouraged by what was said about the support which is offered to us and will continue to be offered—I considered it my duty to refer once again to this question and to underline once more the need for unity which is undoubtedly indispensable this moment. Regardless of any divergence of views, regardless of anything else, we should make serious efforts to secure all prerequisites for normal political life in Cyprus as the basis for this indispensable unity.

NEWSPAPER CRITICIZES CARTER'S REMARKS ON CYPRUS

NC291054 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 25 Oct 80 p 2

["Viewpoint" column by Mumtaz Soysal: "People and Turks"]

[Excerpts] Mr Jimmy Carter, the honorable President of the United States, has decreed that following Greece's reintegration into NATO, "the time" has come to settle the Cyprus issue, and he added that the first step to be taken would be to "restore" human rights on the island.

No matter how one looks at this statement, the language is "offensive." That is to say, in this part of the world, it is the United States that "resolves" the issues and determines "the order" of those waiting to be resolved.

Again, this means that "restoring human rights on the island" and "restoring the Greek Cypriot community on the island" imply the same thing. This sounds as if the sufferings of the Turkish Cypriot community from 1963 to 1974 and the oppressions and massacres to which it was subjected during this period, along with the boycotts and the embargoes which have been imposed on this same community since 1974, do not constitute a "violation" of human rights--as if "violation" of human rights can only be considered for those who deserve "restorations."

This indeed, is the limit!

Having established a link with the common market under the partnership agreement, Turkey has begun to do what is possible regarding the phased reduction of tariffs and customs, but when the "free movement of labor power" came up, Western powers have shirked their responsibilities. In fact, they have gone so far as to begin imposing visas on the Turks. This may mean that "they are the partners" and "we are the market," but this is plainly incompatible with the principle of "mutual respect and equality," which is the fundamental rule in international life. Because equality is the basis of human honor and dignity, the rule that "everybody is equal but some are more equal than others" can only be valid in Orwell's "Animal Farm."

If the people of Turkey and those living in northern Cyprus and western Thrace, as well as those working in Europe, are to live in equality with others, then the Turkish state--which is looked upon by all as a "protector"--has to present its stand on these issues in an unequivocal and uncompromising manner.

The question is not one of nationality. It is clearly one of "human rights." There is no room for complaisance.

GENERAL EVREN PRESENTS GOALS IN REPUBLIC DAY MESSAGE

TA290913 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that everything possible is being done and all possibilities are being exploited to ensure a tranquil and secure life for the Turkish nation. Pointing out that this aim will definitely be attained, Evren said: Our nation wishes this and supports the new administration with all its heart.

In his message issued on the occasion of Republic Day, Evren noted that no evil motive will be able to harm the Turkish Republic now and in the future and that, however strong it is, any evil motive will be condemned to destruction in the face of the unique strength and steel will of the Turkish nation, whose heart is full of faith in Ataturk and patriotism.

Evren stated that it was not easy for the Turkish nation to achieve the republican system. He noted that the country was saved and the republican system--which Ataturk described as the most suitable system for the nature and national characteristic of the Turkish nation--was attained following the independence war launched by the great savior Ataturk, who rose like a new sun at a time when the motherland was invaded and when there were attempts to obliterate the Turkish nation from history books. Evren said that a republic is a majority system, which values honesty, work, knowledge and abilities, makes it possible to compete within a legal framework, is open to civilization and development, respects one another's rights, recognizes the right to equal opportunities and has numerous virtues. Pointing out that the human race could attain this political system only thousands of years after establishing social life, Evren said that even at present billions of people are longing for the republican system.

The head of state continued: Unfortunately, persons who wanted to deprive the Turkish nation of the republican system--which it attained only 57 years ago after centuries of hardship--cropped up in our country in recent years and they drove this country to 12 September by mercilessly shedding each other's and innocent citizens' blood. I had, on various occasions, warned these traitors over radio and television and told them to renounce their moves--which are directed through orders from foreign sources--that the Turkish armed forces will never surrender the Turkish republic, which they took over from Ataturk, into the hands of traitors--the tools for unpure motives--and that our tolerance and dignity should not be exploited. However, these traitors did not understand the warning. They believed that they could divide the armed forces by penetrating it as well and thus achieve their treacherous goals. They forgot that the members of the Turkish armed forces are full of patriotism and love of their nation--inspired by a pure faith originating from Ataturk--and that they are sufficiently strong to destroy those who wish to penetrate them. They also forgot that the 45 million citizens living in this country are not on their side. This 45 million mass remained silent and patient until now because of its trust in the armed forces and also because it was waiting for its representatives at the Assembly to start acting.

It is sufficient to mingle with the citizens to see that the nation does not approve of these traitors: However, it is very sad that, instead of acting in accordance with the wishes of the nation, the representatives of the nation heeded the word of a small [word indistinct] and even of a single person of their party and received their orders from there. They attached importance to the interests of the party rather than to national interests.

In his message on the occasion of Republic Day, Evren said that the sole aim of the Turkish armed forces consists of protecting their lofty nation and country as an indivisible entity against internal and foreign enemies and ensuring this nation an eternal life of happiness, security and tranquillity.

Pointing out that, since 12 September, a new direction has been given to work conducted in all the country's organizations and new moves have been undertaken with great passion and excitement in a bid to realize this aim, Evern said: Everything possible is being done and all possibilities are being exploited in order to ensure a tranquil and secure life for the brave Turkish nation. This aim will definitely be attained since our nation wishes this and supports the new administration with all its heart. Any successful result will comprise the most valuable reward for the Turkish armed forces, an infinite pride in being worthy of the great leader Ataturk and his pledge and the trust and love of this lofty nation for the armed forces.

My dear citizens: There is no obstacle we cannot overcome regardless of the time and place as long as we act hand in hand, shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart with the faith of Turkish nationalism, which is expressed in the maxim 'How happy is the person who says he is Turkish.' Joint efforts always yield prosperity and happiness.

This is why I am convinced that we will find in the near future definite solutions to our economic and social problems through the strength of our patriotic common sense.

The head of state noted that every Turk will always uphold the Ataturk ideology and ensure that his country and nation attain the goals designated by Ataturk. Pointing out that the country's horizons will be enlightened with the sun of the republic, and that stronger and happier republic days will continue to be the greatest days of the Turkish nation in unity, solidarity, freedom and independence, even concluded his message: The republic is a most beautiful, meaningful and sacred legacy, entrusted to us by Ataturk with the following words: To the new generation, the future is yours. We established the republic, but it is you who will uplift and continue it. The great leader Ataturk also entrusted us with the duty of protecting the republic by saying: To the Turkish youth, your first duty consists of protecting and defending the Turkish independence and republic for eternity. The strength you need exists in your noble blood. The noble Turkish youth, who is believed in and trusted by the entire Turkish nation, will continue this republic and uplift it for eternity. If necessary, the Turkish youth will not hesitate to shed its pure blood for this aim.

This country, this flag and this republic belong to us and they will remain ours for eternity. I am firmly convinced that our nation shares these feelings and thoughts. With this understanding and determination, it will gloriously and honorably perpetuate our republic on the path enlightened by the principles of Ataturk. In this conviction, I remember those who offered us this happy day—our martyrs with reverence and our courageous veterans with gratitude and especially the great Ataturk—and congratulate our citizens in Turkey and abroad and our kinsmen in Cyprus on the occasion of Republic Day and extend my wishes of health, success and happiness.

TURGUT OZAL ATTENDS OECD WORKING GROUP MEETING IN PARIS

TA261220 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal flew to Paris today to attend the OECD second working group meetings there. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport before his departure, Ozal said that during the 1-day meeting the present economic situation in Turkey would be analyzed. He said certain OECD experts had come to Turkey earlier and prepared a report and that this report would be discussed at the meeting. Noting that Turkey's economy was improving as envisaged in the [presumably government] program, Ozal said that he had learned that the experts' report was a favorable one.

Ozal stated that work on the tax bills was continuing. He stressed that very serious work was being conducted that would improve the condition of the lower-income groups and those on salary. He said that the majority of the news reports in connection with the tax bill being prepared were false. He expressed the belief that the tax law would be passed within 1 or 1 and 1/2 months. He said: I believe that with this law we will be able to reduce the tax burden in a very short time, possibly by March 1981, and not in 3 or 4 years as the press claims. Ozal added that a just system would be established concerning the taxes paid by those on salary. He said that the tax burden of the lower income groups and those on salary would be reduced to 35 to 40 percent of the present rate.

Answering a question, Turgut Ozal said the annual loss of labor hours in Turkey until 1980 was 1 million but that this rate reached 7.7 million by the end of August in 1980 due to the labor strikes.

Turgut Ozal is being accompanied to Paris by a delegation composed of Finance Ministry and State Planning Organization officials.

Interim Report on Meeting

TA272056 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 27 Oct 80

[Text] The OECD meeting held in Paris has ended. State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal, who attended the meeting of the OECD second working group today, told Turkish Radio and Television [TRT] that the OECD report on Turkey's economic situation was discussed at the meeting. Ozal pointed out that the report drawn up by OECD experts a short while ago was found to be favorable. He added that the representatives of the OECD countries, IMF and the World Bank said at the meeting that the economic support being extended to Turkey must be maintained. Ozal said that in his speech he gave information about the economic policies to be pursued by the new Turkish administration. Turgut Ozal will meet the French finance minister tomorrow. He is expected to return to Turkey on Wednesday.

REPORTS ON CONTINUING FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM, PUBLIC DISORDER

Illegal Organization Head Slain

TA231832 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Ali Ekber Acar, the person responsible for an illegal organization in the Esentepe quarter of Ankara, was today shot and killed as he was trying to escape from the security forces. According to information received by a TRT correspondent from Ankara martial law command officials, Acar was surrounded in Furel quarter at 1100 today. Acar, who tried to escape with the help of his relatives, failed to obey the security forces order to stop and was therefore shot. A false identity card was found in his possession. Four of Acar's relatives who tried to help him escape were captured.

Army Judge Escapes Attack

TA231824 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] Major Yilmaz Oscan, a judge at the Ankara Martial Law Command Third Military Court, was attacked by three armed terrorists near his home last night. Oscan was not wounded. According to information received by a TRT correspondent, three terrorists fired shots at Oscan as he was leaving his private car to enter his house at about 2100. Oscan, who was armed, chased the assailants but the terrorists escaped. In a search conducted at the scene of the incident, 17 spent round of various calibers were found.

Ankara Martial Law Command officials condemned the attack against Oscan. The assailants are being sought.

Directorate Collects Illegal Weapons

TA231740 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] The General Staff Martial Law Military Services Coordination Directorate has announced that 160,140 firearms—without permits—of various kinds and 541,468 rounds of ammunition of various types were relinquished to the authorities within the legal time limit granted for turning them in. The firearms were being held without permits.

According to the statement issued by the Directorate, 132,522 pistols, 2,474 machineguns, 23,560 infantry rifles, 615 automatic rifles, 364 shotguns and 623 rifles of various types were relinquished to military authorities, as designated by the Martial Law Commands, between 29 September—when the law on relinquishing firearms went into effect—and 17 October.

During the same period, 521,773 rounds of pistol ammunition of various types and 19,695 rounds of various other types of ammunition as well as 260 kg of demolition equipment, 2,768 kg of dynamite, 8,449 knives and other such instruments, 1,569 meters of time fuses, 2,110 kg of gunpowder, 18,470 electric fuses and 21 bombs of various kinds were also handed over to the relevant authorities.

The statement continued: The number of firearms and explosives relinquished clearly indicate the dangerous atmosphere we had been led into. The interest and understanding shown by our citizens in relinquishing the weapons displays, at the same time, trust in the administration. The interest and trust shown by the citizens are being respectfully evaluated as an indication of the Turkish nation's faith and loyalty in its state. On this occasion, the public is informed that it is important for the security of our nation and country that all citizens show the same sensitivity and inform and assist the relevant officials regarding the possession of arms and arms smugglers.

Directorate Reports Security Operations

TA231751 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Oct 80

[Text] The General Staff Martial Law Military Services Coordination Directorate has issued a statement on terrorists captured in armed clashes during operations conducted by security forces in various martial law areas between 17 and 23 October. The statement is as follows: One of the two terrorists who raided the Registry Office in Istanbul's Kadikoy quarter, a terrorist who is a leader of a clandestine organization in Ordu's Aybasti District, a militant belonging to a clandestine organization in the Cavusbasi Village in Ordu's Fatsa District and a terrorist wanted for various robberies and for three murders in the Adamlicile Village in Antalya's Gazipasa District were killed during armed clashes with security forces.

Eight terrorists—three of them wounded—were captured during the operation launched in order to seize Teslim Koc and his friends, who were wanted for the armed attack on the gendarme station in Derebucagi in Tunceli's Pertek District. Another terrorist belonging to a clandestine organization in the Balikcilar Village in Rize's Cendogdu District was also wounded and captured by security forces. In addition, 933 persons were detained during the same period for various reasons and of these 181 were arrested. The public is hereby informed.

Palestinian Guerrillas' Trial Resumes

TA241541 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1445 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 24 Oct (AA)—The retrial of four Palestinian guerrillas who raided the Egyptian Embassy in Ankara in July 1979 and killed two Turkish policemen in the process started in Ankara criminal court today, under strict security measures.

The four had earlier been convicted of murder and sentenced to death by a martial law court, but the verdict was overturned by the military court of cassation, which said they should have been tried by a civil court. The criminal court today decided to adjourn in order to ask the Ministry of Justice if it should go on with the trial of the defendants, who had already been tried by a military court.

Interior Ministry Reports Operations

TA241220 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Text] The security forces captured 357 persons, suspects being sought for various crimes, in operations they conducted throughout the country during the past week. During these operations, the security forces also found 265 weapons and a large quantity of explosives.

An announcement by the Press and Public Relations Department of the Interior Ministry says that among the 357 persons captured there are 6 armed robbery suspects, 31 murder suspects and 5 convicts who escaped from prisons. The explosives confiscated by the security forces include 13 dynamite sticks, 29 dynamite caps, 3 bombs and 243 fuses. The weapons include 229 pistols, 13 shotguns, 23 rifles, 17 knives and 13,604 cartridges.

Martial law command forces captured 167 persons belonging to four illegal organizations during operations conducted in 19 regions in Ankara during the past 10 days. Our correspondent has learned from Ankara Security Directorate officials that the captured militants killed Murvet Kalkac near Yenidogan Mosque last July, carried out armed attacks against the security forces and other persons and took care of 15 militants wounded in such activities. The captured militants also collected at gunpoint donations for their organizations, supplied weapons and explosives to their organizations, wounded 11 persons at various times, beat 20 persons, engaged in 11 armed clashes with the security forces, hung booby-trapped placards and posters, organized unauthorized demonstrations and distributed tracts. One automatic pistol, 34 pistols of various kinds and calibers, 2 mufflers, 2 handgrenades, 22 fuses, 37 ignition caps, 29 timed fuses, 4 dynamite sticks, 1 pair of binoculars and about 4,700 rounds of ammunition of various kinds were seized in searches carried out on the suspects and their homes. It is reported that among those captured, 3 are assistant physicians, 1 is a nurse, 1 is a teacher, 1 is an engineer, 4 are health workers, 22 are employees, 34 are workers, 43 are students, 50 are self-employed and 8 are unemployed.

NSC Ratifies Death Sentence

TA241623 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The National Security Council has ratified the death sentence given to Serdar Soyergin, accused of killing a worker in Adana on 14 September 1980 and of being involved in the killing of Tank Captain Bulent Angin. Soyergin's sentence was earlier ratified by the military high court.

Captain Angin was ambushed and killed in Adana on 14 September as he was trying to intervene in an armed clash between two rival leftist factions. In operations conducted after the incident Serdar Soyergin and Ayhan Canain were captured by the security forces. Suleyman Aydemir, who was involved in the same incident and who killed Captain Angin, escaped after the incident.

Terrorist Executed

TA260527 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 26 Oct 80

[Text] The VI Corps and Adana, Icel, Kahramanmaras, Gaziantep, Adiyaman and Hatay Martial Law Command has announced that the death sentence of Serdar Soyergin was carried out at 0300 today. The Press and Public Relations Department of the command made the following announcement:

This is an announcement by the Press and Public Relations Department of the VI Corps and Adana, Icel, Kharamanmaras, Gaziantep, Adiyaman and Hatay Martial Law Command. Serder Soyergin planned and carried out the murder of Erdogan Kolat during a fight between different political factions in the Istiklal quarter of Adana on 14 September 1980. On the same day, Soyergin also attempted to kill an official who was with Capt Bulent Angin, the commander of the military team that came to the scene of the incident. Soyergin was tried for these crimes by the Martial Law Command First Court and sentenced to death under article 450/4 of the Turkish penal code. The death sentence was approved by the Military Court of Appeals and subsequently by the National Security Council. After being published in the Official Gazette, Serdar Soyergin was executed at the Adana prison at 0300 on 26 October 1980. The public is hereby informed.

'INFORMAL TALKS' HELD BETWEEN KREISKY, BOLIVIA'S ZAMORA

[Special DIE PRESSE report by Gerhard Bitzen: "Informal Contacts of Vienna With Bolivian Countergovernment"]

[Text] Vienna--Jaime Paz Zamora, vice president of Bolivia's "National Unity Government" which, though constitutionally elected, is operating underground at present, at the end of last week held several informal talks in Vienna, within the framework of a diplomatic tour of West Europe. Among others, he talked with Chancellor Kreisky. Zamora informed those he talked with that the Bolivian military junta was completely isolated both in domestic and international politics. He appealed to the democratic forces in the world to continue humanitarian aid to Bolivia but to exercise restraint regarding state and private aid.

According to a chancellery source, the Bolivian guest was promised by Chancellor Kreisky that everything would be done to contribute to the restoration of democratic conditions in this country in the Andes. Austria is going to make endeavors to this end in international bodies and through bilateral contacts. Since Austria recognizes only states, the maintenance of diplomatic relations does not constitute any explicit recognition of the military junta, it was stressed. The visitor's talk with Heinz Fischer, floor leader of the Austrian Socialist Party in parliament, was purely an informal exchange of opinions. According to quarters close to Fischer, the "countergovernment" enjoys the support both of the Austrian Government and the Socialist Party.

The Democratic People's Union, UDP, a leftist-nationalist coalition, was victorious in the June elections in which it obtained nearly 40 percent of the vote. After the military putsch it went underground as the "National Unity Government."

BRIEFS

AMBASSADOR TO COLOMBIA--Dr Manfred Ortner has been appointed new Austrian ambassador to Colombia. The Colombian Government has approved the appointment. [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 25 Oct 80 p 2 AU]

EAST EUROPEAN DEBTS--At the end of 1979 the debts of East European countries at Austrian banks reached the all-time record mark of 45.3 billion schillings. At the end of 1974, these debts were only 8.1 billion schillings. Almost half of the total loans granted to East European countries went to Poland. The GDR's debts amount to 8 billion schillings, and those of Hungary 6.6 billion schillings. The debts of the CSSR, Romania and Bulgaria in Austria are relatively low. The commercial debts of East European countries with Austrian export companies are estimated at over 15 billion schillings. Thus the total debts of East European countries in Austria were more than 60 billion schillings. [Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 24 Oct 80 p 6 AU]

DRUG DEALERS--Austrian police have been very successful in their struggle against drug dealers recently. At Schwechat Airport, 20 kilos of marihuana were discovered in the possession of Adewui, a businessman from Lagos. He and an Austrian accomplice were arrested. A student from the Congo was arrested at Schwechat Airport when trying to smuggle into Austria 4.8 kilos of cannabis. In Lower Austria, police arrested drug smugglers and dealers, and investigations were launched against 30 persons. In Vorarlberg, a dealer ring with 35 members was smashed by police. In Salzburg, police arrested a heroin dealer at the main railroad station. [Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 25 Oct 80 p 9 AU]

DPA REPORTS GENSCHER DECEMBER VISIT TO CSSR 'LIKELY'

LD291729 Hamburg DPA in German 1610 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 29 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is likely to go to Prague in December for talks with the Czechoslovak Government, it was learned today from well-informed sources in Bonn. Genscher and CSSR Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek have repeatedly stressed their interest in high-level exchange visits to cultivate mutual relations. Genscher had originally intended to visit Czechoslovakia at the end of February. His visit was postponed at Prague's request, a request evidently due to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the resultant East-West crisis.

November has lately been mentioned as a possible date for the visit, but Genscher has a crowded schedule then, as he will attend the CSCE review conference in Madrid and will accompany Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on the chancellor's visit to the United States. That is why December is now thought likely. No official confirmation of the date is available.

GENSCHER CALLS FOR 'MAJOR MOVE' BY EAST IN MBFR TALKS

LD291736 Hamburg DPA in German 1650 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 29 Oct (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has reiterated the Federal Government's undiminished interest in continuation of the Vienna talks on the reduction of forces and in an early initial result. In a statement on the 7th anniversary of the opening of the talks on 30 October 1973, published by the Foreign Ministry in Bonn today, Genscher says there is a chance for a result if the East contributes a major move toward clarifying the discrepancies which still persist in regard to its armed forces.

The Federal Government does not underrate the difficulties of the negotiations aimed at lessening the dangers of a military confrontation and contributing to a more stable balance of forces by establishing parity in the numerical level of land forces in central Europe. Over the years it has been possible to align concepts on a number of points, but a comprehensive reply from the East is still outstanding on proposals for a simplified interim arrangement for American and Soviet force reductions and accompanying measures which the West introduced at the Federal Government's initiative in December 1979.

SPD'S WEHNER INTERVIEWED ON INTER-GERMAN RELATIONS

DW291215 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2000 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Reporter Reiser interview with SPD Bundestag faction Chairman Herbert Wehner in the feature "Panorama", place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Wehner, what is behind the recent GDR actions?

[Answer] This is a difficult question. At any rate the situation contains the commitment which the leading people in the GDR must, should and want to fulfill in the framework of the military pact to which they belong.

[Question] Could it be said that the situation in Poland plays a role?

[Answer] One could say that, but it does not really befit the Germans to constantly make statements about Poland, does it? Difficulties exist everywhere, not only in that part of the world but also in the part of the world we belong to. To the extent that these difficulties can be solved, it is the task of politicians not to constantly comment on these difficulties in speeches and not to make them the subject of polemics. That is my experience gathered from 31 years in parliament.

[Question] Was such a strain in inter-German relations predictable?

[Answer] It could not be ignored. It is a fact, if I may say so, that the German Democratic Republic belongs to the Warsaw Pact and the Federal Republic of Germany to NATO. Relations between these two military pacts or alliances naturally have consequences with regard to relations between the states existing in the divided German nation. That is the situation.

[Question] Has some potential for cooperation been overestimated?

[Answer] I do not know by whom; maybe by journalists, maybe by the people who know everything better. One thing is clear, however: Since Germany was divided and remained divided after World War II, and since both states in divided Germany belong to different military alliances, those wanting to help as much as possible must see to it that there is no special friction, difficulties or controversies. The controversies must be eliminated as much as possible for the benefit of the people living--sometimes in separated families--in divided Germany. It depends on the considerateness with which one tries to bring influence to bear on certain current events.

[Question] How does all that fit into Honecker's statement made at the last Leipzig Fair, where he said that he is most interested in a development of inter-German relations?

[Answer] I assume it does. It pertains to us as well. But we are not idle talkers; they over there are not and we over here cannot be idle talkers either. We must be interested in the possible, we must orientate ourselves, by what can be achieved. The more one talks and the more smart alecks talk, the more difficult it will be to repair the damage done.

[Question] Doesn't that mean that the recent GDR measures indicate a change of course?

[Answer] Begging your pardon, I have tried to explain the following: Both states in divided Germany are integrated in military alliances which are not only different but even are facing each other. Both states in divided Germany need the option of preventing the relationship between them--after all, they have entirely different regimes, different systems--from becoming worse again to the additional detriment of the people. Thus what matters is this: Where are contacts possible so as to continue some of what has been initiated? This concerns the people over there, this concerns us, and this also concerns the two great world powers.

[Question] Are there any options left for concretely improving the situation and for doing something beyond a mere understanding?

[Answer] That depends on the manner in which people over here are informed about options and necessities, information for which, pursuant to these options and necessities, alarm signals have been construed continuously. The measure taken by the responsible quarters in the German Democratic Republic with regard to visitors is a hard measure that is very painful to many families. It will have to be the objective of our efforts not to simply put it into some category by rejection or by reciprocal propaganda, but to try to put the relationship between the two states, which are affiliated with different alliances, into a tolerable arrangement again.

PRESS ASSESSES CARTER-REAGAN DEBATE, U.S. FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

DW301108 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 30 Oct 80

[Press review on debate between President Carter and Republican candidate Reagan]

[Text] SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG writes: It seems certain that Carter's cold, cutting and skilled way of dealing with the issue of the danger of nuclear war has made the voters aware of foreign policy problems.

Ronald Reagan has gained much new sympathy because of his tangibly greater human warmth and spontaneity. It is uncertain, however, whether he has won new voters. It is not very likely that this debate has changed the existing stalemate between the two applicants.

WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster maintains: What took place in front of about 85 million U.S. citizens and 1,000 journalists from all parts of the world demonstrated very clearly what misery the American voters will be facing next Tuesday. Of the radiant conqueror from Georgia only the smile remained--and even that was sometimes tired if not forced in front of the televised eye of the nation. With regard to positive aspects, the balance sheet of President Carter's 4 years in office can offer, if anything at all, the fact that he has learned to administer his office, although not to shape it.

RHEINZEITUNG of Koblenz notes: One can imagine after the television debate between Carter and Reagan how much the American electorate suffers from a choice of candidates who are not very representative of the U.S. world power. The debate showed Jimmy Carter as the winner. He showed more know-how with regard to political management than Reagan. The West had to pay for Carter's learning process with much strength and loss of prestige. Would Western Europe stand the Reagan risk without damage to the vitally necessary ties with America? Carter demonstrated prudence in foreign policy matters, although he does not get qualified advice from his native Georgia Mafia or from Brzezinski.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Commentary

[Commentary signed Me.: "Without a Man's Word"]

[Text] It is not as paradoxical as it sounds: The Islamic regime in Iran seems to have discovered a solution of striking simplicity--how to use the American hostages to manipulate the U.S. elections to the advantage of President Carter, and how to continue to blackmail him later on with them. It just has to release some of the unfortunate people prior to the election date for television purposes and keep the rest of them for later. It would as much serve Iranian foreign policy as it would help Tehran's domestic policy. It is entirely that simple. Khomeyni's son says it plainly now, while his father maintains a noble silence.

It is depressing that in the once proud American nation nobody dares stand up 6 days prior to the election date and call the disgraceful spectacle by its proper name. Not even Bush, the candidate for vice president, does it, who is viewed by many European election observers with more sympathy than Carter, Mondale and Reagan put together. Even Bush denies assiduously that the President is trying to increase his reelection chances by currying favor for the timely release of the hostages, although that is clearer than bright daylight. He states instead that this cannot be, because elections in the United States are always won or lost with economic issues.

The influence brought to bear by the Tehran regime on the elections is becoming more and more effective, if nobody dares say a man's word that this country, for the sake of its future, may not follow the will of faraway ayatollahs and mullahs, not even if 52 innocent citizens will be torn to pieces by scoundrels and murderers. In the meantime it is considered a democratic axiom everywhere that an election with a possibly narrow outcome can be won only with emotions, and that relevant television pictures, such as returning hostages, would be most effective emotionally. What is the difference between such an assumption about the voting of a politically educated populace in a country with an old parliamentary tradition and the smiled-at election activities of illiterates in black Africa or on the Indian subcontinent. The denaturation of the 1980 American presidential elections is the defeat not only of American democracy, but also of the whole Western democracy.

DIE WELT View

DW291022 Bonn DIE WELT in German 29 Oct 80 p 6

[Commentary signed Kem.: "Eloquent Silence"]

[Text] The superpower United States is laboring dangerously near the boundaries of its political credibility. While Washington courts the Iranian mullahs in the crescendo of hardly veiled offers and advances--and under the time pressure of the election date--the kidnappers cooly procrastinate the verdict on the conditions for the release of their prisoners. Ayatollah Khomeyni, whose say on the matter would be veritably weighed in gold right now, plays sphinx.

He poses riddles--one might think with gusto--of whether it is a good or bad sign that he omitted from his speech the topic of the hostages that has turned red hot. Or was it perhaps nothing but the ice-cold demonstration of the priority of problems, the defense against the suspicion that Iran wishes to make its warring fortune dependent on a "deal" with the American "devil"? People in this country should concede that it is not just the U.S. election campaign which attributes such grotesquely important dimensions to this game. The 52 Americans who have been suffering in hostage detention for a year vicariously for their country--and not only for the United States--weight heavily in the awareness of the nation, and never before was the opportunity to get them free so favorable objectively, or the price so attractive to their prison guards, as it is now under the auspices of the U.S. presidential elections. Anyone watching from a Machiavellian distance the painful and risky bows of the giant to the dwarf should be aware of this.

GOVERNMENT VIEWS POSSIBLE DEVALUATION OF MARK AS 'UNREALISTIC'

LD291546 Hamburg DPA in German 1436 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] Bonn, 29 Oct (DPA)--The Federal Government regrets, in the words of Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald, "the talk" about a devaluation of the Deutsche mark, which at the present time is one of the weak currencies within the EMS [European Monetary System].

Gruenewald said today in connection with the cabinet discussion on the autumn forecast by the economic research institutes that a devaluation of the mark would be "unrealistic" and on top of it talk about it "unnecessary and harmful."

Gruenewald continued that the cabinet had stressed the view of the research institutes that after a decline in the economy in the first half of 1981 an upward movement could be expected in the second half of the year. There was concern that the opportunity for an upswing "is possibly systematically being talked into the ground" by the public discussion.

In accordance with the stipulations of the stability law the Federal Government will submit its economic data in the annual economic report at the beginning of 1981.

MINE WARFARE TASK FORCE FOR INDIAN OCEAN FORMED

LD291349 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Oct 80 p 10

[Unattributed report: "France Forms Mine Warfare Task Force for Indian Ocean"]

[Text] The national navy is at present setting up a small homogeneous mine warfare task force from its ships based at Toulon and Cherbourg with a view to a possible mission in the Indian Ocean.

Two Toulon-based minehunters and two Cherbourg-based ocean minesweepers have been placed on standby this Tuesday, 28 October, to join a mine detection and neutralization force which will also comprise an escort and support ship responsible for coordinating operations if by chance action were needed to clear the Strait of Hormuz of mines.

Officially this move to place minehunters and minesweepers on alert was presented this Tuesday, 28 October, as an overall exercise and no details have yet been given on this force's destination. The Cherbourg ocean minesweepers (500 tons full load) are capable of detecting and destroying mines at depths of 60 meters thanks to a remote-controlled device which lays its explosive charge near the target to be neutralized. The Toulon minehunters (780 tons full load) are old U.S. ocean sweepers which were modernized after 1976.

On several occasions during the Iranian-Iraqi conflict the warring sides have threatened to mine the Strait of Hormuz through which 60 percent of the Gulf oil destined for Europe now passes.

In the past France was called upon to intervene to clear mines from the Suez Canal following the 1973 Israeli-Arab war.

Technical Consultations Among General Staffs

Increased Western naval activity can now be observed in the Indian Ocean as well as an intensification in technical consultations among French, U.S., British and Australian general staffs whose ships are in the area. France, for its part, has sent four battleships to the Gulf of Oman in the northern hemisphere of the Indian Ocean and the guided missile destroyer Suffren is preparing to join them. At the end of the month the Amiral Charner, a corvette, is also due to go to the Indian Ocean.

ENVOY CONVEYS GISCARD MESSAGE TO IRAQI LEADERS

LD291325 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Oct 80 p 42

[Text] Jacques Morizet, Giscard d'Estaing's special envoy, was received Monday, 27 October by [Iraqi] President Saddam Husayn to whom he handed a message from the president of the republic. His visit lasted 24 hours. Mr Morizet returned to Paris this Tuesday, 28 October.

The choice of the messenger indicates that the French Government attaches special importance to this message. Indeed, Mr Morizet has been representing France in Rabat since last February and it is unusual for an ambassador to be summoned and entrusted with a mission to a government other than the one to which he is accredited. However, Mr Morizet was previously ambassador to Baghdad from 1975 to 1980.

According to the Iraqi agency INA, Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq 'Aziz (who visited Paris for talks with Giscard d'Estaing on 25 September, immediately after the Iraqi-Iranian conflict broke out), Foreign Minister Hammadi and French Ambassador Rocalve were present at the meeting with Mr Morizet.

FRANCOIS-PONCET URGES NO INTERFERENCE IN POLISH EVENTS

LD291319 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Oct 80 p 6

[Text] Speaking on the French Television Channel 2 current affairs program on Monday, 27 October, Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet stressed that it is up to the Polish people themselves to solve their problems and that other possibilities should not be discussed. "Do not let us lightly envisage foreign interventions which, of course, would be unacceptable," he said. "The Poles," he added, "in the Gdansk agreement drew up their own Polish solution which reconciles the existing different concerns. What is now needed is for that agreement to be implemented in the spirit in which it was reached. For heaven's sake don't let's interfere." "Everybody," Mr Francois-Poncet also said, "is aware of the consequences and considerable risks for East-West relations if this peaceful political Polish process were unable to be freely expressed, whatever difficulties and ups and downs there might be."

LE FIGARO ASSESSES CARTER ADMINISTRATION FOREIGN POLICY RECORD

LD291049 Paris LE FIGARO in French 27 Oct 80 pp 1,5

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Carter's Record"]

[Text] U.S. policy in the past 4 years has frequently been strongly criticized in Europe, and particularly in France, to the extent that it has become fashionable--but also in bad taste--to deride President Carter as a person. Indeed the judgments which many French people usually pass on the United States above all reflect their passions, their prejudices and their fears: Some merely regard the United States as the sanctuary of the bloodiest imperialism and the most brutal capitalism and others cannot conceive of security aside from under the U.S. wing and do not want to annoy the Americans at any price or even criticize them for fear of offending them in the least. Paradoxically it is among the latter that we have found those most strongly contemptuous of the Carter administration; it is probable that, since they want a protector, they want him to be as tough as possible....

Nonetheless, on the eve of the presidential elections it is possible to make an assessment. Indeed from a distance it is easier to distinguish the results attained and the defeats suffered.

Probably the most important thing is the success achieved in Asia. Not only has President Carter succeeded in overcoming the obstacle posed by Taiwan's status and restored normal diplomatic relations between Beijing and Washington, but the United States is already the PRC's preferred interlocutor.

The areas of convergence between the two countries have already found a field of application: On the Kampuchean border the Thai Army, advised and equipped by the United States, is providing rear bases and logistics for the Khmer Rouge guerrillas who are maintained directly by Beijing. This policy which, despite rather hypocritical denials, consists as far as the United States is concerned in giving practical aid--including maintaining them at the United Nations--to those responsible for one of the biggest massacres in recent history is certainly rather frighteningly cynical. (We should welcome the fact that the French Government has at least refused to support the presence of Khmer Rouge representatives at the United Nations even if we could have hoped for an even clearer stance.) However, the fact is that Washington has regained means of taking action in Asia which had seemed lost after the defeat in Vietnam.

In addition China has normalized its relations with Japan and signed a treaty with that country. Since Japan has for 30 years been an esteemed U.S. ally in the Far East it is in fact a kind of triple Washington-Tokyo-Beijing alliance which has been formed.

The Carter administration is proud to have attained this unprecedented result when in the past periods of rapprochement with China and Japan have alternated and never coincided.

In the long term that may appear to be the essential thing. However, in the short term this success has been countered by two failures. The failures suffered in Africa (in Angola and Ethiopia) have to some extent been balanced by successes (in Somalia, Zimbabwe, and Egypt).

However spectacular the U.S. defeat in Iran was, it may not be final. Whatever the results of the negotiations going on to secure the release of the Tehran hostages it is now known that, while we will naturally never see a regime in Iran comparable to that of the shah, the United States could well restore normal and even close relations with that country; the present Iranian regime's fierce anti-Sovietism has in any case limited the international consequences of the revolution from which it stems.

Indeed while the essence of U.S. policy in the past 4 years is in Asia, its negative record is in the Middle East. Originally the Carter administration wanted to mobilize all its partners to gradually bring Israel to negotiations with the joint Vance-Gromyko declaration on 4 November 1977 as the most important sign of this. However, in choosing to give exclusive support to the process started by President as-Sadat in Jerusalem a few weeks later, it achieved the opposite results to what it was seeking. The separate peace between Egypt and Israel gave Israel the certainty of no longer having to fear a general war since its main adversary was out of the game which enabled it to further strengthen its hold on the occupied territories. The Arab world fell apart politically and that was enough to give the Soviet Union the opportunity to regain a foothold in the region. The isolation of Syria, which was deprived of allies and stood alone confronting Israel, led it to seek an alliance with Moscow. The Lebanese crisis, which as everybody knows is merely a result of the Israeli-Arab conflict, has continued and will probably undergo new developments....

The Middle East has remained the world's most explosive region while it has a decisive economic and strategic importance. As has been seen, each crisis has direct effects on the industrialized countries' oil supplies. The United States, known for its exclusive support for Israel was for that reason unable to exploit the passionate hostility which almost all Islamic countries felt toward the Soviet Union after it intervened in Afghanistan. Today, therefore, after the foreseeable failure of the "psychological" and economic sanctions which Washington decided to impose, very little remains of the vast reaction sparked off by that intervention.

It is now being said that the reelection of the outgoing President would ensure for the American Near East policy a freedom of action which it now lacks, since Mr Carter would not be eligible again. We will see what happens but it is clear in any case that indeed it is here that the epicenter of the earthquakes which threaten the world balance from the Mediterranean to the Indian Ocean is situated.

Giving the lie to premature analyses of its weakness or passiveness, the United States has after all reacted to the difficulties which it has encountered in the region by a comeback in force. President Carter has decided that not only air and naval but also ground units are to be present in the Middle East as a result of agreements concluded with Egypt, Oman and Somalia. It is the first time since the Vietnam War that America has undertaken to be militarily present abroad, in a place where it was not present before, even though it would have to intervene militarily if necessary. In fact, it runs the risk of being unavoidably involved in the fate of the regimes which have granted it bases.

On 1 January 1980, President Carter told Congress: "We must be ready to pay any price to ensure that we remain the most powerful nation in the world." And candidate Ronald Reagan has not said anything else. This means that both men are determined to preserve what can rightly be called American hegemony.

There can be no doubt that the race for power and the arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union will continue whether they are rationalized and moderated by such accords as the SALT II agreement or not. However, the obstacle against which American policy will come up against will perhaps be a result not so much of this rivalry--which, if necessary, can be compatible with a certain complicity--as of a revolt by peoples who are no longer willing to accept a situation in which U.S. political, economic, financial and military preponderance continues to be exerted against them. This is what the events which have taken place from Central America to Asia Minor have show in various--sometimes democratic, sometimes disastrous--ways. It was a long and hard ordeal for European colonial powers to accept the fact that decolonization was necessary. Some day America will have to accept a similar reconversion. It is not certain that it is prepared for it.

LE MONDE CITES POLL ON MITTERRAND, ROCARD CANDIDACIES

LD291313 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Oct 80 p 42

[Text] An opinion poll carried out Monday, 27 October, by Public S.A. on a representative sample of 1,030 people and published Tuesday, 28 October in LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS reveals that 70 percent of those questioned think that Mitterrand will be a candidate in the 1981 election. Asked "does Francois Mitterrand have a statesman's stature?" 52 percent replied yes and 28 percent no. Some 54 percent think that Mr Mitterrand is right to leave his decision in the hands of PS members, compared with 26 percent who do not. Finally, 50 percent think that if Mr Mitterrand runs as a PS candidate Mr Rocard will not withdraw his candidacy, compared with 34 percent who think he will.

PARIS PCF OFFICIAL BACKS COUNCILLORS' STAND ON CAMPAIGN

LD281709 Paris LE MONDE in French 22 Oct 80 p 46

[Unattributed report: "PCF Federal Bureau Divided"]

[Text] PCF Paris Federation Bureau member Eddy Kenig made a statement Tuesday, 21 October, indicating his stance on the bureau's condemnation of the five Paris councillors--including former federation First Secretary Henri Fiszbin--who had stated that they feel "released from the obligation to personally join the presidential election battle."

"As I explained at the federal bureau meeting on 20 October," Mr Kenig stated, "I cannot allow people to believe by my silence that I am associated in the decision taken by a majority of the federal bureau condemning the five Paris councillors' statement on the PCF presidential election campaign. Indeed I share the opinion that the lines adopted in this sphere without any really thorough democratic debate abandon the fundamental options adopted at the last congresses. This means that all Communists cannot be personally committed to the election campaign."

FORLANI GOVERNMENT WINS CONFIDENCE VOTE IN SENATE

LD300006 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] The Forlani Government has won the confidence vote in the Senate and is now fully operational having already received a favorable vote in the Chamber. The Christian Democrats, Socialists, Republicans, Social Democrats, representatives of the Volkspartei [South Tyrol People's Party] and the Union Valdotaine voted for; Communists, independent left, MSI [Italian Social Movement-National Right] and Radicals voted against. The Liberals abstained. There were 188 votes for and (?120) against.

In his reply, Prime Minister Forlani dwelt mainly on economic policy, the problems arising from the polemics on abortion, and points of foreign policy, announcing that Foreign Minister Colombo would shortly go to Moscow. Forlani also spoke of terrorism and the murder of Moro which, he said, was intended to strike against the highest element of unifying mediation within the Christian Democrat Party and the constitutional forces. As for economic difficulties, Forlani reiterated the need to struggle against the internal causes of inflation while striving to avert the external ones and to restore competitiveness to business, partly by spreading the burden of social expenditure through general taxation. On Colombo's visit to the Soviet Union Forlani remarked that it would provide useful opportunity to study further the prospects of resuming the East-West dialogue.

After Forlani's speech, the representatives of the parties confirmed in their speeches explaining their vote the alignments which had emerged in the Chamber of Deputies.

L'UNITA REPORTS BERLINGUER 23 OCTOBER LOWER HOUSE SPEECH

LD291303 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 24 Oct 80 pp 1, 6

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer's 23 October speech to the lower house: "We Will Struggle From Opposition To Ensure That the Country Has a New and Strong Political Leadership"]

[Excerpts] The main event in yesterday's lower house confidence debate on the new government was the PCI secretary general's speech. The new government headed by Deputy Forlani, Berlinguer said, is certainly not the government which Italy needs to surmount the crisis assailing it in all fields, to set itself back on its feet and to regenerate itself. This is why we Communists will be in opposition and will continue to work and struggle from the opposition benches to ensure that our country can have a political leadership equal to the vast problems that it has to resolve, that is, a unitary government including the parties of the workers movement and Italy's other major popular forces. The political crisis afflicting Italy for the past decade has not yet reached this solution, which is the only one that can guarantee stability and certainties. Our opposition to the present government will always be adapted to its approaches and above all its specific actions. Our yeas and nays will be clear ones. We will assess its conduct step by step. Therefore:

1--We are ready to make our own contribution to positively resolving the pressing issues and fundamental problems of our society and state and to establish what kinds of dialogue and understanding will be possible to this end;
2--Though well aware that, as in the past, there will be no lack of maneuvers and bids to postpone or avoid resolving the problems, we will fight to ensure that Parliament and the government tackle them and reach a decision with the promptness demanded by the country's situation;
3--We will most steadfastly oppose any options, measures or conduct on the part of the government which we consider contrary to the workers' and people's interests and damaging to public morality.

Next Berlinguer pointed out that the ranks of the government coalition parties now acknowledge that in order to resolve the country's problems and to guarantee its real governability it is necessary to establish a correct relationship between government and Parliament--between majority and opposition--and in particular to seek dialogue and understanding with the Communist opposition, which represents such a broad and vigorous section of society--the one which most wants and seeks its regeneration.

We acknowledge these intentions, but we also say to you: Take care not to follow the regressive path which led the previous government to commit increasingly serious errors, which destroyed its parliamentary majority and which made it collapse.

PSI's Conduct Poses Fundamental Question

Next Berlinguer examined what happened during the crisis. Some complex and contradictory aspects regarding the parties and their relations emerged, and it is worth examining them for a moment. Within the DC--partly as a result of increasing pressure from the minority to establish positive relations with the PCI and partly as a result of a more widespread anxiety over the demands for more and more positions of power which the PSI was making in exchange for the alliance which it established with the preamble group--a rapproachment gradually took place between the congress majority and minority.

This process within the DC, whose outcome is still uncertain, embodies several ambiguous aspects as it now appears; because, while on the one hand it seems to be bringing about an attenuation of the anticommunist extremes which prevailed at the congress, on the other hand there seems to be no adequate awareness emerging within the DC of the changes in political approaches and power-handling methods that must be carried out to create truly positive relations with the PCI--naturally without any kind of special preference, which we are not seeking and do not consider opportune.

The Social Democratic Party [PSDI], mindful of the fact that its open hostility toward the PCI was the reasons for its exclusion from the previous government and that it initially presented that government as more leftwing than it was and than events proved it to be, has changed its attitude toward the issue of relations with the PCI. This is one of the things which opened its way to membership of the present government.

It must be said of the PRI that we fail to understand its conduct during the final phase of the three-party government and during the crisis.

As for the PSI, faced with the government's downfall and the subsequent political developments, the PSI majority, Comrade Berlinguer stressed, carried out two operations. On the external plane it formed a pact with the PSDI and at the same time began forging links with the Radical Party, so that the PSI's "centrality" was diluted into a much wider socialist and radical secular area. This doubtless increases the bargaining power of the parties of this area with respect to the DC. But the rivalry taking place within the traditional power system is also being exacerbated. Furthermore, rivalry with the DC is taking place within a political framework which excludes the workers movement's fundamental force from the government. This implies abandonment of the sphere of the real challenge which must be issued and through which pressure must be brought to bear on the DC to make a commitment--the sphere of resolving the major national problems, involving among other things the regeneration of the attitude to, and methods of, government that have hitherto been the rule.

Within the PSI, its majority thought it could resolve the political problems posed by the leftwing currents by reducing their representation on the Directorate, excluding them from executive and organizational positions and refusing to allow their representatives into the government.

These two operations carried out by the PSI majority pose a fundamental question concerning the attitude to politics that now seems to prevail within the PSI. Of course, political activity essentially implies taking account of the balance of forces and acting to try to change it in one's own favor; but in this instance the balance of forces was regarded above all as the problem of how to expand one's own positions of power, and not as how to organize the masses' initiative and how to secure their consensus with a plan for regeneration.

In addition, the two operations which I have mentioned, he added, pose a politically more pressing question, namely, is the PSI now progressively losing the characteristics and position which have always made it an essential component of the Italian workers' movement as a whole. Clearly our party's wish is that such a danger will be avoided, because we are aware that the strength of an understanding among the leftwing forces, especially the Communists and Socialists, is a linchpin of any progressive alignment and policy.

Having repeated that the new government headed by Deputy Forlani is certainly not the government that Italy needs and that this is why the Communists have decided to remain in opposition, the PCI secretary general added: It must be said, however, that this is not a straightforward repetition of the previous government. It had a different conception. Furthermore, as I said at the beginning, there is a broad awareness in its component parties that the solution of the problem of real governability demands not only the desire but also the ability to establish positive relations with the PCI.

At the same time, we are already beginning to see the difficulties which hinder the government efforts to surmount outdated political approaches and practices and to begin an open and really fruitful dialogue with us. Good intentions have already come up against the persistance of old restrictions and stipulations.

This can be seen in the government's structure and composition. We suggested a reduction in the number of ministers and under secretaries by abolishing posts invented solely to achieve a balanced representation of the parties and their internal currents, especially for the DC. This has not been done. The proportions laid down in the Cencelli manual [allusion unknown] have once again been observed down to the last decimal point. Some allocations of ministries and under secretaryships and some exclusions (such as Deputy Pandolfi and Professor Giannini) were not based so much on criteria of competence and experience, as of taking into account the electoral and patronal strength of the individuals chosen or removed. In fact, once again you have been forced to keep in the government men and methods of whom and of which the country is tired and now rejects.

As far as the program is concerned, it contains some acceptable and even correct proposals, along with others, however, which are vague or even contradictory and negative. Some commitments have been made, but allow me to point out that these regularly appear in every government's exposition of policy because they have not been met for years and in some case then--such as the reform of the prime minister's office--for decades.

Some Questions on Foreign Policy

However, I will not dwell on an analytical assessment of your exposition, Deputy Forlani, Berlinguer said, pointing out that there will be no lack of opportunities--and some will be taken in this very forum--for we in opposition and you in government to compare our views. We repeat once again that the important considerations for us will be not words but deeds, the specific conduct of the government and its individual ministers.

Deeds in relation to what? In relation to the major problems faced by Italy in the world situation and in the status of our society. International relations are reaching a point of very serious danger to peace, as shown by the extension of conflicts, above all the increasingly destructive conflict that has now been under way for a month between Iraq and Iran; the unchecked arms race; and the exacerbation of North-South tensions resulting from the inability of the industrialized countries to address the disparity in development and living conditions between these two areas of the world and to start resolving it under the banner of peaceful cooperation.

Deputy Forlani discussed these and other problems of international life. The tone which he used was prudent and balanced, on the whole, with insistent invocations of the need to facilitate detente. Some specific points are worthy of approval--for instance, the backing for the initiative of an all-Europe disarmament conference and the appeal to the U.S. Congress to ratify the SALT II treaty.

Other points require elucidation. First, I would like to ask whether it is true that during the 14-16 September visit to Italy by a high-ranking Iraqi Government representative Italy was informed that Iraq was preparing to begin a conflict with Iran and that nevertheless our government honored its commitment to provide Iraq with further military supplies. If this is the case, it was a grave decision. But we would also like to know if Italy is now working in any way to facilitate a cessation of the conflict and has any opportunity to do so or whether, as I believe Deputy Forlani said, the entire matter is being delegated to an EC appeal to the Islamic Conference.

With regard to the issue raised by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, on which we have clearly passed judgement several times, I would like to know the government's opinion regarding a proposal--which I consider one of the most realistic--put forward by Pakistan in August. I have failed fully to understand the government's exact position on the Arab-Israeli issue. Deputy Forlani has repeated the innovations and differences with respect to the U.S. stance contained in the declaration made by the European Council in Venice in June. But what is the significance of invoking the hope that others will adhere to the Camp David agreements to "hope for further prospects." It will be admitted that these are unclear formulations and very vague proposals, especially if one considers that on the road to the Camp David agreements the grave decision on Jerusalem was not avoided and that it has been shown that it does not resolve the principal problem, which concerns not only Palestinians' self-determination but also their right to their own state within the framework of a peaceful order throughout the region that will guarantee the security of the State of Israel too. Has the time not come for Italy to take a step forward in this direction?

Next Berlinguer made a more general observation. It seems to me, he said, that the whole of Deputy Forlani's exposition of foreign policy lacked the impetus, vigor and spirit of determination that should inspire the government of a major country such as Italy which can and therefore must fulfill its important role in prompting initiatives of peace, detente and disarmament in Europe and other areas of the world.

We agree with Deputy Forlani's statement that the preservation of peace depends above all on a resumption of trust and cooperation between the two foremost powers--the United States and the USSR. But this does not diminish other countries' responsibility and role, especially now, in a phase when the state of relations between the two major states is characterized by exacerbated tension and rivalry.

This is the aim of the action taken by, for instance, the FRG Government, with Chancellor Schmidt's meeting with President Brezhnev, whose results were judged helpful by everyone, including the United States and the USSR. Why does Italy never take initiatives of this kind? What do Italian Governments lack? In my opinion, they lack the habit of an autonomous and farsighted view of world affairs.

The Country Has Great Energies That Are Not Being Used

It is not true--as Schmidt has shown--that this capacity for initiative conflicts with membership of the Atlantic alliance, NATO and the EEC. This is not where we differ from you. We would point out, however, that in your formulations the EEC seems to be regarded as an offshoot of the Atlantic pact, whereas it is an institution in its own right which can and must have its own initiative in the world context, partly because it represents a unique political and cultural reality. I would also like to point out that it is not right and often leads to inertia to make the initiative of each individual EEC member country subject to prior and preliminary approval by all the other member countries.

PSI'S MANCINI CRITICIZES BERLINGUER'S LOWER HOUSE SPEECH

[Unattributed report: "Statement from Comrade Mancini: PCI Secretary General Is Splitting the Left"]

[Text] [PSI Directorate member] Comrade Mancini has released the following statement on the PCI secretary general's speech in the lower house yesterday:

"Berlinguer's speech unfortunately confirms a tendency to accentuate the motives for disagreement on the left, with a blurring of the PCI's 'historical memory,' from which one really wishes there had not disappeared the realization that such an attitude has always benefited only the enemies of the left. A favor is being done to the hegemony of the DC, whose role is being enhanced by Berlinguer's criticism of the Socialists and other government parties. Interference in the PSI's affairs is an old method which, apart from being arbitrary and unacceptable, threatens to paralyze the internal debate. But one might almost assume that Berlinguer wants to hinder the debate within his party. The Socialists might have made some mistakes, but these in no way justify the error being committed by those who want to maintain a state of conflict based on the two leftwing parties' different positions in Parliament, which other communists do not consider preclusive of the quest for a unitary line. Repercussions and responses are inevitable. But the left's political problem is still how to reason calmly and responsibly to surmount the elements of division; and whoever believes that the left must create troubles not for itself but for others must work to this end with patience and tenacity equal to those manifested (though in the opposite direction) by the people who seem unaware of this need."

SPANISH CHIEF OF STAFF HOLDS TALKS IN LISBON

[Unattributed report: "Strengthen Iberian Military Cooperation"]

[Text] Spanish Army Chief of Staff General Gabeiras Montero stated at a press conference in Lisbon yesterday that Iberian military cooperation "has been intensified recently but will have to be strengthened for us to fight together if necessary."

General Gabeiras Montero is in Lisbon to renew contacts with the Portuguese Army. Previously, between 1962 and 1968, he took part regularly in conferences of the peninsular general staffs. This time, he met with the general staff and units of the Portuguese Army, with Defense Minister Amaro da Costa and with President Ramalho Eanes, in his capacity as commander in chief of the Portuguese Armed Forces.

With respect to the contents of the talks, he said that "they were not based specifically on the principal issues of the current international situation, although concern was expressed by both sides at the critical evolution of the world situation."

General Gabeiras Montero emphasized the need for "unity" against "peripheral advances," which are threatening world political stability. NATO would welcome Spain's entry into the alliance "with open arms," Gabeiras Montero also stated.

EANES SPEAKS ON THREATS TO EUROPEAN CIVILIZATION

[Unattributed report: "Slow Suffocation of Europe Could Cease To Be Theoretical"]

[Text] During the dinner which he held at the Sao Julioo da Barra Fortress yesterday for NATO Military Committee Chairman Adm Robert Falls, the president of the republic stated that the events of the last few years and the experience gained in attempts at negotiations "demonstrate that the unfavorable scenario for the Western bloc of a slow suffocation of Europe could cease to be a theoretical hypothesis and become a real possibility which we will have to accept."

Ramalho Eanes began his speech by referring to Admiral Falls' predecessor, General Gundersen, recalling the tribute which he paid to him in February for his understanding of our problems and the efforts which he had made to activate multilateral cooperation plans for securing resources.

After mentioning the work which is being carried out by the present NATO military committee chairman to the same end, Eanes said that this activity is for Portugal "the guarantee that cooperation between the Portuguese Armed Forces and NATO will continue to be intensified," and that appropriate solutions for full implementation of the plans which have been formulated will be found.

General Ramalho Eanes recalled some of the guidelines on which Portugal's membership of the Atlantic alliance is based and which he had set out for Admiral Falls' predecessor: "On the one hand, our presence in NATO, our determination to cooperate in the joint effort to defend the values which constitute the cultural matrix of Europe and North America and our constant solidarity with our allies, are not subject to doubts of any kind.

"On the other hand, the set of problems to which I referred at that time have not changed, but rather have deteriorated in almost all their manifestations, increasing the gravity of the challenge confronting the Western community as a whole, and Europe very particularly."

Entering into details, Eanes stressed: "Very particularly, the ability to ensure the maintenance of the geopolitical balances has been called into question.

"As a result of all this, it is clear that the integrated defense of Europe requires that measures be adopted to define joint stances in many fields--not only the military field--and that a real leadership function within the Atlantic alliance be ensured.

"In fact the conditions of economic defense and of real political solidarity could soon prove to be as urgent and as important as military determination, since the latter cannot be guaranteed unless there is real determination in our societies to defend freedom, democracy and the cultural values which define our civilization."

PS SECRETARIAT COMMUNIQUE ON TALKS WITH SOARES, EANES

LD300228 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0001 GMT 20 Oct 80

[Excerpt] The national secretariat of the Socialist Party [PS] has issued a communique reiterating that it is in full exercise of its functions and that it deems it indispensable to continue the dialogue with the party's self-suspended secretary general, Mario Soares. The PS national secretariat voices on the other hand its gratification at the results of its talks with President Ramalho Eanes, from whose reelection bid Mario Soares withdrew his personal support on 18 October.

Salgado Zenha, Antonio Arnaut and Vitor Constancio have been appointed by the national secretariat to the political committee for Eanes' candidacy. The three Socialist leaders have met with Ramalho Eanes who assured them that he will defend the democratic and constitutional rules, stop any attempts to change the electoral law likely to block the principle of alternation in power, will not accept the referendum as a means to revise the constitution and ensure that the rights of the democratic opposition will not be curbed.

EANES REJECTS CONSTITUTIONAL REVISION BY REFERENDUM

[Unattributed report on Portuguese President Ramalho Eanes interview with JORNAL DE NOTICIAS: "Recourse to Referendum Is Unacceptable and Dangerous"]

[Text] "I consider democratically unacceptable and politically dangerous a revision of the constitution where recourse to the referendum is aimed at altering the rules regarding a revision, which require a two-thirds majority, as laid down by the Constitution." This opinion was expressed by the president of the republic in an interview granted to JORNAL DE NOTICIAS, in which Ramalho Eanes says, among other things, that he is linked to Mario Soares by "the bond of thorough commitment to the institutionalization of democracy in Portugal."

In the president of republic's opinion, such a bond should be sufficient "to elucidate everything in what was an unpleasant incident which will be resolved and clarified within the framework of the open and frank conduct to which democrats are accustomed.

"This incident," Ramalho Eanes continues," "shows the nature of lucidity in democracy, the comparison of opinions, the clear affirmation of divergencies, even when they might be based on unnecessary misunderstandings."

In the president's opinion, the evolution of events will show that "the foundations for understanding among democrats are still much stronger than anything that might divide them at any time."

These observations about relations with the Socialist Party secretary general came at the end of a lengthy interview published by JORNAL DE NOTICIAS today, in which Ramalho Eanes states, in connection with the controversial issue of a referendum on the revision of the Constitution:

"It will soon become apparent that the long debate on the revision of the Constitution has been no more than a mere instrument in a strategy for gaining power....

"I have always believed that the referendum was another false issue that was being used to try and divert public opinion from the real issues and to make it receptive to an erroneous and damaging idea of what a majority means in a democracy," the president of the republic continued, adding that a referendum is "acceptable, since it is provided for in the Constitution and duly governed by regulations as a democratic method for consulting public opinion on points of general policy.

"But it is futile," he added, "to presume to hold a referendum on a document as complex as a constitution, which requires society's consensus more than any other."

Eanes pointed out, "as a warning," that a referendum was held on the 1933 Constitution and promised to return to the issue of the referendum soon.

"My Model of Society Is West European"

Asked to comment on some of his previous statements at a 14 October press conference, Ramalho Eanes rejected the opinion that it was "disastrous and unfavorable." He said that this opinion "is influenced by certain political commentaries but is not based on the facts.

"I defined no new political stance at that press conference. On the contrary," he asserted, "I stood by what I have always said but which, perhaps under the influence of persistent and distorted propaganda, has been insufficiently understood."

Clarifying the meaning of his remarks concerning the model of society which he envisages, the president of the republic declared: "I defend and direct my political activity on the basis of a West European model of society, as do most Portuguese parties.... I distinguish democratic models of society from ones that are not and I identify with people who respect the democratic model of society. But if the concept were extended to include precise ideas about socioeconomic organization, obviously I could never identify with the model of society proposed by the Democratic Alliance."

Next he repeated his disagreement with those who, "while calling themselves the advocates of a democratic model of society, reveal their perverseness through an incorrect use of the power of majorities, thus manifesting their intention to alter the electoral law so as to impede democratic rotation, who seek and advocate an attitude to government based on political solidarity among the various state bodies and who carry out systematic activities of 'supervision' with respect to the media."

During the interview the president gives a kind of brief stocktaking of his term in office and discusses topics including church-state relations, foreign policy, the armed forces' role, autonomy and decentralization. He describes himself as "a 25 April [1974 Portuguese revolution] and 25 November [1975 abortive leftwing coup which Eanes helped foil] man," advocates a rapproachement between "social democratic and democratic socialist representatives" and declares that his candidacy for reelection reflects "the need to defend the democratic system."

"Any doubts which there might have been in this regard were dispelled when the name of the Democratic Alliance leaders' candidate was announced," he said.

ECONOMY MINISTER DEFENDS GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC MEASURES

LD291607 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 24 Oct 80 p 39

[Albert Bassols interview in Luenos Aires with Spanish Minister of the Economy and Commerce Juan Antonio Garcia Diez: "Garcia Diez: A Complete Minister" --interview date not specified]

[Excerpts] [Question] Following the government's economic statement and the debate to which it gave rise, it seems that there is not sufficient rapidity in introducing that set of proposals....

[Answer] Look, the government has been in existence for 7 weeks, and during that time we have had events as important as the confidence motion and the submitting of the state budgets, which will soon come under debate. But I can also tell you that important actions have been implemented in the economic field, such as the approval of a set of measures with respect to freedom of prices and the publication in the official gazette of decrees reorganizing two sectors in a state of crisis and a decree on freedom to set up industries. All this represents a vigorous pace of activity in the economic field.

[Question] Many people are worried by that measure concerning the liberalization of some prices. How can this be compatible with maintaining a reasonable inflation rate? [Question ends]

The minister was expecting the question, since a certain conflict of aims could be assumed in principle. For this reason, his reply was lengthy and documented and also linked with a whole set of parallel measures.

[Answer] "I will tell you immediately that what has been done has been to adjust ourselves further to a market economy without interference. We have reduced controls over very varied items. For instance, the liberalization ranges from coffee to sheet glass and from beer to titanium dioxide. Only those products with a strong state monopoly or in whose case the state must take part in setting the price or some basic necessities, such as bread, olive oil, sugar or electricity charges, remain controlled."

With respect to whether freedom of prices runs counter to containing inflation, Garcia Diez was very confident in asserting that "on the basis of our experience, it is excessive control over prices which encourages inflation most in the long term. A controlled price does not move for 1 or 2 months, but suddenly it has to move, and then the big leap occurs. What will happen in the future is that prices without a control mechanism will gradually adjust to increases in costs, not in the present galloping manner, as soon as we relax control. I must also tell you that there has been careful appraisal of what prices were being liberalized--coffee, for instance. All international prices are declining and there is no reason for believing that coffee will increase in price. Cement is another instance: we have an enormous degree of competition in this industry, which leads us to believe that no sudden price increase will occur. And what I am telling you applies to almost all the liberalized products."

Although the government statement attributed the greatest reactivating power to public investment, it is obvious that in an economic system like ours, the basis of any boosting process rests with employers and private enterprise. This is why we deemed it important to ask Mr Garcia Diez how the private sector is responding in the field of investment.

[Answer] Private enterprise is indeed highly important in our system, and it should be realized that it should boost the economic system in an indispensable manner. However, 2 months is a very brief time for gauging a reaction in specific figures. We cannot know yet whether there was more investment in September than in August.

But what I have perceived through my contacts with employers is that the government program in the economic field has been accepted as the only viable program. And not only has this been acknowledged by employers, but it is also what one is told by the various political parties.

It does not seem possible that Spain can now be offered a substantially different program, and what I can assure you of is that the government is determined to really implement its own program, and whoever were to govern--whether further to our right or further to our left--could not tell the country anything different from what we are saying.

The following question occurred to the journalist: To what extent will it be possible to tackle so many economic needs at the same time, or--to put it another way--how do you simultaneously attend to liberalizing prices, containing inflation, reorganizing sectors and enterprises, boosting employment, increasing investment, and so forth?

[Answer] I must tell you that we are seeking to attend to all the aims at the same time. Of course, employment is now our number 1 priority, and not all measures can be carried out at the same time, but the government's idea is not to neglect any front. One important priority for us and one on which we are working is the launching of an extensive housing program, for which we must find the necessary finance resources--housing which we hope will be one of the levers for giving an impetus to our economy, just as was announced in the government statement.

With respect to the sectors which are being reorganized, we have taken action with regard to electrical domestic appliances and the nonintegral iron and steel industry [siderurgia no integral]. But in this field it must be pointed out that there are no resources for doing everything at once. Enterprises should also realize that they must share the responsibility for reorganization with the administration, contributing ideas and funds, as has already happened in the electrical domestic appliances sector, so as to reach solutions of economic viability.

[Question] Last, Mr Minister: Can we be optimistic about the economy in the short term?

[Answer] Look, I will tell you that things are difficult, but we are a great country and a great people, who know how to be aware of difficulties when they exist. If we are able to take responsibility in our work, we will obviously improve. Because next year will be better: we will grow rather more and unemployment will be contained by means of the lever of housing. We will continue to experience hard times, but with a little more hope.

FOREIGN MINISTER CITED ON NATO, FRANCE, U.S.

LD291627 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 24 Oct 80 p 11

[EFE report: "Perez Llorca Confirms Government's Pro-NATO Vocation: 'The Important Thing With Regard to NATO Is Not the Timetable'"]

[Excerpt] Madrid, 23 Oct--Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez Llorca reasserted the government's pro-NATO vocation to the congress of deputies' foreign affairs committee today, but said that the timetable is not the important consideration in this regard. "The matter," the minister said, "requires that progress be made with regard to Gibraltar and EEC membership. Nevertheless," he added, "the subject must not cause any domestic problems."

In the opinion of the committee's Socialist spokesman, Luis Yanez, these remarks imply a backtracking in the government's stance. The Socialist deputy added that by linking Spain's membership to the securing of progress in the recovery of Gibraltar and in EEC membership the minister had in fact ignored the entire calendar hitherto established.

During his speech Perez Llorca said, referring to the subject of the Polisario hostages, that the government was in favor of any form of humanitarian action, but that the hostages' release could not involve any political compromise. With regard to relations with France, the minister mentioned increasing good will on the Paris government's part concerning the terrorist phenomenon, but added that the situation was still unsatisfactory. Among other things, the Spanish diplomatic chief confirmed the improvement of Madrid-Washington relations but stressed that the United States still maintains a self-centered attitude in its view of relations with Spain.

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE VIEWS KOSYGIN RESIGNATION

LD291001 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 26 Oct 80 Part 1 p 12

[Editorial: "The Kremlin's Old Men"]

[Text] Kosygin's retirement as the Soviet Union's prime minister is hardly any indication of a new Soviet policy. It is testimony to a sluggishness in the Soviet system that his successor is from the same age group that Kosygin himself belongs to. At 75 Tikhonov for obvious reasons cannot expect a long period of government.

However, the government head has seldom played a dominant role in the Kremlin. After Khrushchev's fall 16 years ago there were quite strong indications that a collective leadership had taken over the government. However, it gradually became clear once again that the government's chairman was as in the past the party leader. This was also made clear to the outside world, when Leonid Brezhnev took over the post of Soviet president and pushed out the man who had had the post up to that time.

Kosygin was the technologist and administrator, but even though he never seemed to have been able--or to have wanted--to threaten Brezhnev's position, he without doubt had important influence. His departure occurs at a time when the Soviet economy is characterized by significant difficulties especially in agriculture, as Brezhnev has openly admitted.

The new 75-year-old prime minister cannot be expected to be given the responsibility for or even the possibility of leading developments into new courses. The problem of the future leadership of the party remains unsolved, and even though Kosygin's departure has taken place without any drama--which is remarkable in itself--the Soviet system to date has not shown itself capable of carrying out a change of those in power without bitter internal conflicts extremely dangerous for those involved.

Outwardly the Soviet Union is faced with significant challenges. Attempts to solve them have to an overwhelming extent been through the use or demonstration of the military might that the Soviet Union has built up over the years. However, the biggest problems facing the Soviet Union are internal.

The old men in the Kremlin will be replaced at a time when growth in the Soviet economy is falling and when developments especially in Poland must give rise to doubts about the future of the whole of the Soviet empire.

Will there be attempts to halt these developments with military force as in 1952 in Hungary, in 1968 in Czechoslovakia--and in 1979 in Afghanistan? Or does the system have the necessary flexibility to be able to adapt to the creation of free trade unions and the right to strike? There is not much to indicate this. Here, as in other fields, developments are being delayed to cover up the communist system's and the Soviet empire's fatal deficiencies.

PREMIER DEFERS SOCIAL DEMOCRAT DECISION ON NATO DEPOTS

LD290959 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 26 Oct ip Part 1 p 7

[Christian Broendum report: "Anker Jorgensen: We Await a Definite Offer From NATO"]

[Excerpt] "No matter what the circumstances we still hold the view that depots and reinforcement policy are part of NATO cooperation. This has been accepted for many years by not only the Social Democratic Party but also the Liberals, the Conservatives and the Radical Liberals. It is only a question of whether there is to be some adjustment and we will discover this later."

Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen said this after an hour-long Social Democratic national executive meeting at which the problems of depots and reinforcements were the dominant theme for discussion. The prime minister's statement made it clear that neither the Radical Liberals nor the nonsocialist parties, which are negotiating multi-party support for a new defense bill, should expect any clear Social Democratic decision either for or against new NATO depots housing heavy material which the Radical Liberals and the nonsocialist parties have separately demanded a clear statement from the Social Democrats as a condition for further progress in the negotiations on a new defense bill.

Anker Jorgensen made it clear that it is the party's Folketing group and not the national executive that decides what the party's position will be in the debate on NATO depots in the Folketing on Thursday. We must consider if anything is to be done and in certain cases what is to be done when a definite offer comes from NATO. It is clear that we in the group will have to discuss in principle what we will say in these cases, but I do not think that we are able to say very much before any definite proposal arrives."

PARTY SPOKESMEN CITED ON DEFENSE SPENDING DEBATE

LD291329 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 11 Oct 80 Part 1 p 5

[Christian Broendum report: "Defense Spokesman Repudiated by Minister"]

[Text] Social Democratic Defense Spokesman Preben Steen Nielsen's views on the government's proposal for a new defense settlement are neither representative of those of the Social Democratic Folketing group nor those of Defense Minister Poul Sogaard.

In a commentary on Preben Steen Nielsen's statement to BERLINGSKE TIDENDE yesterday on the defense proposal, Defense Minister Poul Sogaard said: "Preben Steen Nielsen is entitled to have his own view of things, and that is what it is. It is his own view, and does not represent the group's or mine."

Preben Steen Nielsen said of the defense minister's proposal: "From a military viewpoint there are no arguments which support cuts."

Defense Minister Poul Sogaard also stressed that it is too early to begin discussing whether Denmark should continue the expansion of NATO depots in Denmark.

"We have received no offers of reinforcements, and so we have no way of estimating whether there should be depots as a result of these reinforcements. Nothing has as yet been decided, and we cannot begin discussions for the present. I have said that we will create a credible defense system in cooperation with our NATO partners, and this means that I include in this the possibility of our receiving reinforcements. But this does not have to be connected with depots."

Preben Steen Nielsen said yesterday that as long as the Radical Liberals dismiss the idea of depot expansion in the defense negotiations, they will have to go in for increased defense spending. This remark sparked off a sharp reaction yesterday from the Radical Liberal defense policy spokesman, Jens Bilgrav-Nielsen: "If Preben Steen Nielsen's statement is representative of Social Democratic views, then we must simply say that the government proposal for a zero-solution in the defense field and the many statements, especially from the Foreign Ministry, on giving greater priority to humanitarian security policy rather than to military security policy have simply been empty words. It is even worse if Preben Steen Nielsen's statements on the expansion of NATO depots in this country are representative of Social Democratic views."

Bilgrav-Nielsen wants the Social Democrats to give a clear indication of what their policy and that of the government is in this area. If Danish policy on depots and reinforcements is to be changed, then it is a matter "that we would like to see the people have the opportunity to decide, either in a future election or a referendum."

The Conservative defense spokesman, Palle Simonsen, finds Presen Steen Nielsen's remarks positive. "It is clear that there are many within the Social Democratic Party who wish to make a contribution to the maintenance of a reasonable Danish defense force. The lower the level the Danish defense force has, the more necessary it is to make greater use of reinforcements, and so it is necessary to affirm that no matter what the Radical Liberals think there must be an expansion of the depots. Meanwhile we have the impression that the United States would be grateful to Denmark if it were allowed to contribute reinforcements. It is now a matter of affirming that it is Denmark that would benefit from being given these reinforcements."

The Folketing will soon discuss the problems of depots again. The Socialist People's Party decided on Friday to table a question with the wording: "What information can the minister give about the government's position on the stationing of foreign NATO troops and the deployment of nuclear arms on Danish soil in so-called tension periods, meaning in peacetime?"

AKTUELT URGES ECONOMIC REALISM IN DEFENSE SPENDING

LD290751 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 25 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "NATO Growth"]

[Text] What has been said is quite correct: Danish NATO membership is the guarantee for the whole of our defense policy, and membership in such an alliance presupposes solidarity, commitment and sacrifices. This is why we are investing 8.1 billion kroner in defense in 1981--and regret that we in a time of economic crisis are unable to allow defense spending to increase by a further 3 percent at the present time.

We call the offer "zero-solution", and the Netherlands has decided on something similar. Nevertheless passions have been brought to the boil here at home, and it is possible that the political parties which traditionally support defense legislation will refuse to support the country's defense and security policy.

Norway has increased its defense spending from 8 billion kroner in 1980 to 9.3 billion in 1981, a fall in its percentage of the total national budget from 9.4 to 9.3 percent.

And now there is Margaret Thatcher's Conservative government which says that Britain cannot afford a 3-percent increase in the defense budget, but is aiming at something in the direct of a "zero-solution": This does not strengthen NATO but is an expression of economic necessity. We call on the Danish Liberal and Conservative parties to come to their senses and help to obtain a realistic defense from a budget of 8.1 billion kroner. Anything else would be a provocation to the mood of the population. Even Margaret Thatcher understands this.

FOREIGN MINISTRY PREPARES FOR DISCUSSIONS ON U.S. BASES

AT291430 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 29 Oct 80

I AVYI Opposes Bases Talks

AT301125 Athens I AVYI in Greek 30 Oct 80 p 6

[From the "I AVYI" column: "The Time for Action"]

[Text] Our country's decided reintegration within NATO's military wing has brought the immediate "settlement" of the question of U.S. bases on Greek territory to the center of daily interest. The euphoria now demonstrated by the Americans over the "favorable" conclusion of this issue appears to be well established. The "New Democracy" government, having already made a basic decision, now has no reasons for special resistence to U.S. demands. Reports that the Americans will now ask for additional expansion of the potential already envisaged under the initialed 1977 agreement on their bases in Greece, are extremely demonstrative from this viewpoint. This expansion of potential will correspond to new U.S. requirements and strategic demands in the east Mediterranean and Middle East areas.

The fundamental "collapse" of the government's resistence creates new elements in the division of forces which fight against the total capitulation of our country to U.S.-NATO strategy. Perhaps it is also important for us to underline here that the emphasis which President of the Republic Karamanlis used in Thessaloniki to stress the need for national unity can only be interpreted now as a request for the subjugation of our people to a policy which is against our national interests. Under the phase now opening up, the responsibilities born by the opposition parties are greatly increased regarding the stepping up of people's resistanceto the government's policy which prepares a permanent U.S. presence in Greece. Such responsibilities cannot end with certain Cassandra-like statements about where this government policy might lead. As in the previous phase, the phase of struggle against reintegration, such statements and after-the-fact denunciations are far below the needs of the moment and far below the potential and strength inherent in a people who in their greatest majority oppose the policy of subjugating our country to the strategic, aggressive plans of the United States and NATO.

What we recommend is an immediate understanding between democratic parties on specific goals for resisting the new step which is being speedily prepared, that is, perpetuation of U.S. military presence in our country. An acceleration of action, with the broadest possible participation of the people, is quite possible. This can be implemented and can put its seal on the final outcome. Such action, however, presupposes a desire to abandon the practice of empty statements and to take up mass action. This is the only way to stop further decisions which will be detrimental to the people and which push the people "into a corner" with the next election as their only hope.

I KATHIMERINI Explains Defense Talks

[Text] With the upcoming signing of the new Greek-U.S. agreement on defense cooperation, the balance of forces between Greece and Turkey will be permanently established.

There are indications that tomorrow at noon exploratory talks will begin with a first meeting between Ambassador Deputy Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry St. Roussos, heading the Greek delegation, and U.S. Ambassador in Athens R. McCloskey. The forecast is that the relevant process (exploratory talks and negotiations) will be completed very soon given the fact that the two sides already concur on the agreement's general framework which, for reasons of balance, will be similar on basic points to the U.S.-Turkish agreement that has already been initialed. Furthermore, the United States and Greece intend that both agreements should come into force simultaneously.

It is expected that substantive negotiations between the Greek and U.S. sides will begin after some days because the Greek Government, through its experts, is still studying the plan of agreement which McCloskey gave to it through a relevant aide memoire last month; it has not yet given a reply, noting its own observations, which will constitute the object of the negotiations.

In addition to the U.S.-Turkish agreement, the Greek-U.S. defense cooperation agreement--initialed in 1977 but never implemented due to complications in Greek-NATO relations--will be taken as the basis for formulating the corresponding Greek-U.S. agreement. This will involve a completely new agreement except for one or two points which will abolish an impressive number of privileges which the 1953 agreement and its appendices had instituted for U.S. personnel.

According to reports, the plan of the Greek-U.S. agreement, which the United States has submitted to the Greek Government, confirms the two countries' dedication to the principles of the UN Charter, stresses the need for mutual respect of the two parties' sovereignty, expresses the willingness of the two parties to strengthen their defense cooperation as partners within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty, recognizes the obligation of the two parties toward the security and defense of this area (eastern Mediterranean) of the North Atlantic Treaty, stresses the need for close cooperation that will cover economic and defense issues as well as scientific and technical sectors, and has the United States undertaking the responsibility of offering Greece defense equipment, services and training programs for the Greek Armed Forces. The technical and financial strengthening and modernization of the Greek air industry in Tanagra is envisaged within this framework so that its disadvantageous, uneconomic operation can be overcome; the participation of the United States is also recognized in common defense measures--installations existing in Greece in which the commander will be Greek. It is envisaged that the Greek-U.S. agreement and its appendices will last 5 years with the possibility of a tacit extension. The United States recognizes the obligation to further develop the defense readiness of Greece and to constantly cover its defense needs.

An authoritative government source has announced that everything that some newspapers had reported in connection with the Greek-U.S. talks on the bases is mere speculation. The U.S. side, however, has not denied a report concerning "exploratory talks" to be held today [as published] in a meeting between representatives of the two sides.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON VISIT OF CSSR PREMIER STROUGAL

ECEVIT RESIGNS AS CHAIRMAN OF REPUBLICAN PEOPLE'S PARTY

NC300957 Paris AFP in English 0950 GMT 30 Oct 80

[Text] Ankara, 30 Oct (AFP)--Former Turkish Premier Bulent Ecevit announced here today he is resigning as chairman of the social democratic Republican People's Party.

Mr Ecevit, who was detained for a month after the Sept 12 military coup, made public a statement that he deemed it "useful to carry out this separation (from his party) which apparently will be obligatory anyway."

SECURITY COUNCIL STATEMENT ON POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

TA291757 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Statement by the Secretariat General of the National Security Council]

[Text] Statements by National Security Council General Secretary Gen Haydar Saltik in reply to questions by correspondents in a news conference with foreign journalists on 28 October 1980 have been interpreted in certain press reports in a way that gives the impression that Mr Demirel and Mr Ecevit would return to political life again as party leaders whenever the ban [on the activities of political parties] is lifted. The actual statement during the news conference was that Mr Demirel and Mr Ecevit would resume their political activities like any other citizens when the ban on political activities has been lifted. However, no statement was made that they would do so as the leaders of any political party.

The fact that the functioning of political parties in accordance with democratic principles had been obstructed was one of the main reasons that made the 12 September operation necessary. The public has been a witness to the irresponsible paralyzing of the Senate and Assembly due to the stand taken by the legislators--who depended on the appreciation and decisions of their party leaders for reelection--who were not capable of exercising their free will to fulfill the task entrusted to them by the lofty nation.

Taking into consideration the view that democratic guarantees to eliminate the reign of party leaders are necessary, rules that will not allow the party leaders to remain in office more than a determined period will be considered during the preparation of the new political party law.

MINISTER OZAL RETURNS FROM OECD SESSION, REPORTS SUPPORT

TA291802 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal said that agreement has been reached at the OECD meetings that the economic stability program being implemented in Turkey is yielding successful results.

Ozal, who participated in the OECD's second working group meetings in Paris, returns to Ankara today. In a statement at Esenboga Airport, Ozal said that OECD countries have decided to continue their aid to Turkey if the economic stability program continues to be implemented in the present courageous manner in Turkey. Ozal added that in the speech he delivered at the OECD meeting he also referred to the visa requirement certain countries have imposed on Turkish citizens. Noting that in his speech he pointed out that this visa requirement will adversely affect Turkey's economic program, Ozal added that this requirement will also create certain problems in Turkey's trade relations with Europe. Ozal said his meeting with French Minister of Economy Monory was positive and that positive developments were expected in the financing of the Akkuyu nuclear power station in Silifke.

HURRIYET: ARMENIANS CONSPIRE AGAINST TURKISH DIPLOMATS

[Text] Brussels (HURRIYET)--It has been reported that the Armenians are now conspiring against our diplomats in Belgium and our officers in NATO. For this purpose, they have sent two hired assassins to Belgium.

According to our information, the Turkish Foreign Ministry has sent telex to our legations in Belgium informing them that the Armenians have hired two assassins, one Lebanese and the other Italian, and have sent them to Belgium to assassinate Turkish diplomats and Turkish NATO officers. The telex advises the legations to be cautious, saying that the Belgian authorities also have taken precautionary steps. Many diplomats and soldiers are currently engaged at the Turkish Embassy in Brussels and at the NATO and Common Market organizations.

VOTCP DENOUNCES GOVERNMENT IMPOSITION OF DEATH SENTENCES

TA280731 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 28 Oct 80

[Text] Serdar Soyergin, sentenced to death by the Adana Military Court for his involvement in the killing of Tank Captain Bulent Angin, was executed last Sunday. This is the third death sentence carried out by the junta.

It is reported that about 60 more convicts have been sentenced to death by martial law courts for various crimes. News agency reports say that 2 days before he was executed, Soyergin handed a 36-page statement to the martial law authorities supplying concrete information on terrorist activities by both organizations posing as leftists and by the murder gangs of the fascist NAP. It has been reported that the statement contains significant tips on the relationship between these terrorist organizations with the National Intelligence Agency [MIT] and CIA.

VOTCP DENOUNCES GOVERNMENT'S CONSTITUTIONAL ORDER LAW

TA291232 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 29 Oct 80

[Text] The temporary constitution prepared by the junta eliminates all the constitutional organizations and institutions. The junta is legalizing its bloody dictatorship.

The so-called temporary constitution law prepared by the pro-American junta and immediately put into effect grants the junta infinite authority in ruling Turkey arbitrarily. This law, which is composed of seven articles and which aims to attribute a legal appearance to the boody dictatorship of the junta, eliminates de facto the 1961 Constitution and all the organizations and institutions provided by this Constitution.

The second article of this dictatorship law stipulates that the six-man junta—called the National Security Council—will exercise all the powers of the Turkish Grand National Assembly, the National Assembly and the Senate. The same article states that the authority of the president will be exercised by Gen Kenan Evren, the current leader of the junta.
